

Road to Mannorstare

‘It all started on 22 of March 1842. It wasn't that long ago. I hope you understand why I was so afraid and confused about what I saw, to even consider coming back to report it. You must know by now what I'm talking about, that cursed town that no one dares to even bat an eye at. The ancient town we'd never approach. I can't tell you anything about its inhabitants. The ones that I met aren't in the best condition.

Pardon, my intrusion, I hate smoking. As I was saying, I was a child, perhaps closer to maturity since I comprehended the seriousness of my actions. I made the mistake of running away from my family in search of someone by the name of Bartholomew. Rumors spread long before I came there, that the great musician was searching for an apprentice. Who would pass the possibility of becoming his pupil? To work directly under his tutelage was my dream ever since I heard his ceremonious symphonies. Even as a child without experience, I knew that I couldn't give up. After all, some risks are worth taking, at least, that's what I had in mind when I ran off to that town in the first place. The sky was crying that day and I had no raincoat on me.

Just like a wet dog I ran to that town, trying to figure out where he was. The streets were empty and most houses appeared to be locked down to the toughest nail. I didn't have enough time to search the entire area since a bigger storm was brewing. Luckily for me, I didn't have to. A tavern was open and its lights kept flickering at me. I thought I could finally rest. Dead roses and scorned worms got in the way though I paid little attention to those signs. The nameplate above the tavern read:

‘The Dried Loin Tavern.’ Its door knob was too cold to handle so I had to lower my sleeve to open it. Despite not being strong enough to force my way in, I kept trying, thinking that Bartholomew could be waiting for me on the other side. He would share the secrets of his trade and shape my future from that point on. It was my one and only chance and a simple door would not stop me. The weather wasn't getting any better.

Mind that, the lightning only managed to cover the howls partially. I took a break from trying to unscrew the bolt as I began looking around. Nothing in sight except some rubble spread around. Enough of this, I punched the door until my knuckles turned red, trying to get in as I made as much noise as I possibly could. With assault unwavering, my fists began dissipated the water drops in their path. Someone was definitely in there. They had to help me somehow. As the door slightly opened a giant-like hand grabbed me by the shoulder throwing me inside. I fell on the ground but at least I was in. After picking myself up I saw a tall bearded man locking up the door. He almost crushed his rugged cap before he turned around to scream at me.

From the look on his face, it seemed that he wasn't expecting me. I didn't know what to do. He stood there and kept yelling at me, ready to strike me down where I stood. I lay as frozen as a statue, as silent as a lamb in front of a bull, speechless for what was about to come.

While paying no attention to what he said, out of fear for my life I closed my eyes in embarrassment, hoping he didn't notice.

He grabbed me again with his dirty hand, this time I he turned me around. I opened my eyes only to find myself standing in front of the people from around the tavern who were minding their business drinking and gambling away their change. Our eyes didn't meet. I was far too embarrassed to look at them or even at the place. I didn't recognize his uniform at the time, but the man who held me was probably a sailor. He wore a blue uniform with lots of buttons, a dark cap to cover his bald spot and a scowl that intimidated me easily.

He stopped yapping and stared at me after, waiting for something in return. His patience was thin I noticed it as he adjusted his cap towards his right side. I opened my mouth barely managing to ask what was going on. It was hard since I was soaked and I didn't want to get thrown away out there. After being unhanded I heard him for the first time. His voice was as rough as he looked when he told me:

'Laddie, you better have a good reason to come in here and get us this much attention. I could throw you back from where you came from, don't you know what day it is? You'll regret the decision you made this day, I promise you that. '

Those were the only words I managed to understand after he calmed down. But I didn't know what he meant by it. I didn't know what to say to him, other than the truth.

'I came searching for the Grand Instructor Bartholomew, sir.'

The sailor took a deep breath and told me that there was no one by that name in here and I should go back home.

The rain would go on for hours but I did not doubt he'd throw me out without a second thought.

'What's your name kid? '

His request was ignored since I wasn't sure I could trust him with my name. Especially after what he said, he wasn't a stable man. Nor did he appreciate the gesture.

'You stupid prick!'

He said it out loud before raising his hand at me. He was fast enough in the draw that I couldn't get out of the way if he did it. But another hand came appeared out of nowhere just in time to stop him. I didn't see her until he was pushed out of the way.

'That's enough of you Rod. You had way too many drinks now, you should know better than to hit a child'

Her voice was only as pleasant as her protection. I had to wait for their entire argument to finish before I could thank her for taking my side.

'Don't get emotional now Hannah, you know what happened the last time someone came in unannounced. If the kid stays, who knows what terrible thing might happen.'

She placed herself between us, even though we haven't even officially met yet.

'We can't send the child outside. Did you see the condition he's in? The poor boy is shaken all over. Plus, it's an even greater risk to open the door again.'

She spoke softly but bitterly towards Rod, who didn't care what anyone thought about it.

'If anything happens, it will all be on you Hannah. '

That's the last thing he said before storming out to one of the barrels near the tables in the tavern, not to mention that he gave me the stink eye. She turned around and introduced herself to me, right before asking me if I was hurt. I was doing fine thanks to her. It's sad to think what could've happened if she wasn't there shield me from Rod. She smiled before patting me gently on the back, humming a sweet melody I did not forget. That music helped me forget the conundrum I was in. Hannah continued checking me for any harm she missed. While doing it, I noticed her long black hair, her tender skin and the blue surroundings.

She asked me to follow her as quickly as possible. We were headed towards a set of stairs, which lead to another floor inside the tavern. I didn't pay enough attention to the other people down there as I was too afraid of getting into another fight. But I managed to glimpse at an old banshee who was standing at a table, drinking from a crow's nest. No one paid any attention to us, except Rod but I can't be sure since we were too far away from him at this point. After climbing a long set of stairs, we stopped in the middle of a corridor filled with enough rooms to accommodate a dozen people at least. It was also quiet. At this point no noise came from inside the tavern. The howls started again, but it sounded like no wolf I ever heard of. Hannah was able to notice it before I did. The next thing caught me off guard. She wrapped her hands around me and apologized for something.

'Do you see that square up on the ceiling, the one that looks like a trunk? I know it's hard to see, but you're going to have to hide inside the attic for the rest of the night. I promise you everything's going to be all right. ' Everything happened way too fast, I didn't know what to do. Something was bashing the door violently downstairs and I didn't know who or what it was. Even after trying to face it, I was stopped.

'Time's running out. Why is it so hard for you to understand? '

I did not say a word but nodding my head wasn't a problem. After reaching up the ceiling a small ladder fell down from the attic. I received a kiss on the forehead before I got pushed in, hearing the sound of the hatch clicking in. Ever had a feeling that someone's about die? Not only someone, but just about everyone in that tavern that night. I never got the chance to thank her, before it went on again.

A greater growl came from outside, far more ferocious than it had ever been. And I was stuck here, in an old attic with a barricaded window standing at its end. The gaps between the wooden planks were big enough for light to come in. I took care not to make any noise while stepping on that slimy rotten floor. Breaking her request wasn't my intention. By now the noise coming from downstairs was the loudest it got up to this point. I took the opportunity to look out for myself. It was the figure of an animal.

No, it was unlike any animal I've ever seen. As this beastly thing kept pounding on the door with its mere brute force. For a moment, I thought I was noticed as it backed away a few feet away from where it stood. Without thinking, I ran and hid in the closest corner I could get in.

A final growl came but not from outside. The smashing of the door echoed throughout the tavern. I tried my best to cover my ears, hearing their voices as they shouted in pain. That beast made it inside and started butchering them without a care. And it would eventually come after me, I feared. I prayed for her safety, yet it was in vain. Rod hadn't deserved it either and soon enough my safety came in harm's way too. His voice came near the hatch. The sounds of the struggle between him and that fiend could still be heard. Though I can't imagine what went through his head during their fight. And all of the sudden the voices stopped. I felt tormented for the entirety of that night. Not only were objects being smashed from down under but the cloth from what seemed to be the beds got torn apart.

Why did any of that have to happen? Did it leave me alone? Does it know where I am? Could I be the only one left alive? They must have escaped somehow. I wanted to leave but she told me not to, I couldn't disappoint her. The sad truth was too much to take at the time, my thoughts were scrambled inside my head and at a point I even denied any of that even happened. Everything happened so fast yet so slow, it's hard for me to figure out if it was real or not.

The rest of that night is still blurry. I didn't eat in days since I decided to go after Bartholomew and that finally took its toll.

Combined with the cold, I started feeling nauseous, so, so tired, the attic I was in must have felt the same, as it started shaking with me. There's another thing I forgot to mention. Before I managed to fall to sleep, I had one last chance to look at the hatch that wasn't far from where I was. Something kept pushing through but I can't remember what happened after it. That was the longest night of my entire life. I'm still able to remember it up to this day. The dreams I had, dead flies and chopped crowns still hid away what were my last moments of peace.

The next day I remember waking up near a bird-man with a crow face, in a small hut. He was nice enough to give me something to eat as he helped me recover. I never asked him about his appearance as it gave me the creeps. After that I thanked the man and left the town, avoiding the tavern and everyone else who came in my path. I believe that was the same time I've got here. I wasn't able to tell anyone about what happened without being called insane and not believe a word I said and who could blame them? So that's how it happened and that's why I never got to tell anyone about it. In ten damn years, no one was able to find their corpses and others even pretend like they don't even know about the town itself.

Not even one day goes by without me thinking about going back there. Look, Jon, a lot happened since then, I'm not the same person I used to be back then, but I can't just stand any longer and do nothing about it, people must know.

‘Before being able to go back to my job, I had to appeal to Jon, a lousy friend who managed to become a decent detective. He didn't write much on his little note, not that I expected much, even from a friend, but at least, he was able to hear me out, I couldn't ask for more from anyone else. He slammed his hand on the table and told me as we were eye to eye:

‘Look, I don't know what you want me to say. It's hard to believe that a creature or an animal of some sort could come and get rid off so many people in less than a night, not to mention to escape without a trace. You don't have to lie to me, we're friends, and after all, so, as a friend, I'm going to have to ask you to forget about it, for your sake and for everyone else around you. ’

I couldn't believe I was being told to forget about those people who died before me and let their deaths mean nothing, after all, that happened. And forget about the woman who sacrificed herself to save me? ‘I should have known better. I'm sorry if I wasted your precious time Jon, you clearly have other things better to do. Our conversation is now over. I'll take my leave now if I may. After telling him that, I tried making my way out but he stopped me from going any further:

‘Wait, one moment before you leave. I know that it doesn't seem fair towards you and something's telling me that you're not going to give up so easily. I might have known something about your situation with that place but I couldn't speak about it back then. ’

Jon was searching for something behind his back, I didn't know what he wanted to give me, nor did I know why but he pulled out a small handbook, slightly covered up in black leather.

‘What's with this book Jon and why are you handing it to me so sudden? ’

He offered me the book and told me that:

‘It was my mother's journal. I don't know much about her. I've never had the chance to meet her since she was born and raised there. Here's her journal, I hope it helps you more than it did me. And by the way, if you meet my wife, don't tell her what I said to you. '

His mother's journal, it was sudden yet I didn't want to complain about it. It seemed like it paid off becoming friends after all. My hand flew right through, opening it straight away.

'It's full of nonsense, I know. I've never been able to break the code and understand what she was trying to tell me as I failed in my every attempt. Perhaps you might be able to get through to her somehow. That, if what you've been saying to me so far is true. '

I closed the journal and put it in my backpack.

'Thank you, Jon, I knew you'd understand. '

Jon looked at me and smiled, he was happy to help. I was happy that I was getting closer to my goal though his eyes screamed of sorrow and mistrust.

He's been through enough, I should leave him be. I wasn't going to ask him more questions about his mother except:

'Have you even wondered what happened to her? '

A small break before I continued.

'Your mother I mean. '

Jon didn't give me any answer but I could see that the question made him feel uncomfortable. I had no reason to attempt any further, my point had already been clear.

'I should get going now, say hello to your wife for me Jon. '

'Don't worry, I will. Take care of yourself. '

After saying goodbye to Jon, I've made my way out of the interrogation room, immediately bumping into another one of the bulls. Papers were flying everywhere, all falling on the ground.

It so happened that it was Jon's wife, Veronica, angry as usual. I told her that 'It was all an accident; I didn't mean to do it. '

Then I helped her pick all of them off the ground. I felt like this was going to come back to bite me some day.

'Don't worry about it, just be safe, okay? '

That was unexpected, to say the least. I don't know why I expected her to be angrier at me for messing up but for some reason she smiled and went on her way after handing her the papers. As I made my way out of the section, something felt off. I felt like a wrongly imprisoned inmate getting released. Perhaps it was something she did that made me feel that way. On my way to work, I took the journal out of my backpack and started going through random pages from it.

The journal was nothing more than an average memoir with small exceptions; some of the passages from it were not only unrecognizable but smeared in something. It was too late for me to go back and from the way he acted, it didn't seem like we wanted to talk about it any longer. Shame, he did seem to know a greater deal about it than me. I was glad to be able to enjoy the rest of the day, oh wait; I still had to go to work.

This small memento will have to wait, at least until I got back home after. As I made my way through town, I made sure to pass next to the local flower store.

Call it a hunch but I thought that the shopkeeper's daughter had a crush on me. So, making sure I was farther away, but not far enough for her to see me, I waved at the store from the opposite street. Luckily for me, she was there to wave back at me.

Quite a sweet girl she was but what a shame that she was never able to speak. Didn't weight her down, though. The road I was on got me faster towards where I wanted to get. It wasn't too far from where I stood; the newspaper office was almost in my grasp. I wasn't too bad of a journalist, but far from the best, at least not yet.

One of these days, with enough proof, I could reveal everything, I was sure of it. Everyone will know of my achievement and of my story. As I made my way to the office and opened the door, a gust came from behind me and swept all the papers that lay on the ground even farther away. It was so hot outside that it was out of place. This time, it wasn't my fault; I wasn't even here to begin with. But alas, a trickster decided to make my life even harder. Some of my co-workers were already trying to clean up and didn't appreciate me making their lives miserable. Even the boss came shortly after to yell at me.

'Five minutes late and look at my workplace! This isn't an animal farm. Now, help them clean everything up and get back to your job.'

'I didn't dare talk back to him and just nodded my head, I've grown fearful of intimidating people and unfortunately he was one of them. He wasn't always that way, at least not when his wife was around.'

'Are you going to stare or come join us? A part of the problem is because of you after all'

Francis, a fellow journalist who was picking thrown editions of yesterday's papers. For a second, I thought I saw everything on the paper as unrecognizable gibberish. As I picked it up to take a better look at it, its appearance came back to normal.

'Are you feeling okay? '

He asked me. I answered him quickly that:

'I was, I mean I am. I should keep picking them up. '

He rolled his eyes as I continued doing it, but none of the other papers were different, the stress must be catching up with me. There wasn't much time, I picked my share and decided to throw it in the pile near the machine. The boss wanted me to come to him since he waved his hand at me. It didn't help that I stood alone in the middle of the room either. When I got closer to his desk and asked him:

'Did you want to see me? '

He was going through files and his small desk light almost reflected through the glasses in his hand. As if it wasn't bad enough being with him alone, it got worse as the light kept coming into my eye. He told me:

'Look, I don't want you late anymore, do you understand? We're a professional company and people depend on us. Don't make me have this talk again with you, okay? '

I didn't want to anger him with my excuses because I knew he wouldn't understand.

'I understood'

I left his desk soon after. I should have gone to the police in my spare time. That would have spared me of some trouble. On my way back, I saw Carla and Matthew back at their desks writing. Francis, and that didn't surprise me, still had to pick up his share. 'Francis, do you need some help picking up those? '

I was suddenly interrupted by him.

‘No. Shouldn't you be meeting someone now?’

‘Then it stung me that I did have to be somewhere else.

You were supposed to meet with Carla and help her with that article, remember?’

‘Wait!’ I almost yelled, loud enough for everyone to hear me. ‘That was today?’ I lowered my voice soon after and apologized to everyone. ‘That was today Francis?’

‘Yes, I thought you knew and just made a quick stop here.’

‘Could you please move out of the way?’

I didn't notice it straight away until a second after but Ken made his way to the office. He was the man responsible for repairing and maintaining the machine and what not. I didn't want to judge him but, he did lose his wife and some of his friends.

‘Yeah, sorry, I'm just a mess this day.’

‘Could you move out of the way so I could do my job then?’

I already said I'm sorry, I'm not going to say it a second time, but I did get out of his way and let him to his business. Since I was near him, I gave him a hand and even some tools while he worked on it. In less than half an hour, he was done.

The way he managed to pull its metal tendrils and unclog its pipes always fascinated me. I always felt like I could watch him work at it for hours. I almost forgot about Carla, strange, I swear I saw her at her desk a moment ago, but she wasn't there. There's no way that she just left when I wasn't paying attention, I would've heard the door being slammed. I got out of the office after that and started running towards our usual meeting point.

I couldn't remember where exactly but I thought she said it was in the town's square. Close enough, I almost hit another man on my way to it while walking on the street. I eventually got there, just in time, as Carla was waiting for me, near the founder's statue. Not the happiest look on her face. The same look of annoyance she always had when things didn't go her way. She appeared to be mad but at the same time, something betrayed the fact that she seemed thrilled, happy to see me.

‘You're late as usual, by a lot of time. I swear, if I wasn't in such a good mood, I might have requested a new partner.’

She wanted to start a war with me but I had no intention of carrying it, especially since she was right. My only other choice was to calm her down before it was too late.

‘Look, Carla, I had some personal issues to take care of. I've taken a lot of bollocks from everyone, including you.

Now, can we just go and talk about it later?’

I knew she wasn't going to let me off the rail that easily but she wasn't heartless either.

‘Fine, but next time be faster! I got a feeling that both of our asses are on the line anyway.’

We started walking towards the street. I thought about asking her about the office but the thought left my mind soon after.

Instead, I was curious about the current assignment.

‘So Carla, I was detained the whole time by the dets and I've already lost some time in the office. The point is that I forgot about what we were supposed to write about today.’

‘Of course, you did. Look, you forgot about the new shop opening today. ’

‘What's so special about it anyway? It's just another shop in a town full of them. ’

But she looked so anxious about it like that I knew there was something more about it.

‘Fine, what's the catch, Terry? ’

She didn't appreciate that.

‘I told you not to call me that, and you will find out once we get there. Call it a surprise if you want to and step on it, we don't have all day to spare. ’

She was indeed something. I picked up my old camera from my backpack and was ready to go for it. .

Carla was the one leading the way so I couldn't just rush without knowing where to go, so I decided to have some more small talk with her. I felt I should say something about her having a braid, which was strange because she's never done anything about her hair before. Something about it made her so different in more than one way. Funny how one simple thing can change one so much. I do wonder what made her go for this particular style.

‘Are you going to keep staring at my head for the rest of the way? I mean I don't mind it but I hope you're not doing it for the wrong reasons. ’

A direct approach wasn't the best option but at this point, I had no choice.

‘So, what have you done with your hair? ’

I could see from her face that she was somewhat offended.

‘You do know how to act like a wet paddler, don't you? ’

‘Wait, what did you call me Terry? ’

With a smirk on her face, she turned quickly on a side. ‘I'm just messing with you.

Don't worry about it. Since we're almost there, do you want to know about why we're going there or not? ’

‘Tell me already, and don't be so bitter next time. ’

‘As I was saying, there are some ongoing rumors that the owner of the store might be the son of a baron who fled away from his father because he was forced to marry someone who he didn't want to. ’

This whole rumor sounded like a hoax to me so he could get people to purchase from his store, but nevertheless. It wouldn't surprise me if they were both hand in hand, getting paid to advertise the place.

Perhaps there was something else to it.

‘Carla, it seems like you've got the hots for him. ’

‘Maybe you're the one who has them, but not I. And I'd never be with someone like him; you can be sure on that. ’

I tried convincing her that it might make a bad article, based on a rumor, even if.

‘Your feelings are clouding your judgment. You're not thinking straight, are you? ’ But our conversation leads to nowhere since the article was being made one way or another.

‘Oh? Don't tell me you're jealous, are you? ’ And then she glanced into my eyes knowing that it would make me mad. I won't go down that easily, at least not without one strike before we get there.

‘In your sweetest dreams. ’

Not my best work but it was enough since we arrived at our destination and she had no time to unleash her wrath upon me. We both stopped in front of the store to admire it for some moments.

It was amazing, an antique store that had all sorts of clocks, toys and other objects for display. I had to capture it, so I placed the camera into position and took a few shots of it. I had to immortalize it, not the store itself but the older objects inside it. They captivated me even if I couldn't see well enough, each of them held a story of its own. A couple of shot should suffice, that way I could be sure one of them would do it justice.

‘So, shall we go in?’ Carla asked me after I was done.

‘Ladies first, I insist!’ We both got in and a bell rang announcing our arrival.

As I expected, it was full of dust and cobwebs. Even the spiders were including among the antiquities. I simply had to take another shot at everything there and so have I. I felt like I was capturing the atmosphere of the place, everywhere around me, something could be encased, even the store itself looked older from the inside, almost unnaturally aged.

But that wasn't possible at all, not to mention how useless it sounded.

‘Save some for the owner you dummy, you're not filling a catalogue!’ She was right, even if I didn't want to admit it. But how could I stop when everything seemed out of this world? Perhaps it was, I wouldn't exclude that any time. We both kept searching the place; at least, she did since I was too busy trying to take as many pictures as I could, as the owner wasn't here yet. Strange that the door was open when we came in so he wasn't that far off. Carla took a note out of her pocket while I was still trying to find more items to capture.

She ignored the store and everything inside it, not even batting a look on the fascinating scene. She could at least pretend she cared about it. Depressing old painting of withered trees no one would buy, bronze framings to pictures that cried in broken tea cups, even a replica of a lighthouse stood near a town. It was far too dark inside of it for anyone to be there anyway.

‘Oh, there he is.’ He was neither too old nor too young. I waited my turn as she started talking to him, away from my ears and sight. I kept on nipping until I saw a picture of a young girl.

That was a strange thing to keep in an antique store, but the purple dress she wore was even more peculiar. Until she finished doing him, I kept looking around, a lot of books stacked upon each other, fancy names and others not.

There was one in particular at the bottom with a face on it that I found out to be quite repulsive looking.

‘Those aren't for sale, please don't touch anything.’

The owner almost shouted me out of the place. Both gave me funny looks before returning to their work.

And so serious about it, as if I've done some sort of immorality. But what was he hiding? Maybe even more, clues about my research I thought, even if the chances were slim. The chances were divine; after all, he was someone who came from outside the town. Carla did an amazing job distracting him from my sight and plans. Only a little longer and I would be able to get my hands on it. I turned around, back at the prize, just a couple of the books off and I was able to.

‘Okay, back off you deprived knuckle-bearer! I already told you to back off; one more time and I'll kick both of you out.’

The second strike, this time was serious and Carla was on his side too.

‘Seriously stop, we're here for both work and pleasure but pleasure can wait. Our conversation here is crucial so please calm down.’ Both turned around as if nothing happened. I knew that he would probably kick me out but I had to know what was written in it. The stakes were high and my desire to know was even greater.

He wouldn't expect me to try a second time, I was sure of it, this time, I waited for the right time to strike and went on with my move, and it would be a checkmate for me.

'Okay stop, this is the last straw, both of you get out of my store!' She took her time as she waited a few seconds before joining me. I don't know what he told her but at this point I didn't care. We both left the store as soon as she was done, far away from the shady man. I did manage to take one last shot of him before going out towards the pissed out woman. Not only did I not get to read that book but the disappointment and annoyance in Carla's eyes didn't make it worth it.

'I can't believe you, what's with this obsession over those damn books? Thadeon there told you so many times not to do it and you still couldn't help yourself but embarrass both of us. '

It wasn't my fault, though.

'I had to know what was written in it. If he didn't want people to read it, he wouldn't keep it out in the open. ' She was mad and I wasn't making it any better.

'Look, have you ever heard about hiding something in plain sight? He's a mysterious man, I'm sure that's not even his real name, Thadeon. I doubt he wanted you to read it in the first place. '

'Look, Carla, I'm sorry, I know I said that a lot lately but I am. At least, do we have enough for an article? '

'Yes, I suppose we have. The pictures you've taken should also suffice; at least one good thing came out of it. '

'Let's just get back to the office and end the day with this article. 'Before we went on our way I managed to make her laugh at this sad situation, after all.

'How many opportunities to get kicked out will you ever get? '

It was in poor taste, maybe not even that funny, but at the time, it was enough to make her smile long after we went away. The sun was still up but the night wasn't far behind, on the road she started telling me all about this Thadeon guy. Even if there wasn't enough about him to be told, I knew that it wasn't the last time we would see each other. Carla didn't manage to find out about his background rather that he arrived by a carriage and decided to open a store in this town. The rumors were nothing more than rumors in the end.

He didn't look like the type to come from a noble family and even if he did, that's the last thing we needed in these parts. The mayor wouldn't be happy about that either, I should finish the article anyway; I've got plenty of work at home too, so it would be a bad idea to mix them up. We weren't interrupted from our walk afterwards, strange because at this hour the postman would come to greet us from anywhere.

He probably called in sick today. He wasn't the only one who wasn't around; we took the long way and noticed that both the coffee shop and the flower store were closed.

'Carla, wait, I need to check something over there. 'The weather wasn't great from where I stood. It felt like the day was going to happen all over again but it couldn't. We got closer towards Darya's store to check if there was someone inside. I tried knocking on a door and looking through the window but there was no one inside. The flower store was never kept closed during the day, not even when one of them got sick.

'Are you okay? There's a storm coming, that's why they probably closed it so soon. 'Carla didn't really see anything strange but I knew that something was brewing up.

‘I hope, at least, the office isn't closed in or else all of this work was for nothing. ’

‘The office is never closed. The boss is too cheap to give everyone a day off. ’ She said, maybe they didn't leave after all. We made our way back to it, with rain slowly falling from the sky. I didn't get wet since I managed to get inside fast enough but I couldn't say the same about her. Everyone was working, even Francis was standing at his small desk, writing. Ken was still maintaining the machine and even Rob the janitor was here, making sure there won't be any accidents anymore. The rest of them must have come and left, even the boss.

Carla went on to start writing the article; I would join her after I finished the image processing. The developing room wasn't too far but that wasn't the problem, I knew I said to myself that I wouldn't mix both work and my research but it would take only a few minutes, no one would know about it. Perhaps even more because of the time it took for the images to be ready, fortunately, I had some lecture to kill some time. I took the journal out of my bag and started going through random pages.

Of course, it was hard to see the words in the dark but I managed to do it fine. As fine as I could do it given the circumstances. I couldn't risk using the light and irreversibly damage the images, then again maybe it wasn't that bad, and it made me quite excited, trying to find out what's hidden in it, the hard way. Slightly whispering, so others couldn't hear me through the wall and door I started.

‘June 15, 1820, I can't believe I finally met him, someone who's just like me, kindly hearted and caring. He's a travelling merchant and ever since we stared into each other's eyes, I couldn't stop thinking about him and his fleeing braids. I always wanted to leave this town and explore the rest of the world and this is the perfect opportunity.

Convincing him won't be an easy task but I'm sure I'll be able to make him help me. I hope that my next entry here will be about both of us leaving town happily ever after, like they always do in fairy tales. Well, see you soon upcoming blooming me, I hope everything will end up well, for one of us anyway. ‘I stopped for a second, not knowing who she was, except what Jon told me, and I had a bad feeling about how her journal might end.

Despite that I had to do it, it was for my research, even if it meant intruding into someone else's thoughts.

Everything I did was justified, and no one had the right to tell me otherwise. A few pages skipped, maybe days of her life to the point of:

‘Ten days passed since he left. I'm still heartbroken; I don't know what got into him to run away like that. Grandma told me it will pass, but I can't stop crying, he can't, he isn't that type of a person, to run away without saying a word or not even a goodbye. I wish he'd come back, my life wouldn't be the same without him; nothing can fill that spot his absence left. ‘At this point, I won't find anything relevant about the town, but in a way, I found her story interesting as if I'm unfolding someone's life before me.

One thing is strange, how come a stranger managed to leave such an impact on her? Ten days passed and she's acting as if she's mourning his death. There's something off about this journal. Bah. I'm probably over thinking it to be more than it looks, it's probably just a normal journal. The memoir got back to my backpack and it would seem like the pictures were almost done too. I managed to use one of the solutions there to dry up the pictures and they looked fantastic, even if I haven't done much, I've really outdone myself. When I got out, Carla and Ken were the only ones left, chit chatting before getting ready to close.

‘Hey, Carla, Ken. I'm done with them. ‘I showed them the pictures and they were pleased to see them.

'It's not bad; these should go well with the article. Don't worry, it's done. '

'I'll take care of these and the article.

The new edition should be done in mere minutes. 'Ken took both the article and the pictures; they were the last ones to be inserted into the machine since everyone else left. And quite the machine it was as it looked like something which came out of someone's dreams. More than often it gave me the impression that if it was alive, twisting its gears, eating what we've been feeding it in exchange of what we desire, a good newspaper. It felt like, in a way it tried communicating with me. The fear of seeing it drown in its own ink sometimes made me quiver.

Anyway, nothing smelled better than the merely printed newspapers done by three hard working people, or, at least, one of them who just happens to be me. I could see from their faces that both of them were exhausted and not in the mood to talk. We waited for Ken to be done with his work so we could finally leave. Just a few more and I'll be off, I went in to check every room so no light would be left on and none was. I was swift, managing to fly through three of the rooms in mere seconds, beating my own past record too. As soon as it was over, he closed the machine, placing it to sleep and went out to close the office. The rain hasn't settled down, but I didn't live too far and the rain wasn't too dense. We all said our goodbyes and went on our lonely separate ways. Quite a bad omen when it rains, that's what I've always thought. I hope they'll get home safe, or, at least, her. Time to go back home before I get wet. While walking, I couldn't help but notice how peaceful and quiet it felt all around me, the calm before a storm. So I started walking faster until I managed to outrun the few rain drops that were trying to soak me and so I would manage to get home before the storm started. Home sweet home, not too far from my job, not that big either but I still managed to stay warm in it. It still beats living on the streets any day. The key made awful sounds when entering the hole, which I thought would be another problem to fix on my never ending bucket list. Perhaps it was time to call a professional to fix it before it got even worse.

My stomach also accompanied the chorus made of key noises, rain drops and my second gut. With all the running around from the workplace, I had nothing to eat. After coming in I threw my coat and boots in a corner, not even bothering to unite them and went directly to the kitchen. I felt like a predator stalking its prey and luckily for me there was an unfinished salad waiting there. It took me a mouth full to finish it but I can't complain since it managed to satisfy my hunger for the moment. I finished it all with a glass of pure water before leaving the dishes in the sink. It was time to go on from where I left on the journal. It was so quiet that I could hear the rain drops bounce on the ground. The sound of it brought some bitter but also sweet memories. First, the door had to be sealed tightly, with all three of the locks being closed; I didn't want to be disturbed by anybody or anything. Not that I was being paranoid. Now, what was the last chapter I've read? I opened my backpack after being thrown on the ground, strange, I didn't notice it go down with my coat. That wasn't important; I took out the journal and used the light from my desk to see where I was.

'Jon's mother was abandoned by that scoundrel. ' I thought about it for a moment before going on. It couldn't have been anyone other than him.

But it was time for me to ignore that and venture even deeper into her mind.

'June 30' No year was written down, quite peculiar.

'I can't believe he came back, he came back to apologize, he told me that it was wrong for him to try and leave me.

He told me he fell in love with me. I don't know what to do, if he truly loved me he wouldn't have left me in the first place. What made him decide to come back and why now? I'm still confused about my feelings, I don't know if I love him anymore. I'm afraid he might try running away from home again. I wish I could talk to you but that's not going to work is it? None of them knows, none of them seems to know what I'm planning to do. My choices are limited and I feel like I won't be able to do it alone. I have to take my chances with Jonathan. 'Either John knows something that I don't; perhaps he was named after his father. But so far, I haven't encountered anything strange, except his family, I swear I saw something written in another language or, it must be here, somewhere.

'30 December 1821, Jonathan just asked for my hand. I don't know why he didn't ask for more, I would have given him more. I can't believe how much he changed over this past year. He might have made me one of the happiest women alive, or at least, that's what I wanted to feel like. Not being able to refuse him because all of the love I had in store for him, there was no doubt about, but things changed, the others citizens and my family forbid me from ever getting close to the town exit. I was.

We were being held as prisoners and it took me way too long to find it out. My plans were slowly dying, the world outside should have been in my grasp but now it's beyond my reach, I lost my opportunity. Jon made me happy but what was the point of that if I had no freedom? 'Before I could turn the page, I got distracted. I thought I heard something coming from outside, something other than the rain. A faint noise sounded familiar for some reason as it started getting louder. I laid the book down on the desk and started walking slowly towards the door, closer to where the sound came from.

Curiosity started going down as the sounds started resembling growls. With each step I've made, I felt like I was getting closer to my demise. Deep inside I thought I knew what it was but I couldn't just run and hide, I wasn't a coward anymore, not like I was back then. The door was still locked tight, and unsealing the locks made a lot of noise. I quickly opened the first two of them, the third one felt more like a signature, even more, ink towards my last will, even though I had nothing to offer. The lock wasn't holding the door anymore. My breath slowed down, close to feeling nauseous, but I still managed to grab the doorknob with both of my hands and asked myself, what could reside behind that door? Did it come back to finish the job? A lamp sat on a drawer next to me. I grabbed it with one of my hands so I could use it as a weapon. What chance did I stand against it on a close encounter, especially since I knew almost nothing about it? I can still remember that night and what that monster can do. The chances of me getting away after a confrontation with it and still being alive were slim. My hands were shaking, it couldn't be fear what I felt, could it? This was not the time for me to say my last words, not that they mattered anyway. There was no one that could hear them, at least no one around. The door was slammed, splashing the rain water all around, with the lamp in my hand, as I looked around to see nothing. A few more looks followed and still, nothing was out there. I closed the door after walking back inside and put the lamp back to its place. Maybe it was just my imagination. Perhaps with everything going on in my life, I have truly lost my mind. But I knew I heard something out there, my senses wouldn't betray me like that. I had to take a break and breathe so I wouldn't fall down but the noises started again, this time coming from inside the house. I had to grab something else to defend myself, my body was trembling but at least, I was able to think somewhat calmly, a lamp wasn't going to help me this time, that's why I placed it back in its original location. The kitchen was the solution, I got closer and grabbed a kitchen knife, nothing was near me, and so the sounds must have come from upstairs. It was going to happen all over again. Stepping on each stair felt like I was barefoot, walking on glass shards, it was painful and close to getting even worse. My heart was about to jump out of my chest, until I got there, to the second floor. I never thought about it, but it almost resembled entirely to the same level from the attic. There was no time for remembering, not if my life was at stake. Four rooms, left and right, it must be in one of them, it's silent, probably waiting for me. Holding the knife in my right hand, I opened the door on my right, hoping I would get the upper hand, but nothing inside. A quick look around, it was too big, most likely, to even be able to hide under the bed, but I had to be sure, I approached it and bent over the floor so I could see what's there. Afraid, I looked down under and saw only dust, there was no time to think about cleaning it, the sounds manifested again, not too far, it could be in the corridor. Sidestepping got me closer to the open door, I had my guard up but it wasn't there, just three more rooms left. The next one I went in was the opposite room, I was no coward, I said to myself and with a swoop it was open in an instance, but, just as before, nothing inside or under the beds.

The last two doors, I came back and felt like being at a crossroad between life and death. That mere thought sent a chill down my spine for some reason. I couldn't wait like that, for my life to end, I opened the first one, not there, and it could only mean that the monster was in the last room. I started having second thoughts as it might have been or not a thief. The growls it made were so clear but where did it come and how did it enter the house? A headache wasn't enough to stop me, especially when I was in danger to lose my own life. I tried ignoring them and opened the door, entering the room with all of them behind. No, no, no, this couldn't be, the room was as empty as the others but the window was open, the wind made it even colder. I closed it and got out of the way, maybe it was only my mind playing tricks on me, and not taking any break as I got dizzy. I lay on the floor, too tired and weak to defend myself and the knife dropped out of my hand as I closed my eyes. Before falling to sleep, I swear I heard it again growling. I was afraid of not making through the night. The circumstances almost repeated themselves and, this time, I feared that the worst might happen. There was nothing I could do but fall peacefully to sleep. Everything fell deeply into a sea of confusion right after my eyes got sealed tight. I was standing in front of a big table, filled with so many strange round shapes carved into the wood, a sign over each of them, a counter too with a swirly lever, with enough places for someone to place something on it. A few coins on the table waited for someone to use them, yet another set of strange symbols onto them with meanings that I did not understand. I wasn't alone either, at the end of the table stood an old lady who must've been the dealer, she had another smaller table near her, going through other strange symbols too. Her hands were brittle and her sight felt like it could deceive me. Near her, there were two other people, a woman, tall but short, dressed in black and blooming with sorrow. She kept staring at a card that lay in her hand, almost ready to burst into tears. There was a faint light reflected on her card but there wasn't any source of light coming from anywhere. On the other side, there was a young man with his back turned, I thought I recognized him from somewhere but I couldn't place my finger on it. Covered in shadows, he kept his right hand on the left one, holding a strange sphere like object with a card stuck in-between. He didn't look any brighter either. 'Last one for this night, it would seem like it's your turn precursor, pick three coins. 'Her voice surprised me as I wasn't used to talking to people in my dreams, let alone take orders from them. Not to mention how the lemony aroma surrounding us made me stay in my place. Something compelled me to play this game. A feeling of closure of some sort but I didn't know why.

‘Oh, I'm sorry, right away. ‘I did as she pleased and took three of the coins laying on the table without knowing what they meant, on them, the images of a blindfolded woman, a broken chest and a scarred child laid forth.

‘What now?’ I asked her, still not sure of myself. Still not sure if my decision was right. She pointed towards the part of the table where the symbols laid and told me to place the coins on three adjacent spots towards my heart inspire. As she said, so did I comply again, placing them on three random spots and I still didn't know.

‘What does any of these mean?’

‘It's easy my dear, it's your turn to turn the lever, have you not played the game before?’ She giggled even before I responded her. Reluctantly I said no, before I turned the lever around, twisting it with grace. The three coins I place shaped themselves into cards right in front of my eyes, but I couldn't see the images engraved on them. I didn't know why they were so blurred out but there was something behind all that dust and mist.

‘Go ahead and place them on the upper half of the counter and turn the lever again, I don't have all day.’ ‘I'm sorry; I still don't see the point of it.’

‘Just do it so we can all go.’ A grim tone came from behind the man before going silent. If I didn't know any better I would have thought that it came from something else than a human being. Throughout this whole session, she never loses eye contact with me; at least, if what the young man said was true, I could escape her unnerving stare. I started placing those cards, one by one when, before placing the last one, next to the others as I wanted to, something inside me told me not to do it. Instead, I had to place it one at the top of each other, before going on and turning the lever. Those cards merged together into a small deck of cards after doing so. The old woman was so excited to announce a winner, making the woman standing next to her even sadder for an unknown reason.

‘Yes, finally we got a winner, congratulations for getting an entire day at the festival during the day of the dead. ‘It took me a while to get it, but they both held cards, I was the only one who had a deck, yet I still didn't get it. Have I cheated? Did I deserve the visit?

‘No, you know what, you can give the visit to her, and I've got other things to take care off anyway.’

‘Well if you're so sure about it, don't forget, no take backs.’

‘Don't worry, I won't!’ The woman stopped crying before turning towards me. I wasn't able to see her that well before blacking out, just a small pearl necklace. There's no way for me to describe how I felt during the rest of the night since I'm not entirely sure myself, but if I had to describe it, the rest felt like a dark void. I returned back to not being able to see or feel anything, I can't feel like I'm touching the ground anymore, falling, floating or even if I had a body. Time became meaningless for a while, the moment I had consciousness, the sooner the next day began as if nothing happened. The morning came, or maybe it was passed noon, the light came from above me; I was still alive I guessed, with a big knife lying next to me. I didn't remember it being so close to me, ugh and my head felt like it was going to burst in any second now. It must have been a crazy night. Thankfully I don't have to work this day so I could resume my other work. Right after I eat and place this back to its place. Before resuming my daily activities, I checked every room again so I would be sure of it. A proper investigation was in order for me to find out what truly happened. But I won't be able to do it alone, at least not with an empty stomach. The kitchen and the rest of the room were untouched. It didn't come from the front door then, also, I believe I forgot to turn off the light on the desk. I turned it off before taking two eggs from the basket; I started the fire and broke them off the frying pan, not too shabby I'd say. It went too smooth; enough that I didn't even need to add the oil. After looking at it, I was glad I didn't get to, from some odd reason, its color changed to white as it went stale. I enjoyed the rest of my meal on a plate with two slices from a loaf of bread; luckily I've already had the knife near me so slicing them was easy. While eating, I couldn't help myself but think about what happened last night unless Carla decides to come early to sniff around and disturb my investigation. Come to think of it, she's my friend and I'm being too hard on her sometimes. Maybe I should tell her I'm sorry. Out of the corner of my eye, I was able to see something or someone. Perhaps I was even hungrier than I thought if I started seeing things. I ate as quickly as possible, too troubled to want more made me stop from doing so. Perhaps it was time to go back there and search for anything that could help me, the only clue I was aware of was the open window, but harder cases have been solved over fewer clues so I can't complain. Before going back upstairs, I took a look at the front door, supposedly the monster tried coming through the main entrance and since it failed, it tried coming in through the window, on the other side. I don't remember placing a chair in front of the door, with a swipe I threw it away and kept searching for clues. First I start seeing things and now I this? Something is definitely not right with me. I will seek help after I find out the truth. If it really came, there must be footprints or paw prints, even scratches around. The door wasn't locked so I had no problem going outside to check, but there was no mark on the ground, the rain must have covered any trace, the sun was beating my eyes directly, I wasn't able to stand too much outside for that reason. On my way back in and towards the room where it might have happened, I started doubting myself, except hearing noises there was nothing that I could hold as proof of the encounter. Before checking in, I entered the room and changed my clothes, I should have done that as the first thing after waking up, even with my hunger. Anything from the closet would suffice. I took the first suit and tie I saw, throwing it at me while dismissing my other clothes on the bed. Then I thought what if Carla came and saw that mess? I turned around to get them, that's when I saw the window again, the same one that was open last night. Just as I thought, it had scratch marks all over its frame. As I tried feeling it, I got a splinter almost cut a decent part of finger right as I went through it. How did I manage to miss that? It felt refreshing knowing that I didn't go insane. Far from being happy though as the thought of it being real brought a burning sensation inside. If there really was a monster, the same one from ten years ago, the other citizens must have seen or heard about it, where could I start looking and asking though? Most of the shops were closed yesterday so I doubt there was even one out there that didn't follow the rest. Except the town tavern might have kept open, it's not possible that the same events that happened before repeated themselves, right? I got out and closed the door behind me, I had to know, and I can't stand that monster taking, even more, people. I splashed the puddles below my boots, too concerned for them that I didn't care; I couldn't care about anything else. On the middle of the road I stopped and asked myself, why would I go there? I'm sure they're fine and nothing happened to them, they couldn't have kept it open. No, I refuse to believe that history will repeat itself. I don't know with whom should I speak, except. The wind threw a small rose petal in front of me, I couldn't tell if it was a sign but Darya came to mind, she works at her father's flower store, maybe she saw something when she was out, and it's worth a shot. Disregarding my previous plan, I started walking to her store; I really hoped it was open. Most of the stores in this town kept a tight schedule but hers wasn't like the rest. The sun settled down now, it wasn't hurting my eyes as it once did, hard to believe it only took minutes. On my way there I met Alex but I didn't have enough time to talk to him, it seemed like we never had.

'Hi, Alex, strange meeting you so early, by any chance, have you seen?' He couldn't talk to me either before passing me, he managed to say:

'I can't talk, got people to help, bye. 'I didn't manage to tell him goodbye and he could have been more, well mannered. I couldn't be mad at him, not when I was so close to uncovering the truth. I was at the store and it was open, now it was, the moment of truth, I entered it and said:

'Hello Darya, is your father here?' She smiled at me and nodded her head, I couldn't ask her what she saw but, on the other hand, I could ask him.

'Can I see your father Darya? It's really important. 'She nodded her head again but as a sign of refusal. Beyond that, Darya started looking around for something. I had to keep it simple. I never took the time to learn the sign language but I had other ways of speaking with her. They closed earlier last night so there must have been a reason for that. But she couldn't try to describe the whole day, unless she had something to do it with.

'Darya, do you have something to write on?' She started looking at the counter and under the flower pots but didn't show me anything. After that, she went back to the room behind her and vanished in there. I hope she had a hidden ace somewhere around there. I had no other options to communicate with her. So I waited and after a couple of seconds, she came back with a pen and some paper. Now, same as before, I wouldn't want to pressure her, even with her paper.

'Thanks for helping me, I really appreciate it. Now, have you seen anything yesterday? Anything unexplainable?

'She started writing on the paper for some time, right before handing it over to me, it read:

'I haven't seen anything unusual, my father told me to close it early but I couldn't figure why. 'In the paper, she also asked me if I was feeling all right but I chose not to read that part out loud. Instead, I told her:

'Thanks for asking me but if I was feeling bad, I would have told you. 'I gave her the pages back and noticed the uneasiness on her face as if she didn't eat my lie. It didn't take her long to finish and through it, she told me that I looked agitated but that wasn't all, she did want to help me because we're friends. I didn't think she would believe me even if I told her. After all, even Jon dismissed me and most likely thought I should be sent to the asylum.

'I can't really tell you, for your own protection, but please, if your father saw or heard anything; could you ask him to see me? It's at an utmost importance!' After taking the paper back again, she didn't write anything in the first few seconds. But after that, she decided to help me. As she did it, though, she tried looking away, concerned about something. She wrote down, why don't you go and ask him yourself? He got up early and went to the local market to buy some fruits. A long shot but if I was fast enough, I could catch up to him.

'Thank you, I'll see you later. 'I told her before dashing out of the store, almost hitting one of the clients who tried entering it. There was no time for me to apologize to the scruffy man. I had to be fast if I wanted to get to the market in the Spring Street in less than twenty minutes. It was far safer than using a carriage with all these accidents happening lately. After all, of this is over, I should buy her a gift. She really did bring me a lot of help and this isn't the only time she did so. I can still remember, a couple of years ago, when I was still trying to get used to this town. I was running errands and I fell right in front of her father's store, with both of my legs broken and in pain. At the time, I don't think she decided if she would take it not the family business, the think is that, even if we didn't know each other that well, she was the first and only one to come to my aid, before calling a doctor. She wasn't able to call him but that didn't make her back down for the task. Darya searched everywhere until she found the doctor and brought him to me. That's her, always trying her best to help me and never asking anything in return. She's so different than anyone I've ever met, leaving me nothing but guilt for not repaying her enough. Despite that, she keeps being kind, making me feel bad and good at the same time. I wish I could say the same about the rest of the people from this town, but a lot of them wouldn't even bother to acknowledge my existence. Sometimes, I even wonder if they're worth saving, or being thought about. In the end it wasn't that bad, I had my leg sealed up for a week, and got to see her almost on a daily basis, in a way I was glad it happened. The market wasn't too far, just in time, I thought, mister Rimershot shouldn't be that far. He must have known something that his daughter didn't, why else would he close his store right before a monster attack? I need to try to find him, he's too important to let him slip through my fingers. Another chill went through my spine, this time, it got worse. There wasn't any reason for it to come and go like that. I had no time to think about it, not anymore; as I reached the place and realized that it wasn't going to be an easy task. It was full of people browsing through the stands for fruits and vegetables, from left to right, or maybe it was from right to left, I always got that confused. Rim could be anywhere here unless he finished and left back home, I had to appeal to one of the vendors if I wanted to catch him, luckily I knew a local from the inside. And I knew just the one, he used to be a farmer, Cervantes and, not to mention that he worked here for some time, he also knew what Rim looked like, and I got close to his stand and pretended to be interested in what he sold.

'Greetings Cervantes, that's a nice pair of. . 'I looked at his stand, trying to find the right fruit.

'Apples'

'Oh yeah, welcome, they are nice indeed, would you be interested in buying my apples? 'Not yet, I came for something else and I had no time to waste.

'Maybe later, have you seen, by any chance, Rimershot? You know the old man with a tiny bald spot on dressing like a pilgrim? '

'I don't know, it would seem like my memory is in a mint, perhaps buying something would refresh my memory, wouldn't you say?

'Getting blackmailed by a fruit vendor, that's the Cervantes I knew, I couldn't waste more time asking other so:

'A fresh pair of apples, also I'd like to know, have you ever heard something unusual, or seen anything yesterday?

'Cervantes grinned before answering my questions and giving me a huge bag of apples.

'Well, now that you mention it, no, I haven't noticed anything strange yesterday; this will cost you some extra apples, though. And about the old man, I've seen him, he went deeper that way, probably trying to get some fresh products, now, don't you have somewhere to be? 'He pointed towards the deeper part of the market; I thanked him and paid him for the apples, even for the extra ones. Whilst going there, I couldn't stop but think about him hiding something from me, something else that the apples he sold me not being fresh. So far, after a few steps in and avoiding the crowd, I wasn't able to see any sign of that old fox, either he was covering his track or my senses dulled down. I had to even step off to take a deep breath and think it through. I could try asking other people if they saw him, but they looked too busy to be bothered, not to mention that taking every stand and shop would take too much time, I could even pass him by without ever knowing. Either way, I'm not doing anything by standing and talking to myself, perhaps it was time to take action. Then I saw Carla at one of the stands, buying and placing fruits in her basket. I was thinking about being saved by the bell, but that has already caused enough trouble. I decided to approach her, though:

'Hi Carla, strange meeting you here, isn't it? '

She almost jumped when she saw me, almost as if she's seen a ghost but still managed to respond firmly. 'Don't sneak like that; you almost gave me a heart attack. And where were you this morning? I wanted to call you so you could help me with my errands but you weren't there. '

'Well, I was busy dealing with some problems; I went to Darya to meet her father. . . Wait, it's not what you might be thinking. 'She smiled and laughed, most likely in a mean way.

'I didn't really think about it that way until you mentioned it, but thanks for that, I really needed it, and it's been a lousy day so far. 'She really had a nice way of getting away with anything, mean or not. But I had to ask her about Rim and I did it.

'Have you seen Mister Rimershot by any chance? I've searched everywhere for him almost everywhere but I couldn't find him. 'She looked towards the other side of the town, the part from where I came and told me.

'You just missed him, he's most likely back to his house, and by the way, he was walking slowly, even for his time and date. '

I thanked her for all the help she gave me, even if it wasn't too much.

'I should really go now, but thanks for the help, though. I promise I will help you next time with whatever you want. See you around. 'She waved at me before I lost all sight of her, damn, right before I could ask her about what she's seen. I couldn't believe that all of this was a waste of time; I was going in circles, without finding anything. Those marks on my window might as well been from a wild animal, making me go on the hunt for nothing and maybe my imagination was just trying to spice up my dull life. At least, there was a good thing that came out of it, I have a bag of apples, and maybe they could even prove useful though I doubt it. I had to know, it's not like I had something else better to do to occupy my life with and I was already on my way there. Maybe this was a wake-up call, I could visit Mannorstare again if both me and my guts agreed on it, but why now after so many years? And how come it came in my mind after so long to even think about visiting the place? My life somewhat turned to normal, I even managed to tune down my obsession for it. I could ask for a couple of days off but I doubt the boss would accept that, plus, who could keep an eye on Carla and the others? I had to stop thinking about it for a while as I arrived back at the store, I thought, Rim should be inside. Opening the door triggered the sound of a bell that wasn't in its current place earlier when I came inside, how peculiar.

'Hello Darya. ' I took a second to catch my breath after walking for so much time. Not only that my feet were sore but it wasn't long until they'd also start bleeding from the looks of it.

'Sorry for that, I should stop apologizing to everything but I meant it this time. I couldn't find your father but I thought he might have come back, is he here right now? 'She nodded her head, so I was right. There was a blank expression on her face as she saw the bag I was holding but I didn't know why. I didn't want to trade the bag of apples that I bought just to get her father's whereabouts. Yet I had to meet her father at all costs. The thought of it amused me, as it was bought and about to be given for the same reason. 'Well you got me again Darya; these apples are indeed for you. 'I gave them to her and managed to steal another one of her smiles, second one from this day. This one was slightly different, uneasy, forced. It didn't matter how it felt, I was still glad she did it. Her small paper came out again as she started writing prematurely. She thanked me for the apples though it was slightly shaking. Except that, she did ask me if she should bring her father, to which I responded:

'Sure, I'll just wait here. ' Darya turned around and went into the room behind her, probably ready to honor my request to meet her father. I could buy one of these pots one day but I'm not the type who likes keeping flowers around. My expectations weren't at an all time end high. I thought I wasn't going to learn anything new, just like before when I thought I was getting closer to the faint line of truth but it turned out to be nothing. I deserved to feel release and not to remember something, every day that may or may nor even be true. What could it be taking her so much? She needs only to bring her father to me. Moments passed and he finally arrived, took him some time but I could sense that he was ready to see me face to face, like two puppets in a show. Something felt too odd about that thought. As expected, he made the first move, Rim looked deeply into my eyes, and he could probably see that I was forcing myself not to blink so I wouldn't miss anything. Mr. Rimershot took a deep breath and said to me:

'We need to speak to you in private, follow me. 'I closed my eyes in relief, from all of the pain I've felt and followed him beyond the counter, into the backroom. On my way, I passed Darya who just arrived at the front of the counter. She didn't pay any more attention to us as we were both on our way. You could barely distinguish the door from a wall, other people would call this room hidden, and I wonder what reason behind it was. Exactly what I assumed, on the other side it was just a big room filled with empty pots and other plants being ready for deployment. The whole setup looked odd, some of the pots were cracked, the light bulb was either broken too or it didn't have enough power to make everything from inside the room visible. And there he was, Rim stood on a barrel, probably even full of fish from the looks of it. In front of us, there was a small table with an empty seat waiting for me to get on. I could see that behind him there was another door, most likely leading to his home, enough milking around. I had to accept his open invitation and take a seat. The only hope I had is that he didn't notice me looking around where I didn't belong but I had to do it, not many people probably even got the prestige of getting invited in, so I could make the best of it. 'You probably know why I'm here and if you don't I'll be blunt with you in a moment. I don't care if you believe me or not, if you think I'm a lunatic, or delusional, crazy or whatever else I could be called but trust me, I have seen it first hand, a long time ago and I almost got to see it again yesterday. I'm looking straight into your eyes and I can see that you're unmoved. Something tells me that you know what I'm talking about it so don't try to lie to me. Now, I don't know why you've never come to help me or even tell me everything is fine but now, now I only need some answers. All the resent I've held against you has long passed on. 'My eyes were almost red, I was doing my best not to start crying, not in front of other people, never in front of other people because no one believed I was saying the truth, and the thought of him being like the rest of them could crush me even more inside. In their eyes, I was just an orphan child that chose to run away from what was left of his family, who made a crazy story to explain the trauma he went through.

'I think we both know the truth Rim, please, I'm not prideful enough to admit my plea of help, and so, will you help me? I need only to know, nothing more, nothing less. 'He looked at me, knowing that he couldn't refuse. Sweat going down through his stuffy eyebrows, he knew or, at least, that's what I thought, about my history. But how much did he know compared to me? His lips were dry but it looked like he was going to move them after all, ready to bestow his knowledge upon me, maybe even making everything less painful.

'Look now, I want you to listen to me clearly because what I'm going to tell you is important so I'm not going to tell you twice, though. I know what you went through, even if know isn't the right word since I've never been part of such an event as yours; I've never lost so many people that I barely knew about but you were just a child. Maybe . . . maybe this has gone too far, too long, you deserve to know why it happened, but yes, the creature that you've encountered that night, the same one who came again to our town is just as real as you and me. 'I couldn't believe it but this was it, the marks, the journal, the notes, the night and the confession, I was happy, perhaps not so much, but at least relieved to know that I was right, though it was short lived since it wasn't everything. 'I can't tell you every detail, not only for your sake but for everyone else's sakes except. . . That, that night in the tavern, everyone in there was used as sacrifices, but the ritual was never completed. At least you're alive, you are, and the monster shouldn't come back for some time now. Now, I need you to promise that you won't go and tell anyone about our conversation, no one must know that we even met this day, understood? 'I stared at him after hearing everything but I was speechless, this didn't end up like I planned, not only that I've got a target on my back but I wasn't far from being treated as a stranger by Rim.

'I understood sir. But before I got and I won't, not until you answer me my questions, let's start with the beginning, how did you know about everything? And how come? 'I was topped by him after he slammed his hands on the small table as if our business was concluded. Before leaving the room, he did assure me that I won't ever be alone and I will be safe from now on. I was a different person when I got out of the room. Seeing Darya crying made me think that, perhaps I didn't change enough to not help a friend in need. I gave her a napkin from my pocket as a friendly gesture; we weren't so different after all. I didn't need it anymore so I left after that, with the light still in the sky, I had nothing but time to read my notes and the journal. Who knew, maybe other people from here knew too, maybe I could even organize a riot and drive the beast out of Mannorstare by the end of a torch or another. The entire world could find out what I uncovered. Not to get over my head yet, but with Rin's confession and the fact that I managed to live through it twice, the future didn't look as damned at least until our third encounter. On the way home, a variety of thoughts went through my head, something didn't add up. How come Rim decided to help me after all these years? And I was sure it wasn't because of the small speech I gave him, no matter how truthful it was. He acted like Jon did when I came to him; it couldn't be a coincidence for both of them to act up at all of the sudden. There's also the beast, it came into my house through the window, but it didn't end up doing anything except leave some scratch marks and almost give me a heart attack. I can't forget that Jon and his mother are involved with it directly. Nothing can surprise me anymore. Perhaps I'm missing, somehow a piece of this unfinished puzzle, which would make my entire progress pointless without it. This time, I've got faster to my house, a lot faster than before, it was the time to find out what was in that journal, but first. I closed the door behind me, feeling like I was a changed person when I entered it but not enough to not recognize the slamming sound of it behind me. After a quick search, the windows were closed and the rooms were empty. I didn't forget what Rim told me, but I wanted to be safe, just as a precaution. After that, I went to my desk to find that the journal was, fortunately, still there where I left it. Though I don't entirely remember ever taking it out of my backpack and placing it there, I had to get to the bottom of it before I would lose my mind. I wasn't sure what to do from there, either continue reading from where I left off, or just search for clues and patterns in her writing. Maybe even both if I had the time. Something strange came through my mind. What if the monster didn't come for me but for the journal? Luckily for me, it didn't get to catch any of us, I wouldn't expect anything less from a gutless snapper who confused me for a window. That's the least of my worries now, as I think I might be lead on a false track by something or someone. I keep getting distracted, what was I doing? Oh, the journal, getting lost in my own thoughts and theories can get troublesome at times. I opened it, finally deciding to check where I was left the last time, falling through her grace, in sadness and love, which leaves me on, here:

'10th April 1826 I know I haven't written in here for some time, for that I'm sorry. Four years passed since I'm with Jon, I really hoped that my life would change with him and it did. But not the way I thought it had. I thought the pain might go away but it didn't. I thought I could trust people but I can't. It keeps following me, hiding away but he can't escape the tail of my eye. 'The rest of the page was covered in something I couldn't describe, so I had to go to another one, still from the same date:

'So many things happened in the past five years, people have disappeared and no one even talks about them, no one is allowed to. In fear of what might come to stray me from my family, I tried fleeing the town with my daughter but I was captured and taken back there. 'I stopped there when I noticed that Jon had a sister. Who might've been alive by the time it happened. I couldn't stop there, I had to know more.

'I could finally see their true colors, this cursed place. I was no longer its citizen but its prisoner. And so was Jon now, all because of me. 'She mentions being a prisoner yet again but still. . . Not enough information, maybe if I'd skip to the last pages of the journal, then I could find something useful. I didn't have the time or the convenience of checking every page, even if I wanted. The last two pages had no date written on them and the writing got rougher. I couldn't stop myself from thinking that; these might have been her last thoughts, her last words she's written before she died. I had a suspicion of who she was but I couldn't be sure. What I was doing right here was important, people deserved to know what happened there and how dangerous the place is, they just had to know. The last pages of her memoir read exactly:

'It took me a while until I realized it was finally over, at least for me. This will most likely be the final entry in my journal, with my hopes that one day, anyone who would find it would also heed my warning. I loved my children and I would sacrifice anything to keep them safe, Jon, Elizabeth. 'Strange, the third name of the child was unreadable, almost sealed by the ink it was once written with.

'I know I wasn't there for them, to see them grow, to watch over them, to sing the same lullaby my mother used to do to me when I was a child. To tell them I didn't mean to do it, that I should have been more patient, more understanding. I tried my best but it wasn't enough. It took a lot of time for me to come to terms with myself and my decisions but I managed to do it. 'I had to stop once again, feeling nauseous from just reading it. That moment had a familiar feeling somehow but I couldn't tell why I felt like that. But the warning she left made no sense at all.

'The death of my loved one and my infant child bear towards the first of the sect. 'I had to figure out what it meant, but it was so hard to concentrate, so many thoughts flew through my head, what I've learned today almost overshadowed my past research and notes. I had to try calming myself down before going on. First thing, I had to deduce what she meant by the death of her loved one and the infant child, if it came to the dates they died, maybe even the way they passed on. . I started going page by page, looking at their every corner, trying my best to find anything mentioning any of their deaths. She never escaped, I doubt her husband did either, but somehow Jon escaped from there. It was getting even harder, trying to focus on both my ideas and the memoir. There was no time for slacking off; I quickly got back to work, trying to find what I wanted to know. Circling through pages didn't seem like it was going to be the most enjoyable activity. There wasn't any other way to do it; I knew what had to be done. Minutes passed and time dissipated as I checked for keywords on pages, she must have, definitely written something other about death or about how Jon escaped, somewhere around here. It's never easy with complicated puzzles, take one piece and you can never complete the whole image. There's also the part 'first of the sect', which I had no clue what it meant but it was related to, possibly two deaths. Come to think of it, Darya's father told me about that night when everyone was supposed to be used as sacrifices. But how come I was one of them? I haven't grown up there, I just happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time, but they weren't. No, they were kept in the town by the others, getting them ready to end up just like the people no one was supposed to talk about. A few knocks on the door interrupted me, right when I was getting closer to something. I made my way to the door, wondering who might be on the other side. It couldn't be. Rim wouldn't lie straight to my face. I was bold about it, I just opened it, my hand swept through all the locks like they were nothing, and there she was, Carla. As usual, she came to slow down any trace or progress I was trying to achieve; then again, it couldn't be helped.

'Greetings Carla, how may I help you? '

With the door barely open and my body motion blocking what could, or rather couldn't be seen inside. I stood tall, trying to hide the mess that occupied my home. I should have expected that she would try seeing what I was trying to hide. Lifting herself up her heels, trying to look left and right, only to have her moves copied by mine in order to block her visibility.

'So what are you hiding behind you back? '

She asked me, then I quickly responded with a false half made grin, 'Nothing, I'm just enjoying the. . . '

Nothing came to my mind as she stared right at me, piercing my very soul with her eyes. I'm usually a bad liar but this time, it wasn't even worth trying. She did notice though and played along:

'I'm glad you're enjoying it, but I was going to ask you if I may enter? I've got some good news that might include you too. '

She didn't even give me time to blink so I took the bait:

'I don't really feel like fighting you on these two open fronts, just give me a second to clean some things and I'll let you in.

'I didn't close the door in front of her, not wanting to be rude, instead I left it almost open, hoping she wouldn't come in yet.

'Fine, I will wait for some time, but don't take too long, it's important. Also, it's freezing out here.

'That was the voice I've heard from behind, when I made my way to the desk, pretending to clean some of the dust on it. I wasn't sure she was spying on me, but it had to be kept secret, I had to keep the journal away from her. I proceeded to place it in one of the drawers of the desk next to some old papers. It was a shame that I couldn't keep reading it undisturbed, but I could continue after she left. One step at a time, the dishes inside the sink were still dirty and unwashed. I couldn't let her see them and hear even more snarky remarks so I tried making a run for it and cover them with one of the small novelettes. It was only a mere sprint that left me at the middle point between the living room and the kitchen, that's when I stopped. The door was closed and in front me it Carla stood still, watching me do nothing, almost frozen, only being able to see her with the tail of my eye. There was no way for me to know how much she saw, but it was an awkward moment for both of us. Obviously I looked like a fool, acting childish for no other reason than not to embarrass myself, in which case, I failed. I turned towards her, trying to think of a good explanation, something other than the truth, instead, I asked her about what:

'Did you want to tell me? I shouldn't keep you waiting even more than you're supposed. '

'Stop right there, I don't care if you're trying to hide something or not, but changing the subject like that? ' I knew she would figure out what I was doing but the possibility of her not knowing what I was hiding was much greater. Getting her to be angrier was the easiest way to distract her, so I told her:

'Carla, how could I change the subject if we didn't even speak about anything? ' That response did make her give me a mean look, not in a hateful way, but the same one you'd give to a child after he's done something wrong.

'You know what I meant to say by that, so stop acting like a prick. Now, do you want to hear the good news or not? ' Carla used a more serious tone than before.

'Of course, I want to hear the good news; we could have a seat in the kitc. Or we could sit on the couch and tell me all about it. 'I pointed towards it and we both sat on the couch, as a sign of peace. As a sign of peace, I offered her a cup of tea that was soon denied just as it was asked of me. The couch was as red as my blood, even ticker, I could still remember when I first got it from a grand sale, wait, I had to listen to Carla, getting her even more mad would end up as a poor judgment call. Standing close to her made me feel strange, we've been friends for as long as I could remember, maybe just close acquaintances for some years, but I never took the time to stay and talk to her for no reason. I ignored the fact that she came here specifically to tell me something. Carla felt more than a friend to me, more like a sister, or even a cousin that has her entire purpose to make my entire life into a mess. Even then, even if it would be enough for me to call her on it, past both of our remarks and the times we made fun of each other, she remained close to me. She suddenly waved her hand in front of my eyes and asked me if I was:

'Okay? You've been staring at me for a while without saying anything as if you weren't even here with me when I was talking. .

'I really hated it when it happened, I should speak with my mouth instead of my mind more often, 'Sorry for that, I'm easily distracted by my own thoughts, in my own world, it can't really be helped. '

She rolled her eyes after hearing it, I thought she was used to it by now; probably it was different this time, 'It's fine, just forget I even asked if you're going to be so difficult about it. Now, after such a huge delay, I can finally tell you, it's about a new lead we can follow but before I tell, I want you to tell me if you're done with your problems so you could hear me out. 'I didn't know what she was up to and why it couldn't have waited another day or two, but I was about to find out, that's why I asked her:

'What is it, this time, Carla? I really hope it's not a rumor just like the last time because you know how that ended. 'She then replied to me, ready to start a whole debate on the subject, as if I was the one to be blamed for what happened.

‘What do you mean by how that ended? It was your fault in the first place that we got kicked out.’ Carla stopped there, even she probably knew that we won't get far by arguing about it, instead she kept telling me about it.

‘You know what? I've got a better idea, just shut up and listen because this time I know what I'm talking about. There are rumors, solid this time that a scoundrel might come tomorrow in our small town. . ’ ‘Sorry for the interruption Carla, but you know better than to chase a rumor, even if, what's so special about that scoundrel? I hope you're not going to tell me about another royalty coming again.

‘Carla scratched the back of her neck, most likely thinking that I smelled something fishy about it. Maybe it was a fish merchant, travelling from town to town, resupplying food stocks for those settlements without fishermen.

‘I can assure you that this time; my sources are relatively close to being sure about the scoundrel and his importance. ‘

I couldn't even comprehend what she was trying to tell me, she must have been hiding something from me, or taking us to another foul lead. I started questioning her even more:

‘Carla, I still don't understand why can't you tell me what's going on. Why can't you just say it out loud, what do you mean by his importance? What do you know about him? ’

Carla looked towards the door for a moment after I made her feel uneasy. I didn't want to make her leave but I had to know more about what she was trying to tell me. She turned her gaze back to me after and told me:

‘I can't specifically tell you who he is and what he sells, but it's important, for me at least. I should get going now; I've got other matters to take care off today. ‘She suddenly rose up from the couch, the excitement she once had turned into distress, as if she made a bad decision and felt guilty about it. I tried my best to stop her while trying to not offend her even more than she was.

‘Wait, Carla, is there something wrong? Did I ask something I wasn't supposed to? If that's the case, I'm truly sorry about it. Please, you barely came in here to tell me something important and then you started acting strangely after I asked you about it. ‘I obviously didn't make the situation any better, nor did I try making her feel uncomfortable on purpose. She told me one last thing before making her way out the door:

‘There's no problem, I know it's not your fault, I thought I could do this, tell you about it. . . but it's hard for a reason I couldn't explain to you, that you wouldn't understand anyway. I really hope you will understand, I promise that everything will become crystal clear, tomorrow when we meet him. . ’ After telling me that, she sprinted through the door without even looking back. I wouldn't make that good of a friend if I didn't follow in her path and try calming her down. On my way, I took both the keys and my coat and locked the house before trying to chase her. I was either too slow, or she was as fast as a cheetah since she was nowhere to be seen and I did look around, everywhere and couldn't see where she went. Where would she go? She's usually going back home after buying her groceries and spends a lot of time there, it's a big shot but I could be right about it. I started walking towards where she lived, the street was unclear, but the building wasn't far from where I lived, a small house to be called sweet home with a sweet strawberry scent on it. What was so important about that scoundrel that made him so important? I don't think I've ever seen her get so emotional about someone, especially if that someone would be just a merchant who's coming here for no more than, I'd say days at most. It's also so sudden, as she just came in to tell me about it after finding it. Then she freaked out and ran away, resenting me. After a few close calls that I managed to avoid and didn't trip on the rocks left on the street, I found myself in front of her house. I even stepped on some, luckily for me that I wasn't bare feet and didn't feel any pain. I had to make it quick, after all, I would make my way back home after, so I might as well do it fast and decisive. Her door looked taller than it used to be, which made me hesitate to knock on the door. As soon as I stopped myself from trying to do it, I realized that I didn't know what to tell her. She did say that she will explain everything one day later and maybe it was the right thing to do, overreacting and leaving my house. What's wrong with me? What if she's in pain and came to me seeking for help and I just drove her away like I always do? But I couldn't stop myself; I had to know who the mysterious merchant was. . . I didn't come here for nothing, but I couldn't stand in front of her without saying anything. I cared about what she felt, I wanted to act serious about her problems and at the same time there wasn't any excuse for my behavior, nor could I lie about it. Time passed, seconds turned into minutes and I was still trying to decide on what to do. I couldn't stop thinking about what she told me, analyzing it in my mind, tearing it, slowly into words, pieces, parts, even patterns. Maybe the right decision was to trust her; one day couldn't harm anyone, could it? I hated it, being forced to wait, every time she had a problem, she dragged me down to the ship, making me feel about it and, this time, it was even worse. Maybe I should go to a tavern later and try releasing all the extra stress someone keeps adding on to me, making me even madder than I am, waiting to blow all the rage stored inside. Either way, I couldn't wait any longer or I didn't feel like my current response to her would appeal so I started walking back home. All the way towards it felt longer than before when I went towards her house, but I didn't take any other look back at her, I couldn't do it anymore. My deepest wish was that I could be there for her. Especially now with everything I have learned. But I couldn't do it without her approval. Fits of anger came into my head as if I was possessed, dark images flashed in front of my eyes. Burning through them, after that I fell down, everything falling with me into darkness. One second it all felt cold and in the next one it felt like someone closed my access to the outside world. Everything felt strange, one moment I was outside, and then after a blink, I was in the middle of a dark room. I was tied up with what seemed to be some braided ropes, wrapping me from the neck to my feet, leaving just enough space to look around. How did I get here from there? I haven't dreamed in a long while so this couldn't be it, at least if I'd be able to move, it's all pointless. It didn't take long for me to be alarmed as frightening sounds came from everywhere around, someone was scratching metal with scythes, footsteps followed them not too late after, barely hearable at first but getting louder and louder. I started squirming all around, trying to loosen up the rope so I could try to escape, my desperate attempt didn't work at all, and I could feel it, something was coming. I continued twisting my body from right to left, at the same time I was also looking around, hoping that I could find something, anything that could help me escape but it was too dark. None of this can be real, it doesn't make any sense. Perhaps I have finally lost my mind. I'm being held in a straitjacket, that must be it, but it doesn't explain the frustrating sound that won't stop!

'It's all in my head, all in my head, and all in my head. Nothing can hurt me; nothing will hurt me, all in my head. 'I kept repeating that for a while and maybe I was right about it, the sound just stopped for a moment, but was it because of me? Could it be that I've lost my mind, that none of what happened in the past ten years, my entire life wasn't real? I didn't know what to think, what to say, how to deal with it, if only she was here, if only anyone was here with me, anyone at all. Before I could even finish my thought, the sound of a door opening broke the silence, not so far from where I was, I could see a shadowy figure of something approaching me. There was no explanation rather than me being dead and punished for some crime I've committed. I started hyperventilating as soon as I saw it; fear ran through my eyes and fled my body just to return soon after. I've recognized it, as it got closer to me I was able to see, this time, it was more than a glance. The disgusting creature, its body was almost as tall as mine. Its limbs were double of that, both in number and in length, with claws and paws alike, everything covered with scales, fur and more eyes than I could count, all of them staring menacingly at me. That thing slowly crawled towards me, wiggling what seemed to be two long scalpel tails with scattered eyes on them, flailing them up in the air. With the skin as red as, no, that wasn't the color of its skin, that must have been blood, and a lot of it. The head was hidden somewhere in that small hill-like beast, I wish I could pass out at this moment. I had no way out and no intention to find out what the rest of it looked like. After so many years, I couldn't believe it came back to finish the job it once started. My whole body was shaking, so did my mind, hoping that the creature was just a hallucination. I was so afraid to die that I would have traded my sanity instead. From under its body, two long worm-like appendages extended towards me. The creature stopped for a second, moving those horrendous things around my body. I couldn't even make a sound if I wanted to. Those limbs of the creature, they kept sweeping around the ropes and my body, trying to reach my head probably. They didn't look strong enough to hurt me, probably even sensitive. As soon as one of them came in reach, I mustered up my entire strength and took a bite out of it. With what I had left, I ripped some of the slimy skin off it, making the monster retract both of its appendages back under him and unleash a terrible screech that echoed throughout the small room we were in, maybe even farther. It was so loud that it almost made my ears bleed and fall off. Not to mention that I couldn't stand the mercury taste from my mouth it left me after biting it clean. The deafening noise stopped, just as I was ready to lose my hearing and the monster kept walking towards me again. This couldn't be happening, this was unreal. It kept coming closer until it wrapped a couple of its claw-like limbs around me. The ropes and its limbs made it even harder for me to breathe. I didn't know why it was doing that to me, why couldn't all just end? I felt like there wasn't much more left out of my life so I yelled at it.

'What do you want from me you tormenting freak? I've done nothing to wrong to you, why am I being judged like that?' I kept shouting at it, but it didn't respond at all, it just kept torturing me like a mindless grunt. I couldn't keep myself together as I started relentlessly crying and screaming over the pain caused by those crushing claws. Somehow they went through the ropes and punctured into my back, digging deeper and deeper. Screams of agony kept coming from me, followed by screams for help but no one could help or save me, there wasn't anyone there anymore. Something kept me alive and awake to the point where it stopped, with its claws close enough to my vital organs, the pain and the blood that came out of them was unexplainable. My voice was the first one to die out, but the pain kept on kicking in, the shaking room followed soon after, and I couldn't figure it out. Everything started going even darker than it was before, but before the light in my eyes perished. I felt the greatest pain I have ever felt in my entire life, as that abomination of nature ripped out my entire body with its limbs from inside. I thought this was going to be the last time I closed my eyes, but after a blink, I fell on the ground. My whole body went into a convulsion; I couldn't control any muscle or part of my body, even my head started moving on its own like it was trying to snap my neck. I didn't know what happened, nor why there wasn't anyone around but I was back on the street, shaking on the ground like a scared mouse. Regaining the control over my body took some minutes, after what I could only describe to be a panic attack, I managed to drag myself and support on the nearest wall, confused, scared and all alone. I didn't know if I could trust my senses anymore, I looked around without knowing if it was real or not, but I was alive. Inhaling and exhaling are the only things I could be doing without the interruption of my own thoughts, which I did. My vision was still blurry, and I didn't believe it might ever come back, but as long as the pain was over and I wasn't going to see it anymore, I could manage to recover. All lies, trying to make myself feel better and sane, to explain the unexplainable, I couldn't even return home for fear that it might come again after me; it must know where I live. The same thing scrambled my head and messed up my sense. I opened my mouth and yelled for help:

‘Anybody, I need help. . . I'm begging you, if you can hear me. ’ And I waited, desperately for someone to answer my plea. So I stood there and sobbed for, I don't know how much time, but still no one came, no one must have even heard it, just like it happened before when I was trapped there with that monster. . . Even trying to think about what happened there gave me terrible headaches, the more I thought, the more painful it got. Slowly I tried lifting myself up, I couldn't wait for help to find me; I had to search for it myself. Going back home wasn't a valid choice anymore; I couldn't live alone, not anymore, not after all of this. After a few attempts and a couple of failures which resulted in me falling back on the ground, feeling like my bones were brittle as they touched the cold stone. Each attempt made me want to give up and curl into a ball just to feel safe. I still couldn't do it, but I couldn't give up either. The pain, even if it wasn't that bad, it started coming back, just like before, I didn't want to think that I was still there and just imagining that I escaped, but it felt like it. When I got up on my feet, I still couldn't see that well, everything was wrong. It wasn't that my eyes were blurry, but a thick fog got all around me. It took me long enough to realize it, looking at my hands and seeing them as clear as before meant that everything else got lost in the mist. The same mist that one would encounter from somewhere up high, it didn't make any sense for it to be here. I wasn't able to see anything inside it except myself, nor could I hear anything but the wind, no one around to make step noises. The nightmare wasn't over yet though I wish it was, I would give anything to end it. The mist could be toxic, I wasn't going to take any deep breaths in it, and perhaps it was time to find out where I am and if there are other people with me. Weighing my alternatives gave me less than a few options to go on, I could wait exactly where I was, stray from there or move alongside the wall. It certainly seemed like a good idea to choose the wall, at least if I managed to keep my hand on it, I couldn't get lost. Keeping quiet for the time being, if everything I've experienced before actually did happen and somehow I've received a second chance to survive also sounded like a good plan, after all, it could have followed me here. I really hoped it didn't, I did shout for help earlier and it could have heard me, leading it straight towards where I was. While grabbing what was left of my body and sanity, I started walking farther away, hoping to find somebody. My whole situation got even more peculiar after I touched the wall, the feel of cold stone turned into what I thought to be flesh and pores. I quickly took my hand off and got closer to examine the anomaly, past the blur and the mist, the wall seemed to be assimilated, absorbed by this strange organ. After I got closer I could see antennas popping out of the skin, long and pointy and very much alive. One thing was made clear; I wasn't in my town anymore, unless this strange thing swallowed it. This couldn't be it; even my plan wasn't an alternative anymore since I wasn't going to touch it, not any longer. There had to be another way to do it, there wasn't any other choice, I took a look at my coat and started pulling, hard enough to rip off a huge chunk of it that I used to wrap around my hand. A whisper came from my lips: 'Here goes nothing', as quiet as possible before touching what used to be the wall. I resumed my walk, still being disturbed by everything, just walking without feeling the need of hunger nor thirst, even the pain went away after a while, probably followed in their path. Without any means to know the time, not even a clock, I wasn't sure how much time has passed, could have been minutes up to hours but I could feel it, getting even sicker of walking. What was the point of it? I couldn't see much in front of me. I couldn't hear anything. I couldn't even know if any progress was made at all. A few more steps and I stopped my perpetual motion to shout. With enough power to permanently damage my vocal cords to the point of no return.

'I give up you bastard, you did it, you finally got me! Come and face me you spineless gutter, just finish it!' I couldn't take it anymore so I gave up, this torture was too much to take, first the pain, now this. After laying my head on the fleshy wall, it struck me, I could see everything clearer than before, so far I tried walking in a straight line for who knows how long believing it's the right choice, but what if I strayed off the road? I looked up hoping I could see the sky but the mist was there too, the mist was everywhere. I could have tried running aimlessly, without taking any direction and trying to put my trust of my instincts and senses once again. This place started getting to my head, or maybe it was vice versa. Either way, I wasn't going to spend more time in it. I wasn't planning an attack on my sanity so I started with a sprint that somehow became a full pledged flight like rush, straight into the unseen. It was a miracle that I didn't manage to trip and fall down, especially since I was clumsy, so I kept running whilst having a strange sensation, like a Déjà vu. With each step I laid upon the ground, the next one become even more violent, pushing my limits, almost crushing my bones, everything that would probably be for nothing. Being headed towards nothing but more mist. How did I get here? I kept asking myself, I couldn't remember what happened after I visited Carla. I tried to remember but it was all blank, it was in a blink of an eye that I found myself here. I was so distracted by my own dilemma that I didn't manage to see it in time. The mist made enough space for a wall to appear in front of me, a wall in which I ran into and managed to knock myself down. Both of my eyes got closed because of the impact. I was so afraid that I might suffer a head trauma from it that I hesitated to open my eyes for a second. After opening them, I found myself standing in my chair, back in my house, almost as if I awoke from a dream. Something inside told me not to question what happened or how I got back, but to be thankful that I was still alive and safe in my home. I couldn't believe it was over unless it was just a replica of my real house created by a higher force that wanted to mess with me. I wouldn't mind the company if it wasn't so inhumane. Two basic scenarios ran through my head, the first one being that I was somehow blessed to escape that endless run and the second one, that I wasn't home yet. I could be wrong in both cases and I could have dreamed about it if it wasn't for how real it felt like. There wasn't any hurry anymore, dream or reality; at last, I could rest in my chair without being forced to touch anything or to run away. With all the fuss in my head, I didn't notice but now that I was placed straight in front of the entrance. Am I waiting for someone? I thought to myself, right before hearing two loud knocks on it. Only two of them, though? I thought there would, at least, be three of them. Quite strange they came right after I thought of it. I should keep that in mind in case it wasn't over yet. The knocks got louder and happened more often before I decided to walk towards the gate. Some sounds were present too from upstairs. That didn't bother me, I was too compelled to go and open the door. I felt heavier on my feet, at least until the moment I got there and opened the door. For Carla? She was staring at me from outside. The whole time slowed down between us and the bright light that came behind her, slowly enveloping everything behind her, then her entire body, with her face and eyes looking towards me for one last time before dissipating into the light. Shortly after the light made its way into the house, everything in sight was about to get devoured by it. I looked behind me to see a broken window with nothing but darkness in it. Distracted by the image inside it, I didn't resist the light as it covered my whole body. I didn't feel the need to run, I didn't feel anything, just floating in a white sky without feeling sadness anymore, but it all had to end as the light turned into darkness once again. Everything I've done so far lead me to a sad conclusion and at the same time. Neither fate nor the destiny decided to ever give me closure. Instead, they decided to cooperate upon the utter eradication of every aspect of my life. I could remember simpler times, long before what happened now but not enough for me to forget where it started, I kept thinking about him.

Bartholomew, the man who took me as if I was his own child, the same one who took care of me after leaving my real parents. I promised to myself that I wouldn't even mention his name, but this might be my final hour. The simple memory of him, even a mention could bring me joy. If my memory serves me right, it was just after the counter with that thing, days passed and I was still in shock, so shocked that I wouldn't talk to anyone after. I could still remember how I was so ashamed of my decision, leaving my home to follow a stupid dream. Not being brave enough to help. Not daring to return back to my family. To my caring mother who was full of grief because of her loss. To my father, who would've given me a good beating for being reckless. But most of all to both of them, because, disregarding everything else, they were still my parents and I loved them. So much time passed between then and now. I'm not even able to remember what they looked like. I wish I knew what happened to them, if they're still alive, even if they think about me as I think about them. How could I have been so afraid and stupid back then? I ran away from my problems for so many times during my entire life that it's hard to think that's going to end the same way it all started once. I couldn't remember everything like big chunks during my growth, but I used to have a good grip, I did manage to get to this town, in which I was currently living in. It didn't end up well for me at the start, as I got taken by the authorities and got placed in a foster home. Refusing to give them the whereabouts and livingness of my parents is what got me there in the first place. I wasn't planning to return after everything that happened. Fortunately, I wasn't there for long, even if I got attached to some of the other, real orphans there and wanted to stay. Daniel, Anna and Dawn are a few of them. They really made my life easier when I was there, but, like all good things in life, our livelihood had to end. While reminiscing, something strange happened, it didn't really surprise me, considering what happened so far, but I could see different shades of darkness started swirling around and becoming objects. A room was created right in front of my eyes and under my feet, filled with old toys, everything black, slowly getting colored by themselves, the blue colored wood all around me. A single flashing lamp spreading light across the forming room, this was one of the rooms from the orphanage I was thinking about. . And it just rematerialized. I've looked at my own hands and feet but I didn't see mine, but those of a child. I couldn't forget that none of this was real, not even for a moment, even if it felt really amazing. On the top of a newly formed desk from the room, there was a small calendar with the day may twenty, the day I've met Bart and got adopted, or rather taken care off. My mother always used to say that you can choose your friends but you can't choose your parents, perhaps she was wrong. . I've felt so much guilt over the years after I ran off, maybe this was another second chance. I could go back to them and tell them how sorry I am, real or not, I had to take my chances with them, and you don't get an occasion like this every day. I didn't know if I was younger or just looked like it, inside I felt the same whilst everything around looked bigger. Not too tall or too short that I could open the door of my room. A few looks around and I've managed to see the headmistress talking to someone at the end of the corridor, right before the main window. I had to act fast if I wanted to succeed, so I closed the door as soon as I saw her and locked it from inside. She probably has keys for every room in here. I should block it with something and exit through the window since I doubt I could sneak behind her, not to mention the main entrance being out of reach too. Being a child again has its disadvantages; I didn't feel like I had my entire strength with me. Trying to move the big drawer to block the door did result in a failure, though. I did end up using a chair instead of it. I managed to place it in a manner that would prevent the door knob from being twisted and opening the door that should buy me enough time to escape. Next part of the plan came in motion, I had to check the window and how high I was. Thankfully, it wasn't a long jump from the bed to the window, but another problem came, a small latch kept it locked and I wasn't sure if I would be able to pick it. I tried pulling the bar that kept it locked, as hard as I could but I wasn't able to open the rusty thing. Time is essential, not one second could be wasted if I wanted to escape, If only I had something to break it down, then I could make it. Meanwhile, the sounds from the hallway got louder; something was approaching my current position. I couldn't explain why but I've grown sensitive to sounds of footsteps and such. No time to think about it, I couldn't be caught doing something suspicious; it was either escape or a failure. Nothing from the room looked heavy or hard enough to break the lock, and then I remembered. If all of this came from my thoughts, maybe there was a chance of me able to control it. It's worth a shot anyway. My eyes were closed, and I tried clearing my mind before thinking about something that could help me unlock that window, like some cooking oil, so slip past it. When I opened my eyes, there it was, nothing, I had no clue what I expected to happen, materializing objects would make everything too easy I presume. Time was running out for me, a familiar feeling though and I've done nothing but block the door and wishful thinking, all pathetic and in vain. Their voices got even louder. I could even suspect that they could be right outside the door, making my plan futile. In a last attempt, I started searching everywhere in the room, throwing stuffed brown colored teddy bears around. Useless it would seem until I searched the desk and found a small iron hammer. I couldn't even start to think about how many wrong points are implied by the location of the tool in here. What was it doing so close to the reach of the children from the orphanage? Could it be that I created it with my mind, or was it there in reality too? Time wasn't waiting for me to answer any of the questions, soon I started ignoring them and started banging on the latch, whoever was behind the door could break through my barricade at any give time and stop me. My grip was tighter than a strong alloy on the iron hammer; this was it, the sturdy latch in front of me. I lifted my arm up so I could strike it at its full potential, then I started relentlessly pounding upon it. Each strike resonated everything around me as if the whole structure got affected by my blows, some objects changed colors for mere glances of my eyes. Even some of their parts disappeared for an instant before coming back. The latch didn't budge from my strikes, but with everything that's been happening around I thought I could manage to destroy it with enough hits. I wasn't the only one pounding, at the same time as I was, someone was desperately trying to enter the room and stop me, both of out blows contributed to a nice symphony of struck metal and wood. Just a couple of more strikes and the lock would be done for, one last shot and. . In a final assault, with all the strength I was able to collect from the recently discovered undeveloped body, I broke it, with a vibrating strike that echoed, not only here, but across the room, dematerializing some of the toys around me and cracking the whole window with its entire frame. The door behind me was almost pinned down too, this was my chance, and I got closer to what was left of the window, no more than rubble from a big hole. I jumped down hoping that it wasn't going to be a plunge to my death or a serious injury to my frail body. Falling down made me rethink my decision, even if it was too late and I couldn't stop it. I instantly hit the ground and tumbled in a ball like a small hedgehog. Somehow I was able to get down unharmed, even with a hammer in my hand from a jump that would normally cripple someone with my condition, it would seem like physics would be on my side this time. For a second, I almost forgot what I wanted to do, with all the commotion going around, ah, looking for my parents, that was it. Before that, I looked above and saw her, the headmistress, just for a mere moment before she went back inside, probably taking the long way to get to me. From the pot into the frying pan and I was cold-footed, I started going as far as I could on the streets of my childhood. I tried my best to hold my thoughts, but behind me, there she was, mistress Fleur, right on my tail, as angry as ever and yelling at me: 'Stop there you rascal! Someone stop that. . 'I couldn't let them catch me, I would rather. . . Just before I could finish my thought, an officer of the local police almost grabbed me; I managed to slip away right under his hand. As agile as ever I kept on sprinting away, with both the authorities and civilians behind, the outskirts of the town were my only chance to get out untouched and escape. Just a couple of streets ahead and I could make my grand escape, avoiding people was a small feat, but they were getting close. I had to lose them before I could get out, the first left I saw, I took it. The town was just like the back of my hand, I knew it too well, with only a few turns I could lose them in no time. The next building I passed was Rim's flower shop. There's where I got distracted when I saw him with his family standing in front of it. Darya must have felt so happy; she even smiled when she saw me, even if we haven't met before. Suddenly I tripped over something and fell flat on my face. The pale road I was on managed to slow me down once again. It didn't matter how fast I got up because the officer got up to me, I couldn't believe how fast he was. He must have taken a shortcut to get to me that easily.

'Okay, I believe you've caused enough problems for one day' He said before pulling me back up and taking away my hammer.

'You can't begin to fathom in how much trouble you are, trying to run away from a respectable officer of the law, carrying a blunt weapon without a permit, what do you have to say for yourself?

'I could only look at him concerned when I told him:

'I've got nothing to say to you, you're not even real, none of this is. I demand you to unhand me at once!

'The officer looked at me unfazed, like nothing I've just said to him got to him. The expression on his face changed, so maybe it did get to him and made him a bit angrier, he placed the hammer inside his pants, kept tight by a leather belt, stylish for a person like him. I expected a response, but instead he lifted his other hand up, high enough to eclipse the sun and slapped me across the face.

'I don't have time to listen to your nonsense child. You had it coming for more than you could even think of. Now, I'll just take you back where you belong, the orphanage. They should take care of your behavior and. . . 'He kept lecturing me whilst dragging me away, mercilessly like a brute. My cheek remained red and hurt for a while. I didn't know what was worse, being lectured or hit by him. What actually didn't make sense was the fact that I felt it, even if it wasn't real. There could be the possibility that he wasn't and I slapped myself, but I couldn't pull myself since I had control over both of my hands pulling me farther away. I had to escape again and find a way out of this fantasy. The hammer wasn't too far from my reach, if I could only get it, I could cripple him and get away, he deserved it all after the pain he inflicted on me. It had to be a perfect, single motion, fast enough to end as it started. My right hand was incapacitated by his hand, I only had to use my left one to take the weapon and use the momentum to my own advantage. Hopefully, it wouldn't break or crack his bone; I don't want to break him like I did with the window, even if he gave me no choice. In a flash, I remembered how it happened, it wasn't a normal hammer but it took a few swings to destroy it. I should be able to hit him once and be able to run off. Well, here goes nothing, I smuggled the hammer in one fell swoop, and the feeling was indescribable. It felt like the time was being slowed down and I could move normally. I kept on going, the officer turned around to face me but the event. . My event was already in motion and it looked like he wasn't going to be able to stop nor reach me in time in order to defend himself. In a way, with everything slowing down but my thought remaining unaffected, I couldn't stop but think about what I was doing, even if it wasn't, I was about to hurt him, it didn't feel right at all. Then again, it wouldn't be the first time I did something without re-evaluating it and I couldn't stop it once started. Too late, the hammer achieved its goal and reached his leg, making a cracking sound of pain upon impact and intense screaming followed by the release of my hand. Before he unhanded me, I felt a small shock going through both of our hands, as the strike echoed through his whole body and reached me. He fell to the ground after, unconsciously or even worse. People around the street watched in astonishment after I committed the nefarious deed.

'I really messed it up this time, ' I said out loud after everything didn't go as I was prepared to deal with it. After that, I dashed away as far as I could without wanting to look back, with each step made, the more it hurt. It didn't matter if any of this was real or not anymore, it didn't even matter if I was able to escape, I was getting sick of running away from my problems and so was my body. It felt like I was handling a two-edged blade, on one of the sides, if I kept doing it, the bad feelings such as guilt, sorrow, hate might never leave my side if I stopped and surrendered to the uncertainty, who knows what might happen. No matter what I chose to do, I couldn't keep on living with my obsession. There was another problem I couldn't understand, certain events stored in my memory are unreachable, no matter how hard I tried reaching, and I only found myself fleeing farther away from them. Perhaps it was time to stop trying to change the past, everything I see before me already happened in a different way than how I remember it. No more trying to escape, no more trying to foresee from afar, I had to go to where it all started; I had to go to

'Mannorstare'. This time, I wasn't going to run, no longer, I stood still and closed my eyes. It would seem that I was falling again but I couldn't see where it didn't matter since I knew where I was going. Opening my eyes and realizing that I was back on the streets of my home felt both peaceful and unnerving. Everything felt the same as before, except it wasn't, it wasn't the same any longer. The night was almost upon me, suiting for what I was about to do, I have only one thing to do, be prepared so it wouldn't turn into my last run. I was heading back home, a bit lightly headed, but, at least, I understood from the hallucinations what I had to do. I entered my house after the longest walk in my life and took a moment to breathe and calm down. My brain being assaulted by logical thoughts and my deep feelings didn't make it easy. Before I think about doing anything else, I did something unexpected. I approached the desk, my loyal old desk and took a pen and some paper out. There was something that had to be written down. The paranoia was getting to me; I could see shadows of people that weren't there inside my house. This had to be done as fast as possible. I only did what I felt like and came into my head, without trying to make the piece of paper sound well:

'For the. ' I don't think I could start like that if it's the last thing I'm going to write while I'm still alive, I had to make it properly written:

'If you're reading this now, it most likely means that I'm probably. . ' no, this one is too much of a cliché. I shouldn't waste too much time on it. . that's it, I always thought veracity is one of the highest forms of sincerity, more or less anyway:

'I'm not going to waste a lot of time on this paper if you search under my desk, 'Here it goes, time to reveal everything to whoever finds my note, hopefully, he or she will put my research to good use. 'there's a small removable plank, under it there's a secret compartment where a small box filled with old documents, notes and some pictures I've either collected from people who came into contact with that town named Mannorstare, a cursed hellhole from where I once witnessed something out of the ordinary. From what I've learned so far, people have been used as sacrifices to some sort of monster, though I wasn't able to find out the reason behind it. After a series of, what I could only call delusions or even visions, that strangely, not only felt real but with every passing moment, they erase themselves from my memory, as if they never happened. That's not important right now, what's really important is what I was able to realize from the distant shards of what I used to call memories, that I got fed up with everything I've done so far and that it was finally time to stop being a watcher and take my role as an actor in the grand scheme. Not only I will go into the town but I will try to stop the blaspheming ungodliness that it once breeds. Trust me when I'm telling you this, I'm not trying to sound philosophical, nor self-righteous, but I have to do it because it feels like the right thing to do. I should have done it in person but there isn't much time for it, I want to apologize to my friends, no, they're more than that, to my family for every time I've done something wrong to them, If I ever brought them bad memories or even hurt them, I am truly sorry. . Yours truly. ' This was going to do it. It took me more than a second to realize how much it sounded like a post-mortem note.

'Ironic' Where did that come from? The least of my worries now was starting to hear voices inside my head. Right away I dismissed it as being my imagination. I placed the note on the desk, close enough to the person who's going to find it, to be also able to open the secret spot. Well, by the time someone will get what I'm trying to say with that message, it won't be a secret anymore. Before I leave the safety of my house, I should make sure I'm prepared for what's coming. I could only think of the worst scenarios that could happen. My clothes were tight and stuffy. They would most certainly slow me down if it came to me escaping. I had to loosen up, anything lighter would do. I placed my coat on the seat near the desk and continued with throwing my sweaty sweater vest the same one I've slept in, strange, I remember changing my clothes in the morning, or was it a day ago? I could have forgotten about it, but when I got upstairs to the room where I usually got dressed, I noticed that a suit was missing and it wasn't on me. Still not important enough to sway me from my purpose, I grabbed another set of clothes. There it was, one less problem to take care of. Something did get into my mind when I looked at the wardrobe, I didn't own a sweater, so where did I get it from and why am I paying so much attention to it when I should get ready for my trip? I had to take another look at it before going out, I went back and it wasn't there anymore, the note remained where it was, nothing else around was missing either, even the door was locked, everything but that sweater. I can't believe I'm being slowed down from my pursuit by such a trivial object, screw it, I should pack some things and just go out already. On my way back upstairs I grabbed a backpack, wondering what I should fill it with. I never understood why I bought so many backpacks since I didn't end up any of them. First of all, I had to be positive, if there was a chance for me to make a safe return. I could get even more proof, the camera would make the most important asset. Perhaps I could even use the flash to temporarily blind someone or something, even if it would last for seconds, maybe this and this, or even. After packing some essentially useful items, I went to the kitchen and grabbed a knife. The thought of hurting someone else left my head but, at least, I'd be able to give them a good scare. Either that or I could give them a scar to be remembered for. My backpack should be full now, also light enough for me to move fast and with ease. I took a second to breathe, in and out, feeling slightly nervous. What am I doing? This isn't the time for second thoughts, this decision is final and I dare not change it. Still, my mind sent signals to my body, but it refused to concede. The uncertainty of my action began to sprout, exactly what I was afraid of. There was no way for me to change my mind, not now, not after everything I've done and said. I'm ready, I'm packed and I only need to go but I'm not moving. I don't know if it was cowardice but I got caught in a web, afraid, faintly go get out. Let me think it through, maybe that could help, what's the worst thing that could happen to me if I got in there? I could get killed for starters, but I don't know if I can continue my mundane life like that, cowering in fear like I am not. It's been so long since the last time I was there, even the reason that made me go there in the first place. Damn this self-defense mechanism, my mind was clinging to random memories, generating thoughts, making me question things, even now at the brink of me leaving, but it won't work, not anymore, I'm going to ignore my thoughts and feelings this time. The first steps I've taken were hard, I was struggling to go towards the outside world and leave the safety of my house. Even if I was proven wrong before with that, but after a couple of more steps I was able to get out there, locking the door behind me and leaving the key on the ground. On second thought, I took it and hid it under the carpet, I wanted my research to be found, but I couldn't bear it if it would make its way in the hands of a petty thief. I knew that someone who knew me would also find the key; there's wasn't any problem with that. The sky was even darker and I could see the clouds gathering for another storm. Fitting that I might arrive thereupon, almost the same circumstances as I did when I first got there as a child. Again, it's not the time for reminiscing the past or admiring the weather. My mind cleared for a short span so I started heading towards what I could only call my destiny. If my memory serves me right, even if lately it has done a pitiful job, I should get to the entrance of the other town in just, less than an hour-ish if I kept my constant movement. Given the time and the fact I couldn't stop thinking about it, it should be enough for me to make a plan. Before I could make it, I thought I would be able to see at least one familiar face on the streets, but no one was out, no one at all. It's too cold outside anyway, so I'm not going to blame them for not coming. The more I kept walking, the harder it felt to devise a plan; maybe I should just stay out of sight and see what's out there. I didn't know what was worse for the time being, the temperature that made me tremble in my boots or the feelings that were causing it. The road I've kept going only got bigger with each step but my goal was still farther away. I felt too tense to be able to create another strategy. My mind started to empty out everything there was, leaving me alone as a simple being that was walking forwards at its own pace. The past was beyond my reach, impossible to change, if only I had the chance to change something from it. Maybe I would or maybe I wouldn't, it's hard to even think about what my life would be if I've made a different choice back then. The pale road didn't speak to me anymore. I wish it did though, to guide me in my time of need. After arriving at what I call the exit or one of the exits of the town, I started feeling melancholy; my mind got clouded once again. I stopped for a brief time as the road tiles below me started changing color up to the border that leads outside of town. From blue to red, people never seem to notice small details about this amazing place, neither did I until now. Before I stepped outside of it, I did take a look-back, not only to the town but at my living memories of the life I've spent, ghosts of the past that looked at me, walking around to do errands, meeting friends for the first time. It sure felt good, even if it didn't last forever, deep inside I knew I would have to leave everything behind and give into my obsession. I left after that without looking back, trying my best to keep my calm and concentrate. So I took out a small lamp out of the backpack and lit it up so I could see, a single light into a sea of darkness, with its dark clouds covering and devouring the moonlight. While walking, I started being impatient and paranoid despite my every effort done so far, the silence was too much to take and I could feel that something bad was about to happen as I approached Mannorstare. The road I've taken went through a forest, not far from here until all will be over. I just had to ignore everything else that crept me out about it, including the silence of the woods that most likely ate the remaining animals and insects that would have been attracted by the light of my lamp if they were out there. I wasn't going to try calming myself down again since that has failed before. Still I wasn't planning on letting my guard down. No sane person would have passed here without any horse or carriage because it was so long and gloomy. The trees were tall and ash like with branches that almost looked like slender hands, trying to reach and hang any scoundrel that came along. Luckily for me, I was beyond their reach. I felt like I had someone I should thank this for, yet I didn't know who. It didn't always use to be like this, I can remember them, several years ago, full of life, I couldn't see any other reason for their demise than the fact that they have also seen the horrors of this world and withered away. In their loneliness, they reached away, stretching their hands so they wouldn't wither alone. I should stop admiring the foliage and focus on my mission, I'm almost there, after all, the wood passage I was on lead directly to the other town. My feet started going on their jogging while I was trying to blow the rest of my steam off to keep going. The road was rough, luckily for me that I had my tough boots for this time of the year. A couple more turns, steps and avoiding the branches some more and I was there, just a couple of feet away from the entrance. I can't believe it how much it passed since the last time I came here. Mannorstare was just there, so I stopped to look at it from the distance. My lungs weren't the only ones that got progressively harder to control, so were my hands shaking uncontrollably time to swallow my fear and hope not to choke on it. From the looks of it, no one was there, no one in sight; I could get a closer to see what changed after so many years. I started moving ahead with caution, ready to react to anything after entering the town. On my first sight of it, nothing changed; it still remained an old creepy location, with wet streets and something else. After looking around I noticed someone, not far from where I was, but turned with his back on. I couldn't see if it was a man or a woman, but I was able to see that person just standing in front of a wall, not moving at all. I had no idea how do deal with it, he or she might be one of those insane people who're ready to sacrifice others for rabid beasts, in that case, apprehending it wasn't an option. Left and right, an alleyway with turns but it was too close to. Perhaps I could be able to sneak past that thing if I remained silent enough. No move so far, almost like a sentry, my next move had to be well thought through. Something felt off about it, almost like a trap, but no one could have known that I was going to come back here. I should look for another way, let me see. There's something that looks like a store, some normal houses, nothing opened that I could enter. Nervously I turned my gaze back to that person I left wrongly looking away, even if it was at a glance. There didn't seem to be any place to run by or a way to go, except an alley that might lead to a dead end, or going forward which would end up with me being seen or heard. Either has its risks and I don't have the entire night to spend on picking the right one. I couldn't believe what I was thinking about, how could I forget where I was? I had to keep my head back to the game and not make anything stupid. Whoever that might be, it still hasn't done anything, nor was I seen. Was I too paranoid about it, or would a normal person spend so much time in the night doing nothing? I started moving towards it, slowly, barely making any sound at all. After getting closer, I noticed something I wasn't able to see before, more of them, people standing in front of numerous other buildings from the distance, just like this one. This doesn't look right at all. I was sure that no normal human being would act the same as them. The simple thought of them being human didn't stand up anymore. I didn't come here for nothing, I'm close to one of them so I could at least just try and see what it looks like. My movement was still slow, the closer I got towards it, the easier it got for me to hear these strange hissing and disturbing noises, they weren't too loud, almost like whispers from another language, coming from its head. Right behind it, I reached the shoulder with my hand, wanting to see the face of that bugger. The precise point after I touched, it turned around and knocked me away, with enough power to overpower me. My heart was pounding and I was speechless. It had the body of a man but a giant hole filled with a dark smoke exactly where his face would be if he was a human. The hissing noise not only got louder as he started coming towards me but it also got harder to listen, alerting the others too. I turned around on my belly and crawled on the ground for some seconds so he wouldn't catch me, I got up as fast as I could to keep moving away from it. I wasn't able to turn my back completely on it, who knows what it was. After looking around, almost in all directions, I saw multiple of them, all moving towards me in utmost sync. This wasn't good, my first thought was to run outside of the town but they were at the entrance and blocked the exit. I didn't know how they got there so fast but I wasn't going to wait and find out. The one who was the closest to me was ready to trap me, luckily, in an effort that was born out of desperation; I actually got closer to him and threw a kick into his stomach. He almost grabbed my leg but I managed to push him a few feet away from me and avoid it. There's not much time until they'll all catch me. I doubt I'll be able to defend myself from so many of them. I've had nowhere to go, so I turned towards the closest residence and started hurling kicks and punches on the door, trying to pry it open, neither did the door nor the knob budge. They were getting closer, including the one I managed to slow down. I've reached into my backpack and took out the knife, followed by an unrelenting assault on the door, this was my only hope. I pulled and thrust the blade as fast and sturdy as I could, without even focusing on those who were coming down to me. Even if I didn't watch, I could hear the hissing noise only getting louder, coming from multiple sources, neither I nor did the distraction stop. Just a couple of more strikes, the lock couldn't last anymore, metal or not, but before striking again I took one last look behind and saw all of them right behind me. Reaching with their slender hands and hissing, almost chanting together, as if they were partaking in a ritual of some sort. This was my final attempt; I charged the door lock, even if I didn't have the distance, speed, not even the velocity. I pushed with the help of my shoulder and managed to burst into the house. No time for celebrating, I turned around after getting in and closed the door behind them, barely escaping at an inch of their grasp. They were still there, blocking the door with leech-like fingers, bulking and shrinking back in the place. The door wasn't fully closed because of that, a quick swipe of my knife followed. All of those fingers dropped down, dripping with some sort of ooze. My heart was in a constant race while I was still in a dire situation, I tried my best to keep the door closed but they were all attacking it. I can't let them in; I don't want to die, not here, not yet. I turned with my back to it and faced the room, trying to look for a way out or something to buy me some more time. The hissing noise became ever worse as the time went, louder, almost mechanical like. I couldn't think straight, that's why I couldn't believe what I saw in front of my eyes, in the middle of the room, there's a trapdoor with a broken arrow on it that might lead to somewhere. The pounding on the door got only more violent, I could feel the wood breaking behind. Faith had something else in store for me. The door was being pushed even harder upon me; it wouldn't be long now until it fell down.

'I either take all of you head on. . Or I could take my chances down there. ' I couldn't try going in without blocking the door, they would catch me before I'd get the chance. I couldn't see it before, on my right side there was a small stack of boxes, I grabbed and threw them in front of me, hopefully, and they might slow all of them down. Before jumping, I placed the knife in my backpack and kept the lamp in my hand. After that, I leaped towards the middle of the room. I felt like I was going to crush the air itself under my sturdy boots. Behind me there was the sound of broken wood. I didn't have time to listen to their serenade so I grabbed the trapdoor handle and opened it, revealing a stairway leading somewhere, throwing sulphur dust all around. No time to think, they're all coming for me and the boxes didn't do much to slow them down. I went down the stairway and locked the door behind me; those things grabbed it from the other side, pulling it, trying to get to me.

'I won't give up to some faceless muck. 'The passage I was in was quite small; I don't think I can hold it much longer to appreciate it. Why would they add handles to both sides? They were ready to overpower me again, the hatch being almost a quarter open, I could only see two of them on the floor trying to reach me like they tried before. They were also missing some fingers, only being left with some holes and the desire to get revenge. My whole world was getting crushed in front of my eyes, away from my reach, just like my chances to be able to escape them. I released my grip from the handle and fell down the stairs. Agh. . . after. . a, agh. . . sort of long, gh . . . fall, the lamp landing on my head too, I was hurt but I could live. My eyes turned back to them but none of them followed. They just closed the door and covered the last source of light. Either the fall of the cold wind also blew out the flames from my lamp. I couldn't see nor hear anything. At least I was alive and it couldn't get any worse than what waited for me outside, could it? Luckily I placed the knife back before I fell down, or else I would have had it a lot worse. Now, where did I put those matches? I had to find out where I was, why it was so cold? And why did they just let me go? None of that was possible without having some light, sticking my hand inside the pack and guiding took only a few seconds but they weren't in there. I know I packed them in, I'm sure of it. Not only that but I'm also out of options since I couldn't see anything. Not only that, but I was constantly being pushed to the edge, not knowing where I am, not being able to see, not even knowing if I would survive. Ah, there it was, I took out the matches and lit up the lamp, I couldn't believe I had it in my hand for the entire time I was there, I couldn't remember when I took it out either. Those thoughts fled after the light revealed my location, I was inside a cave? A stone cold cave under a house, no, from the looks and size of it, under the entire town. This could explain why there isn't any unwanted attention brought to this town and its beast. Maybe the creature hides in here and it's being kept a secret by the people living in it. Since where I came from wasn't the way I was going to go out, I had to find another way from inside. The place was huge, upon a closer inspection, it looked less than a naturally formed cave and more like a sculpted structure made of the cave. Why and how could someone create something like this? With a calculated shape, the structure had multiple paths, probably intersecting with one another at one point, who can tell? I chose the path leading forward without knowing what laid ahead, feeling tired but there isn't anything I could do about it. It felt like minutes of walk, moss just appeared on the walls. My eyes weren't playing tricks on me, it must have been there for a long while, but how did it grow inside? Questioning everything wasted too much of my time, not to mention that it was distracting me. What's this? A giant room came in front of me, out of nowhere, either I'm so tired that I started seeing things or it took some time for me to lose my mind, might as well be both. The room itself wasn't empty; it looked like I wasn't in too much trouble. It was filled with some strange formations that almost looked like humans covered with carapaces. I really hope that they are only formations of stone or something else. Being too suspicious and hesitant to do it, I didn't dare to get closer, not even one bit. I'm not sure how much I'll last without sleep, food, water or light, but I had to go if I wanted to make it through. Before I could do it, I had some time to spare, so I counted them, just five, no, six of them that might be alive or not. I'm in a much worse state than I was out there, I don't even know how much time passed, and I didn't pack a clock with me. Bending over the ground allowed me to take a better look at them, under the, I thought it was a thick carapace; it had a large trunk with a hole leading down. My vision was impaired but I managed to move slowly towards them so I could take an even greater look, I was wrong before, they looked less like humans the more I looked at them. The strange carapace had a dark-red color and was cracked, they weren't statues, and they were something else. . No sound so far from any of them, maybe it was just my imagination again. They made me feel strange, almost weakened. I didn't know if it was caused by them or the lack of sleep that started taking its toll once again. I had something in mind but it wasn't right, I couldn't bypass them in my current state, I had to rest for the night somewhere, I've got no other option, even a few hours would do. The way I came from isn't an option, not with them lurking outside. Not to mention that I had the strange feeling that someone was following me. I took some distance away from them and decided to rest in the tunnel, the backpack came in handy for my head to rest on. My body told me otherwise but I didn't listen to it. I blew the flame of the lamp and lay on my back. Just as a cautious measure, I took out the knife and placed it near me, in case something came at, it would have a hard time disposing of me whilst being stabbed. Even if I didn't want to admit to myself, I felt peace, I didn't care about anything else, not about them, not about the cold or the hard ground, I finally went to sleep. I felt like walking into an endless crowd of people, all of them going towards a different place. Where was I going? Quickly and with no ease, someone from the busy crowd almost hit me. I didn't notice who it was but, a coin fell out of his pocket. The confusion haunted me again, just as I bent down to pick up the coin, I found myself yet in another crowd of people. We, we were all standing in front of someone, wrenching himself for our entertainment. Everyone laughed at him except me, and then the thought of giving him the coin I picked before came to my mind. He would get exactly what he deserved. My consciousness rested, almost like a hibernation state before waking up as if nothing has happened. I don't know how much I slept, or even if I did, after a blink I didn't feel tired anymore. A clock would have been nice and helpful now, even if I would have used it only once. When I lit up the lamp once more, I found myself in front of one of the carapaces that were lying in front of me. I wasn't even up but I managed to drop the lamp whilst stepping away from it to lift myself up safely. I could barely breathe from all the dust, a few feet away from it too; the knife, the lamp and my backpack were still in front of it. How did it move? A pointless question, as I looked around and realize that it didn't. I was the one who woke up in the middle of the room, surrounded by them. I could feel my lungs filling with dust after inhaling and exhaling, I had to take it logically, and I was probably just . . . sleepwalking, right. With all the things near me. Two steps and a bold rush. That's what it took me to grab everything from the ground and step back from it. Nothing else happened, except making me even more paranoid, they don't seem to do anything, at least, nothing so far. I wasn't going to drop my guard so easily. They must be messing with my head that must be the reason of their presence here. I checked the backpack to see if everything else was in there, nothing was missing. Someone must have placed them inside these sculptures to scare me that must be it. I'm not scared of them, there's a way for me to check my thesis, and I could try to stick my hand in the hole it has to be certain about it. I was hesitant about it, maybe even gutless; hopefully, I wouldn't literally end up like that because of a mistake. This was important; I could find out if I'm in any harm, if anything's inside. I could quickly draw my hand out and make a run for it, even if they didn't seem very mobile. Come to think of it, if I'm the first one to discover them, I might as well name them, it would, at least, make it easier for me to refer to them, other than as things. Agh, my mind should be out of the gutter now, I won't be able to name them if I was dead. The stomach ache started right before my attempt and it was the least of my problems at the moment. Almost as tall as me, I hoped it would end up being empty, my life might depend on it, I got closer, pushing my hand inside of the trunk, going slower and deeper, the more I ventured inside, the harder my hand started shaking. I was afraid, but my desire to know what was in there outraced the phobia of losing my hand. My hand reached the maximum length it could extend, almost reaching my shoulder; the formation was empty inside, leaving nothing but the soft carcass from the inside. I pulled my arm out and felt relieved. There was no time left for me to check every single one of them, not to mention that it wouldn't help me at all. Somehow I did feel better after it; I could continue my exploration forward, knowing that I was safe from their reach, from the reach of the husks. That sounded like a fitting name, shame that they're empty. . . husks. I couldn't see it before I went deeper into the room, but the husks weren't only in the there, the more I made my way in. While walking through another path outside of it, I saw more of them, hanging upside the ceiling, some even on the wall too. But they couldn't have formed naturally since the cave was made by someone, neither was the material recognizable. I swallowed my thoughts and wonders in a flash when I saw legions of veins and a dripping red liquid coming out from one of them, slightly stretching towards me. Those long veins couldn't reach me, but the light from my lamp was able to reveal them and their various colors and sizes, all mashed up together. A frightening sight for my sore eyes, as soon as I realized that, I stood there, merely a couple of feet away from it, I knew it couldn't move towards me. How could I pass it then? I started pointing the light and looked towards other husks but none of them reacted. Meanwhile the flailing veins were still trying to reach me. Perhaps it was attracted by the source of light provided by my lamp, if that was the case, why wouldn't the others react? A small test was in order, maybe if I placed the lamp down here, I could make a run for it and bypass the husk, the place in front of me seemed a lot tighter. I don't think I will be able to avoid it if those veins pointed towards the bottom. I've got a bad feeling about it, they didn't look strong enough to hurt me, but they could have venom on them, I might as well gamble with my life as I did before since I've got no other choice. The lamp was down, it was darker without it but I managed to see the husk trying to reach the light, I couldn't be surer about it, unless I was wrong. If I escape, I should receive an award for my ingenuity in a stressful situation and another one for uncovering what lay under the town. I wanted to go for it, I was ready to dash throughout the entire cavern even though my legs were shaking in place, stomach ache following them, this couldn't happen again, not now, my whole system was slowly betraying me. The cold winds were brushing upon my cheeks, passing by from nowhere, causing the light coming from the lamp to come and go. How could everything happen now, at this precise moment, giving me no choice except to go, against my body's will but at my will's predicaments? I didn't blink for a second, almost started crying, I dashed furiously, trying to avoid that distracted husk, venturing deeper into the darkness. As hard as it might be, I held my thoughts and breath, as I felt the light fading behind me, along the last remnant of help that I would get. I couldn't see where I was going but I felt, in my way, a couple of sharp objects puncturing the back of my neck. There wasn't enough of a head start for me to make it through. Those husks reached me. . . I managed to move. Farther away and release myself from whatever was inside my back. The walls were closing in on me and I knew it would catch me, the vision was getting worse. I fell down and couldn't see where I was, that immobile husk. . must have done something to my body felt completely numb but my consciousness was still there. My muscles weren't moving, leaving me alone and vulnerable, I hate this feeling, I hate it with all my being and soul. Worst of all, after closing my eyes, I couldn't feel pain, cold, anything. . I was being forced to watch and be afraid of those husks that laid in the dark, not knowing which one is going to get me first. It stings so much. . I'm not able to. . Pull yourself together, you've been through worse situations, that's what I kept telling to myself, repeating it senselessly.

Time passed by and didn't wait for me, seconds, and maybe minutes, even more than that, I could see the saliva coming out of my mouth but I was unable to stop myself from drooling. I couldn't even speak out loud. Why aren't my eyes being harmed after so much exposure? How can something like this even be possible? Footsteps, sounds of them were coming from somewhere, something was coming. What is it? What's coming? What could it be? What is it? Why is it coming? Why? Why? Why? The noise stopped at the same time with my line of thoughts and the question I was asking myself. I couldn't feel it, but I could see that I was being dragged from behind. My defenseless body was being pulled, getting scratched and bruised from the contact with the harsh ground and dust. It couldn't be a husk, could it? No, they can't move. I passed more and more of them by, all hiding in their shelters, tending to them. I wanted to shout but I was still too far away from being able to control my body and voice, somehow still alive but in danger, I wasn't even able to see in which direction it was dragging me. The only sounds I was able to hear were the ones of my body being, making, touching the stone, and hitting something hard once in a while. It just kept dragging me until I started bleeding, seeing a bloody trail leading up to me and beyond, getting bigger and leaving, almost an entire puddle behind, that's where I hoped it would stop, but it didn't. I can't feel anything anymore; I don't even know how much blood I can lose without dying. The venom must have kept me aware of what was happening, even with the blood lost, still unaffected. I couldn't even know for how long I was taken while the blood still kept spreading somehow. It took me a while to realize it, in this dire situation, that this wasn't my blood. Slowly, whilst being incapacitated, I started gaining control over my body, not enough to escape or even close my eyes, but enough to move my tongue so I could taste the blood; it left a bitter metallic taste on it. Disgusting, not only the taste left in my mouth, but the fact that I didn't have enough power yet to move it away, leaving nothing but a bloody image in my mind that pulled away what remained of my sanity. The line between reality and delusion, fantasy broke away after not being able to tell it apart, seeing only blood and darkness in front of my eyes, going into a continuous numb motion against what was left of my will and being forced into a temporary paralysis. I've had nothing to make the time pass but my thoughts which only made the situation worse. I don't know how many turns I took but the landscape didn't change at all, the problems. My dilemma did get worse until I decided that I should accept my fate and just stop, even if it was out of my power. After that decision, I blankly stared more and more into the unknown, without feeling anything anymore. It finally stopped, but it was too late, even if we reached our destination, I didn't pay any attention to where it took me, or what brought me to where I was. A sudden change of height and place occurred right in front of my eyes, followed by silence and solidarity. The regain of my body control continues up to the point when I was able to close my eyes and the long-awaited passing out. I was able to hear sounds of other children in the park, people living their lives in the town, argues between my parents, specific auditory hallucinations, right before a big bang when I lost my consciousness. Something strange happened, I woke up in the middle of a dark room, all tied up. Too dark to see, I couldn't even move a muscle because of the tight rope around me.

'How did I get in here?' I asked myself, losing control of my nerves, freaking out and feeling afraid. Those sentiments got replaced quickly by confusion, familiarity as if this happened to me before in the past. I couldn't remember when, or if it really happened. I tried struggling to escape, but deep down, I somehow knew that I couldn't escape, that something was about to come. My whole body was itching, twitching, shaking at the same time, unable to escape from the confinement that was holding me. The only part of my body that I was able to move was my head, that didn't help me at all since I couldn't see anything around the room I was in, just the darkness that was covering up everything. I might be delirious right now, or I might have snapped, maybe I was about to.

'What are you waiting for? Just come and end it you bloody scab!' I yelled at the top of my lungs, I didn't care who or what caught and tied me up but it made a mistake by not covering up my mouth.

'Are you scared now, you bastard, unholy creature, brainless stump, gutless!?' I swore and cursed it, whatever might be out there, hoping to get a reaction, waiting for an opening. The moment I heard footsteps, the hate and rage that was stored inside me slowly started to get replaced by fear and uncertainty in my own abilities.

'No, I will not!' I refuse to do that; I won't cower in front of a stupid beast. Not after everything I've been through, not now, not even, even if I might not get to live much longer after our possible encounter. I want it to remember my face; I want it to remember that I stood up to. . The footsteps stopped, it was too dark to see but I managed to notice two big doors that used to block everything opened up, shaking up the entire room. The look on my face wasn't one of fear, insecurity or uncertainty, but it was neither one of courage nor tenacity. I was simply shocked. What lay in front of me was no monster nor beast alike, no creature, no faceless follower or husk, it was Carla but at the same time it couldn't be her. She stood there, looking right through me with a blank stare, not making any sounds or even appearing to be alive. I shouted at her, trying to find out if it was really her:

‘Carla! Is it this really you? Please say something, anything, I beg of you. ’To my avail, she didn't respond, leaving my lips dry with frustration, making me wonder if she wasn't Carla, who or what was she then? Was she really Carla? If so why was she ignoring me? ‘Please answer me, we've been through so much together, both of us. . . we. . . we're supposed to meet that traveller, right? Can you remember it? ’ Nothing but silence from her, standing there, waiting and making me get angrier by the second. What on earth could be tormenting me like that? Using a friend that I fondly cared about against me, without even letting her heed my call. She wasn't anything more than a doll, with long white strings coming up her hands and feet, controlled by some evil puppeteer, an immoral scum that was toying with my emotions. Carla stepped like a child, innocent in her heart; some would say even gullible, being manipulated and breaking me from inside. She reached and shoved her hand in my chest, crushing through ribs, breaking what was left of it. They shattered, my body plundered though I've felt no pain from what she did to me, tearing up everything inside with an inhumane power. Her hand came out after and she got closer to my ear, just enough for her soft whisper:

‘Wake up. . . . wake. . . . up. . . ’

A voice that wasn't hers, although the message reached me high and clear. Behind her, far away from the room, I could see a tall figure with long tubes coming out from above. Before I could take a better look at that limped fiend. . The room that was surrounding us started shattering, a wall of cold stone became dust. Even the bonds that once kept me unaware of everything happening around me broke. Carla faded away with them, leaving me alone once again. A burning sensation came to be, only occupying half of my upper body. Even if I wasn't surrounded by anything but dust and ash, even with the darkness subdued, leaving a faint light not far from me. I couldn't help but be miffed by the cold temperature. My clothes also fell away from my body, joining the rubble, leaving nothing but an ugly mitted sweater. I swear I remember removing it, taking it off, it even disappeared; I couldn't remove it from me. The burning sensation went towards my beating hart, becoming more into a warm sensation. The sweater wasn't there alone, the hammer also appeared out of nowhere in my hand. Both of those items felt like a part of me, like nothing I've encountered before, but what did that mean? Is this still a dream, am I still in the town, are these real? Have I asked myself these questions before? I don't know what to believe, but I knew who to trust, Carla told me to wake up, so it might really be a dream after all or a dormant state of some sort. The only problem I had now was, how to wake out, the rest could follow up later. After all my internal organs got smashed from inside, I felt hunger once again, the first thought coming into my mind being. This beautiful restaurant from our town, I never got a chance to go in there, I didn't even got close to it because of its prices. I could really eat something now so I'd be able to think straight and get rid of this place. The whole scenary, just like my thought changed in front of my eyes, the dust gathered up to form solid objects. The ground became a floor beneath me, everything formed exactly how I've had in my mind. It must be affected by my thoughts somehow, I was able to see the tables, the chairs and the walls forming in front of me. No, something is wrong, it all stopped mid-way, the rest of it, the floor, the ceiling, including the counter and the barely created people, everything else got completed by some gross amalgamation of meat covered with pale skin and insect-like antennas. This isn't what I wished for, I couldn't look at them, the employees of the establishment that couldn't stop shaking, falling to the ground and unable to lift themselves up, they didn't even have the arms to do it. They took the shape of combs and were, clearly in pain, all because of me, their whole short and painful existence was my fault, what could I do to stop it? I stared down after, unable to look directly at them, noticing that I was still holding on the hammer. Shady thoughts followed my mind, making enough space for a possible bad decision. . . It didn't matter how hard I tried, thinking them away, none of that worked, why would it? Why did it have to end up like this? If I try to escape now and leave them like what they were. . . that would be cruel, they're standing there on the ground, suffering, rolling over and making strange sounds. . Everything is so sudden, I didn't want to think about the other option, but living in the state they're in, that would make me desire. But, even if I was able to do it, what would be the repercussions of my action? Is it even moral if they're not real? Is this a test I'm being forced into? I kept asking myself questions, to prevent myself from acting rashly and mess up everything, more than I did before. In this situation it would be mercy, but it's still murder If I do it, who knows what I might become after that, what if I'd enjoy it? The grip on the hammer strengthened itself, I came to a decision, deep inside, hoping it's the right one and won't change me. Almost the whole restaurant was covered by it, not only them, it almost looked like it was alive too, eating parts of the wooden walls and remaining floor. The choice wasn't mined to make any longer, I was afraid that it would also reach me. I charged in the general direction the door was, even if it was covered up, I figured that its area would be easier to break through. The hammer, I used it, hitting the meat wall with powerful blow after blow, hoping I could smash it. Nothing happened, not even a mark from my blows, it was getting closer to reaching the floor I was standing on too. Despite that, I kept at it, striking it down with my blunt weapon, strike after strike, spot to spot but it remained unaffected. I've wasted so much time assaulting it that the skin almost reached the part of the floor I was on. I stepped back to the middle of the room so I could have more time to think about what I could do. There was no way out and it already started covering the human part of those people, almost reaching me too. I don't know if I can get out of this, I had to wake up somehow, I hoped it was just a dream. I closed my eyes and dropped the hammer on the floor, awaiting my fate. It was surprisingly silent but my eyes and mouth were kept shut for the entire duration of it. Still nothing so far. My eyes were opened again to find myself in the restaurant, the normal version of it. Surrounded by people who were either eating from their plates or staring at me as if I did something wrong or unheard of. I was able to see through the window that I was back in.

'Excuse me, but if you don't mind it, I'm going to have to ask you to leave. You're disturbing the other customers. . . ,

One of the waiters said to me. I didn't recognize him, but I doubt he did either, so I just apologized:

'For making the other people upset, I should be . . . going now. ' Leaving after having that said, back again into my sweet town, the town of. . I don't think I can remember its name, peculiar, especially that I live in here for the past. . I couldn't believe my eyes again, is that Carla? On the other side of the street, I could see her, right before she saw me and waved. I didn't know how to react to her, I just wanted back and waited for her to get closer to me.

'Hello Carla. . . ' What else could I have said to her? Either she was real or not, telling her what happened so far was a bad idea, unless I wanted so badly to be committed to an asylum.

'Hello there the sunshine, are you ready for. . . ? What's with that look on your face, are you feeling well? ' She asked while checking me from some distance, probably wanting to avoid any possible virus she thought I had. That really sounds like something Carla would think and do.

‘No. . I mean yes, I’m fine, I was preparing to go to. . our workplace to work too. ’ ‘Is that so? Then why were you going in the opposite way?’ She quickly replied while being unscattered. I need a quick excuse that she’d believe.

‘I was going to think of a ‘shortcut’ my attempt got even harder as she started intensely staring me down. ‘Right, how about we go to the normal route we normally take, you know, we normal people who don’t wander half of the district around just to get to our workplace late, not to mention on purpose. ’The perfect cover just came, who knew that I had to let her make the excuse for me.

‘Right Carla, you found me, I’m going to have to come clean now, you’re right. I was stalling, preparing to stall some more time, but I guess you found me out and ruined my plan. I guess there’s nothing else to do that go to out workplace. ’ I said that to her with a straight face, judging from the look and expression on her face, she remained unconvinced. Perhaps it was too forced. Her eyebrow was lowered, her smile was dulled, she saw right through me. ‘If you’re not going to tell me where you were going, we might as well just go and stop wasting more time with it. You’ve always been like this but you never learn. I don’t even know why I’m trying anymore. ’ She said while taking a head start, moving farther away from me. I started following the image of Carla, she told me I should wake up not so long ago. Maybe this version of her knew something about it. I should find a way to ask her subtly, maybe she might know something, even if the chances of that are low and she might now know.

‘Hey Carla, wait for me. ’ A few more steps and I managed to catch up with her, walking at the same pace. ‘So, did you feel. . sleepy as of lately?’ Damn me and my loud mouth, I might have ruined everything. I closed my eyes for a second and clenched my fists in shame. I hope she didn’t see that I also hope I didn’t ruin everything. Carla didn’t seem moved by what I said, it didn’t even slow her walk speed.

‘No, not really, why are you asking?’

‘No reason at all, just. . call it curiosity. ’ Suspicious as she was, trying to get a reaction, she turned it back on me: ‘How come? What made you ask me that? I mean, from the way you look today, I’d say that you’re the one who lacks some. . . ’How dare she? I didn’t lack any sleep, maybe I did but it wasn’t her concern. Enough walking around, I had to ask her bluntly.

‘Carla, you wouldn’t happen to know anything about. . . ’ She looked right into my eyes, as I was ready to ask her, she asked me first:

‘About what?’ ‘No. . maybe it’s not the right time if I’m going to tell her what happened and ask her about. . . I had to be sure it was her, the real one and not another vision. Another excuse was needed to get back on track, then I remembered:

‘Umm, about. . . that scoundrel that you wanted us to meet. . Was it today? You know the one that made you upset to talk about. ’ After hearing it, she merely tilted her head towards me, looking confused, before asking me:

‘What are you talking about? I haven’t gotten upset over anyone. Also, I don’t think anyone’s coming to our town today, at least from what I’m aware off. ’She looked sincere enough, that could only mean that it wasn’t her who told me. . or maybe she’s lying about it. Which one of the two testimonies could I put my trust in? I can’t exclude any of them, even if I’m not counting the one that ripped out my guys, eh.

'Hello, hello? Are you even listening to a word I say?' Apparently, Carla hasn't stopped talking, making it harder for me to keep track of her and my problems. I should stop trying to figure it out now, at least not until after our work.

'Yes I am. . . sorry, but I wasn't really.' After that slip, I had to wait for her to blow all the steam out:

'What could be so important that you would blantly ignore your best friend? Well, except that that past nonsense you said before, but that.' I had to interrupt her, as we arrived closely to the office, speaking of which, I forgot where my camera was.

'Carla, look, we just got here. . . and I just remember that I forgot my where my camera somewhere.' 'It's okay, there should be another extra one in the storage room. Anywho, it looks like we're going to enter it in time, a first for you I'd say.' I remember now, I've had it in my backpack, but where is it now? This can't be good, I probably left it in. .

'Earth to. . . , are you there?' It happened to me again, two times in a row and she's still acting calm, luckily for me that is.

'Yes? I mean yes, I'm in here, where else could I be. . where am I?' We stopped in front of the building to talk about it.

'I'm going to ask you again, are you feeling okay? And, are you really implying that you don't know where you are? Because you're really starting to make me worry. Sure, at first, I thought that you were just messing around, but now, I want you to be honest about it, are you really feeling fine?' From a jolly look on her face it sadly turned into concern. How could she think that something was wrong with me, of all people? I felt like I was walking on the edges of sanity, more than can be said about any other from around us. 'Carla, I'm fine, trust me with this. And since we're asking questions, could you answer me this, but I want you to think about it as hard as you can before answering it. This is really important for me.' That made her look even more concerned that she was before, even made her frown a little, placing her hand on her chin, thinking for a while. I couldn't ask her about before, but there was another thing troubling me,

'This kept me baffled for a while, I don't know if I've forgotten it, I know I'm bad with keeping tracks of names, but do you know the name of the town we're in right now?' I confronted Carla about it. There's no way she could just make up an excuse after telling her:

'Perhaps you didn't listen to me closely enough, I don't want you to make any excuse for not knowing it, so, are you really sure you know the name? Can you be one hundred percent sure, enough that you could swear on it with your own life?' Everything I told her made her upset, going from mood to mood before she decided to answer me on the spot.

'I've already told you that I don't know the name. What else do you want from me, officer? If we're done with the interrogation, I'd like to go to work, you know where the building that's right next to us. Listen, just come in, we've spent enough time on doing nothing.'

'But Carla.' I tried appealing to her while she opened the door and entered the office, I had no other option than to follow her. We've both managed to get there and suprisingly, we both looked at the clock on the wall at the same time.

‘Three minutes late, I should have known. . ’ She said whilst being mad at me, perhaps it could have been avoided if I asked her nicely. Everything else was in order this time, at least from the looks of it. Francis was already here, as a matter of fact, he was the only one. Where are the others? They should arrive at any moment I thought, but in the meantime, I could ask him the same thing, maybe he knew something. So I approached Francis and asked him the same question I asked Carla, awaiting for an answer, instead, I got the same reaction just like before.

‘I don't really know, it's probably just a silly name anyway if the roads match the signs. ’ ‘Thanks anyway, you're just as useful as always. ’ Not at all, but what he told me did help me a little, so far, I knew that three of us don't know the. . .

‘I see how it is, Francis, did. . . put you up to this prank or was it your idea? ’ Carla asked him whilst pointing at both of us.

‘Don't worry about me, I would never pull the rug under you. You know me better than that. Perhaps this boring place doesn't have a name, it's nothing unusual. ’ A sparked conversation started between them after that, all because of me and my big mouth.

‘This town is far from being dull, how dare you? Sure, most of the time, not so many things happen around, but the least it deserves is a name. I swear it had one, though. ’ She then proceeded to make an oath on discovering its name, even making an article about it.

‘Why is it so important for it to have a name? It's not like we get many visitors in here anyway, just screw its identity. ’ Said Francis while adding more paper and ink to the fiery conversation. Carla ignited it even more after that, fighting fire with fire.

‘I don't think you'd enjoy being nameless though I would if I was named Francis. Also, don't complain about visitors, it's not like you've got many of them in your house most of the time. ’ Francis got infuriated by her remarks, continuing the fight with a counter attack, he wasn't going down without a fight.

‘Don't you dare talk to me like that, you want this to become personal, eh? Clearly you've never heard of people enjoying the privacy of their own house, since you're taking so many of them in yours. ’ The entire room felt like a heated battle in which I was evasive to join in even if I was caught in it. I couldn't even pick a side on the battlefield even if I wanted to. Although in a way, I enjoyed conflict and seeing them fight, it kinda made me feel. .

‘Hey, aren't you going to say something? When I'm done with him, I'm coming right for you!’ Or I could have waited for the battle to come to me before trying to stop it, after all, no one was safe from her.

‘Could you both just stop it already? We're all fully grown adults, so can we just act like it? ’

I should have known that Francis wouldn't be pleased by my response when he told me to ‘Speak for yourself!’ Neither did Carla as she didn't waste a second to come back to take a shot at him. ‘You're right for once, you're more like a boy than a man, so could you shush next time when adults are talking? Could you do that from now on?’

‘Well, I liked it before reaching this point, but the conflict got out of hand quite fast, even by their standards. ‘Just stop already!’ I shouted at them, interrupting them from even being able to start more fights, directing their entire attention to me. I didn't think they would actually stop from it. . . or even be mad at me.

‘I didn't mean to shout at you, what I really meant to say was. . . ’ I looked around the room and noticed the clock, ten minutes already passed.

‘Stop already and look at the clock. . . it's quite late and our other colleagues haven't arrived yet. ’Now that I got both of their attention onto me, it started turning into a burden. Both of them looked like they were going to lash onto me, leaving me no other option but to take it.

‘I'm sure they will enter that door at any moment, but how come the boss isn't here yet? They must be all having a celebration and we weren't invited there. ’ Francis confronted Carla with her suspicion, trying to get on her good side after that,

‘Don't worry lass, if there was one, they wouldn't have left you out. ’

Ended by some soft, barely audible remarks. It was both entertaining and annoying to hear them try to figure out where the others are, so I decided to come up with a suggestion:

‘Why aren't we going outside to look for them? Maybe something did happen today and they're all, there, writing about the special event they've come across. ’I could have made a better excuse but something had to be done for us to move away from the constant fighting and spanking, I really hoped they would both agree to my idea and help me. Two funny and unscattered looks on their faces made me think otherwise, as If I was taking the spotlight away from them, a selfish act in their eyes, just to ruin their fun and take it all for myself.

‘Look there, it's the buzz-killing machine, with its entire purpose being to ruin the fun other people have whilst waiting for the others to come. ’ I'm not going to let Carla get even more distracted by some petty and childish banters, especially when I'm trying to figure out what she meant before when telling me. I wasn't going to let her do it again.

‘Look, Carla, enough time passed and something might have happened to them. And even if nothing happened, we still have a job to do, you too Francis. Now, I'm going to head to the storage room to get another camera, after I'm back, I hope we can go and look up for a story to cover. ’I left them alone to discuss whilst I was going to check out for the extra camera. We've already spoken about it, but I liked the idea of writing about the nameless town. That would either confirm or not, the small theory I had in mind. Carla came closer to me and took me by the arm before I had to chance to leave, pointing me towards the room and taking me with her. ‘We're leaving, if you want to boil in here by yourself, it's fine by me Francis, but we're going to check what's outside. ’

She said, while managing to get both of his and my attention, even if it was against my will. I tried slowing her down so I could tell her that I still needed to get my camera but she didn't want to listen. Neither Francis was in the mood for it but he decided to join us, locking the door and getting ready to plan out next move, for better or worse.

‘Any of you two could have closed the door, but no, you had to spend more time gabbing. ’ ‘I don't understand why are you complaining so much, does the sunlight hurt you or something? ’I had to step in once again to stop them.

‘There's nothing pleasing you two, is there? Could you, at least, tune in down a notch? Francis, stop encouraging her, you're making everything worse!’ Quickly being interrupted from my stance.

‘Yeah he is, but he's only making it worse for himself. ’I had to come back to where I was left.

‘Back to Carla, you're overreacting, even more than usual. Come to think of, you're both acting unusual. ’They both puffed up, acting quite immaturely and there wasn't anything I could do or say that would stop them. Nothing that I tried so far worked. I should just go and find out what's happening, if they care about it they will follow. After I started walking, they both followed in my track, still arguing over irrelevant problems from behind, at least, they weren't hurting anyone, unless you count their feelings as sentient beings, which they aren't. . . I hope.

'Let's see, where should I . . . mean we look first? '

Thinking out loud there for a second, luckily ignored. Alas, maybe we should go to the mayor's office, he has to know if the town has a name or not, after all, he has to own all those records and documents related to it. I turned around and told them:

'How about we go and check out the mayor's office, how about it? '

Both of them reached the point where they couldn't even hear me, being self-absorbed by their arguments and curses, probably not even listening to themselves anymore, saying words and throwing insults only for the sake of it. Somehow, even with all of that, they were still able to replicate my exact steps as they followed me remarkably well. It was still early so not many people were outside, but those who were there didn't matter since I didn't know them personally. We kept moving, passing the barber shop where old man Dave spent his entire life in, a sad individual who enjoyed the feeling of solidarity, in moments like these one I can fully understand why he likes it. To each his own I suppose, though I can't help it but feel pity for this poor fellow. Sad and alone with no one to talk to, I can only think about how it would feel like being in another one's body, even if it was for one day I'd say it would be enough. Otherwise, it's hard to think about it when you've got two of your friends who won't stop bickering at each other two steps away from you. I would like to be in one of their shoes just to be able to end the conflict, I could even feel how it would be like being a . . .

'We're almost there so we can finally get to the bottom of it, though, I wish I had my camera with me. 'Carla didn't feel sorry she took me out so rashly, but I guess it wasn't only her fault, I might have pushed her to it.

'I get it already, we don't need a camera for this, if there was none to begin with, it's not like you were going to take photos of a blank spot. 'She was right, I'd give her that for once, but still, at least, some would suffice, even with the mayor.

'Ye, don't worry about it, since we're writers, we'll manage to do what we do best, writing that is. 'Francis was blunt but stern though I don't know when it was decided that he'd also get a part in our article. Nothing hard nor unpleasant about it, I wish he told me first before introducing himself in.

'How about you write the important notes for us? I don't really want to pick from paragraphs for the article, you've got the small, straight to the point writing style, don't you? 'I couldn't refuse her, especially after placing me on the spot, so I agreed to it. And so they stopped arguing for once and we all agreed on to something. Luckily for them that they've got me as a friend, any other normal individual would have quit the job and their friendship. Normally we'd all argue just like a couple, so we might as well be one. I felt bad, but at the same time I was fine and well, just like a wine waiting to be consumed, sentient and aware of its own fate, starting to lose it. Even if it was hard to lose something that wasn't there in a long time. I need something to occupy my mind and these twos aren't helping, they're just distracting me, wait.

' The two of you. . . stop right there for a second and don't say a word. 'I felt sorry for silencing them but they were listening, quietly and for the time being, I've had some time to clear my mind, hopefully I wouldn't lose it. Now, what was I thinking about. . . distractions, we were heading to the mayor, before that we were. . . the three of us were talking, even farther. . . the restaurant, that's where I started, in the middle of it, standing like a fool with people staring at me. I might have forgotten something there, but I can't place my finger on it. Carla and Francis were getting impatient, they're really hitting up some nerves there, maybe even more. I need an excuse to get there, but it might be tricky since they want to get to the mayor now, I don't need to appear suspicious to them. Too late for that, they're probably just trying to figure out what's inside my mind, even more than I am.

‘Umm How about you two go ahead and we'll meet there, I've just remembered that I got something. . . else to somewhere else. ’Those vultures remained unconvinced by my plea and body movement, both of them even offered themselves to accompany me to somewhere. Our original course of action changed, going into a loop, it happened quite often lately, too often for my liking.

‘So, are you going to tell us where we're going now? I hope it's job-related, I also want to know who made you our leader, your majesty. ’

‘I have to agree with the gal there, I believe I might make a better one, especially with my set of leadership abilities and traits. ’

‘Listen up, just trust me, I know what I'm doing, we're taking a small shortcut to the restaurant, I promise I will explain everything there. ’Carla was reluctant as she grabbed and stopped me in my tracks.

‘You're not taking any more steps, so you either explain what's really going on or we're all going back to the headquarters, with or without your consent. ’Unfortunately, I couldn't lie my way out of it, so I decided to lay it all on the table

‘What I'm about to tell you might sound. . insane to believe. I have booked an appointment with the mayor and we're supposed to meet up with him there. ’Carla continued questioning me after hearing that, doubting every word that came out of my mouth.

‘Wait, didn't you say something like where it all started? And when did you make that appointment? You're such a bad liar, if you wanted to check out the restaurant and if it's okay with Francis too, maybe we can make a stop there for a few minutes, is that fine with you? ’When it came to food, Francis didn't even think twice about it, we all agreed once again and went there, a few miles back from where we previously were, but it wasn't a problem. I think I know what I lost there. We kept going until we got to the place, which was empty and not in the usual way. I could see it in both of their faces that they didn't expect this either, the whole restaurant was point blank empty. A giant empty structure with no table, no chairs, nothing inside. Somehow, over the past minutes, everything disappeared, not even some dust or signs from the objects being moved were left there, peculiar.

‘Well, this right here looks like a story worth staying for, mayor or not, I'll take this one. ’ Said Francis before entering and starting to check it more closely.

‘Maybe they've just moved, what do you say, should we really waste our time with it or leave it to Francis? Also, what was the reason again, for leading us here? ’ She said whilst pointing at me accusatorily.

‘I didn't know this. . . whole moving situation happened, to be fair, I don't know what I was expecting to see. Carla, we might as well check it out since we're here. ’Francis shortly came back to back me up and my idea.

‘I think we should really focus on this, the sudden vanish of an entire restaurant? Nothing ever happens in this town anyway, I can bet on the fact that whoever makes an article about it will get a raise. 'He was absorbed by greed, Carla by wrath, while I was still confused, trying to remember. I know I woke up here, but I also know that I lost my grip from something else, I can't shake the feeling of wanting it back with all my heart and soul. What could it be? This place looks like it was erased from its entire existence, in no way everything could be moved away in this amount of time. I felt somewhat attracted to the middle of the room, not even realising when I entered the building. The more I concentrated on it, the less I could hear my friends and conflicts. I followed my instincts, going into the silence of my own mind, noticing a hole in the floor. I've got no idea how I didn't notice it, from the distance everything looked normal. . enough questioning now, I should make my move and ask myself later. The pain I felt inside was unmaskable, but it was shortly followed by slight relief, anger and other passing feelings and affected senses. I could hear whispers coming from the small, almost perfectly rounded hole, faintly and in a language that I couldn't recognise. My ears were right above the hole, still I couldn't make anything of it.

'Douq Saith Rye Swat I fro Brr Fin Sot. '

They sounded like mumbles, me getting closer to its source didn't help with the understanding at all. I took my ear off and tried looking closer to it, trying to see what was inside there, but nothing in there. The hole was big enough for someone's hand to fit, it might have grown in size after I took my ear away. The more I looked at it, the more I started thinking that this might be a setup, everything got removed and the trap got laid in its place, awaiting its prey. But what if it wasn't? I know I should act and shouldn't be so paranoid, but everything looked both in and out of order. The whispers continued and now I was able to hear them even more clear inside my head.

'Rotanev Flee ad the sots sic on no to tab el!' Still, I wasn't able to understand, that's why I had to take the gamble so I would get away from it. I showed my hand inside the hole and like I thought, it fit right in. It was quite deep, too deep for my comfort and liking, but I could feel something inside it, something in the hole that I could reach and take. And I did it, safely pulling out. The hammer. I knew I forgot something here, but why this and why in here? The whispers also stopped after taking it out, even the silenced died with them. I got up after, still looking at it, I won't let it get out of my sight again, especially now that I know that it can keep the whispers away. What could I do with it now? Something other than hitting nails from around the house. After turning back to them, both Francis and Carla looked at me like I was some sort of monster. They were shaking and slowly walking away.

'Are you two feeling well? I've found this. . . wait, I'm not going to hurt you. . . please stop trying to get away from me. '

Not a single word came from their mouths, except some sounds and genuine fear as if they were in a trance. This tool was too. . . I can't explain the feeling. I know I've felt it before, for the second time in my life. I am sure that this is a real object, perhaps it was time to find out if the rest was also real. While thinking about it, they've managed to get out and lock me in, like a mad animal in a cage that's waiting to be put down, not this time, not me. I'm not going to hurt them, I'm just going to find out, once and for all what's really happening. Time to make it right, I walked closer to the door and did the right thing, I started striking at the door, cracking it piece by piece. The door bled a strange white substance from its cracks, followed by the whispers that came back to me, this time speaking in my own tongue, begging me to stop, which I ignored and kept on destroying the door.

'You will kill us both. . . . stop it before it's too late!' It kept trying to get into my head and make me stop, I don't know If I can trust it.

'What are you doing to me? What are. . . ? 'A break was needed from it and also for me to understand what it tried to say, the pain that I've inflicted on the door came right back to me.

'Look. . . I don't. . . 'My muscles were inflamed, I could barely speak or breathe , when I looked down I noticed a pool made out of a white and red coloured substance. I knew that the red one was my blood, dripping from my nose and mouth. . but my mind isn't damaged yet.

'I don't know what you are. . if you don't explain. . . we're both going to. . . going to be. . 'Both substances kept dripping on the ground and still no response, if it thinks it can just ignore me, it has another, ugh. . . . I could feel it. . reaching to my head. . . It will get me if I don't act. . . I struck the door another time, this time, I've managed to smash right through it and get outside. The scream inside my head was loud, enough to give me a headache. Carla and Francis were outside for the whole time? 'Help. . me' I tried calling them, but they ran away after I opened my mouth, leaving me alone in pain.

'Tse non Of lo satyr of mr flock ed I in an erg!?' '

'I can't understand. . you. . . bastard. 'I tried shouting, but my throat pain prevented me from it.

'We're both. . . in pain. . . who. . what are you? 'I kept trying to appeal to it, hoping to reach. . to understand it. So far, I only knew that it reacts to pain. What if it's right? Then we're both going to die if we're damaged enough. Fine, a small rest and I will continue after, I don't know if you can hear my thoughts but. .

'I will break you. . . even if I have to. . . break myself in oder. . . to do it. 'I had to pull myself together, my friends. . . where did they go? What am I thinking? Just like before, I was deceived, this isn't real. I didn't even know how many times I've asked myself about what's real or not. This was worse than feeling deja vú, it kept burning through my mind. There needs to be an escape from this madness but where? I've tried going to Mannorstare and that backfired, but I never tried to run outside to another town or place I haven't seen before. I don't know if this is my choice or if I've been guided so far, but I'll do it, the hammer also stays with me. Then it was decided, I was ready to leave again and leave everything behind, even the structure cracked up and crashed into rubble and dust. If it was my doing, intentionally or unintentionally, I don't know, but the place is forever sealed in my memories and I hoped it won't get reconstructed anymore, to become a reminder that it's not over yet. I started walking, trying to head towards the outskirts of the town. I knew that doing the same attempt once again, leaving it, was probably going to end up like a failure, but I had no other choice than try my luck once again. What could I do? Just live my life as if nothing happened? I'd rather just die than live an unreal version of reality whilst knowing what I know. On my way, I passed people who just ignored me, they weren't scared like Carla or Francis. None of them neither looked surprised nor scared off the unexplainable event that just happened, how could this be? I didn't look what lay in front of me because I accidentally pushed Darya back and made her drop all her groceries down.

'I'm truly sorry. . . . I can't talk now. . . I didn't mean. . 'I didn't stop, I couldn't stop, not even for her, but I did take a look behind and saw her on the ground picking them up and looking at me with deep sadness in her eyes. Feeling sorry for it didn't help since the task at hand was too important to ignore. My eyesight was finally straightened up and once again I was on a mission, this time, it will end different, at least, that's what I hope. I took the main street, hoping I would cut some time off to get out but a huge crowd gathered in front of me, slightly farther away but still close enough, blocking the road in their path. I wonder what they're doing there. As I got closer to them, going through it, forcing my way between the other citizens, getting pushed around to the point where I almost got pushed down. The person who did it will surely regret it, luckily I didn't end up on the ground or else I would have. Shame, though, that would be a kick to someone who's already on rock bottom, perhaps it would have been. I was shocked, the reason they were all gathered around, Francis's body was laying down with a knife stuck deep inside his body. I know that this isn't real and perhaps we weren't the best of friends, but the simple thought of it was repulsing. Something snapped inside my head. I felt the backpack on my back again, afraid to reach and see if I still held the knife inside it. I had to go away, as far as possible from.

'There. . . officer, the culprit came back to the crime scene! Apprehend. . .' A person from the crowd pointed towards me accusatively. Other people around me blocked my way out after trying my best to escape. The officers that were checking the body came not only to their senses but also to my arrest.

'Wait, this isn't what it looks like, I didn't do. . .' There was no way I could explain or pardon myself in this unfair world, it was beyond my power when they came and arrested. . . a youngster that stood next to me? I stepped out of the way with the rest of the other people who left the officers to their jobs. That was a close one, still it's no time for mourning or squirming from that small mistake I've almost done. While trying my best to avoid them so I wouldn't get my time wasted being questioned, I jumped over Francis's body, going straight to my path. None of them saw me do that, except, maybe some townsfolk, but I kept going my way, trying to escape everything that was being thrown at me. I won't be slowed down anymore from getting my questions answered. Almost there, out of the nameless and shameless town, from the peak to the bottom of the nest I was headed. I was on the move and I wasn't the only one, I should have known it wasn't going to be easy, my eyesight got affected and so did every colour beyond me leaving nothing but shades of gray, black and white. No, this can't happen, I've instinctively take a look on my hands, noticing that they were changed too, followed by my clothes. Nothing but a slight annoyance that did nothing to stop me as I already got out of the town. With no one behind to slow or follow me. I kept walking towards what used to be the road that leads towards Mannorstare, but instead, I've arrived at a crossroad which was made out of two paths. Two paths separated from each other by a dark forest with ash like and black trees that sprang between their twins. Too tall to be climbed over, as narrow as a crushed mountain pass with no way to pass from as far as I could see. I wanted to take a step back and check my options but it got out of hand, whilst turning around, I saw nothing before me. The only thing I could see was darkness, covering up everything but the small path I was on, neither the sky nor the ground was there and even when I tried reaching forwards with my hand, I couldn't feel anything, not even the ground. Even my hand looked as if it disappeared up to my wrist, I was standing at the edge of something I couldn't even fathom how deep it was. I don't understand any of these occurrences, but I can't let that stop me here just because there's no way for me to go back. I turned around and, in front of my eyes, the crossroad changed too, one of the paths was made of stone. Stalactites started to erupt out of everywhere including thin air, narrowing the path. A single light could be seen from distance, unable to guide me. The event was so fascinating and strange to watch uncover in front of my eyes that I didn't pay any attention to the other one. It stopped after a while, leaving not that much space but enough for me to make it through, also, it wasn't until the eruption was over that I've got to look upon the other path that laid at hand. The other one, from the right, changed, but there was the other one from the left, the one that I've ignored was just a simple road, yet it had a strange attraction towards me. I tried looking towards where it lead, wanting to know where it ends or leads, but I wasn't able, I couldn't see it from the spot I was on. Something off and sad felt about it but I wasn't sure why I tried looking some more at it from the distance and noticed that some of the plants and trees on and around the road were dead and broken. I was reluctant to turn around, fearing that everything might change again, perhaps I was more afraid that it might end unturned. This was it, I wasn't sure there was a way for me to return after I chose a path, everything left behind might as well disappear as it did before. The question left at hand was, which choice was wrong and which one was right? I don't think I've ever been presented with such a selection if only I could think more clear about it if I wasn't affected by this mild annoyance. I might suffer from achromatopsia and I don't even know how the term came up to me. Focus, focus, two paths, one changing, one dying, if appearances are indeed deceiving. I could pick the wrong path and who knows, rather, what knows what might happen to me. It's all my fault, I should just try breaking both of the roads bit by bit, slab and slab leaving nothing but rubble. Though I wouldn't want to end up buried in it in the process. Ugh, I can't believe I'm getting worked out over nothing, I keep forgetting that it's not. . nothing, everything is just too complicated, I wish it was easier. I wish I wasn't alone. What happens after you figure out that the life that you lived, the people, your friends, your family, all those connections and feelings are nothing but lies? It's strange, now that I've got the time to reflect on my life, I can't remember my life spent in the town, or even its name. Just mere events from time to time that used to suffice, followed by the breaks from my non-existent dreams. Should I choose the road with the dying trees? If only It meant the sweet relief, I could finally end the loop, maybe that's the reason I felt strange when I take a look at it. If one of the paths leads to one end, that could only mean that the other leads to. The stalactites broke down into pieces, making way for the gravel to quickly gather up to form smaller versions of the buildings I've seen before in the town. Not exactly the same, but merged with the black trees, making a sweet architectural and natural symphony of tree houses. Far ahead there, I could see my parents, real or not, I was able to recognise them, after all, these years. It tries to draw me back in, back into the other world, I don't know if I want it any longer. I don't think I will be needing this anymore, regardless of my choice. One last glance at the hammer, the only object I thought to be real, before throwing it away and watching it vanish before my eyes. Such a burden, the one of knowing the sad truth and being forced to keep the information alone. I've had no one to share with. I've felt afraid before but it all pales compared to this. What will happen if I go on that dead road? Will it really lead me to my death? I don't know if there's an afterlife. I don't know if the thing that made all this can create an image of that either. My very own life essence is dying inside me, in this moment of clarity, I felt it, it's been dying for some time. If I just wait here, not being forced to choose, what if that was an option for me to take? But then I would probably be completely drained and die anyway and who know how much will that take. How am I even able to see or feel that? The more I spent in here, starring in front of a crossroad, the more I felt the same thing I've felt during desperate times. That I was my own enemy, conspiring against myself to lose track of important choices. I really want to choose something but it was hard, I might not get another chance at this, especially since there was no way back and I threw the only tool that could hurt that thing. I still wasn't sure what was inside my head earlier, or even if it ever left it. I wasn't going to talk myself out of this, no matter what choice I'll make, it will all be over. The second road, no, I should call it the first one, changed once again, synchronizing with my thoughts and state of mind, the buildings crumbled, the trees fell to the ground, forming the faces of everyone I've ever met in my life. It was a long road, especially with everyone staring at the ground, with the stone and wooden limbs and torsos coming on to make their bodies. They were all there waiting for me, all silent, some deaf, others mute but they were my friends, they wanted to bring me back home where I also wanted to be. One, in particular, made me feel unsure of my choice but I didn't recognise who that was. My feelings were conflicting with each other, tears came out of my eyes, tears in batches and never ending. I wanted to be with them, I really did, too late since my choice was already done.

'I'm sorry my friends. We really are. 'My last words to them before they cracked and bled. I hope this path will offer me release and peace. If there are my. . no. . if this will be my death, I will be truly happy for once. My legs with the entire body got heavier, I couldn't see anymore what laid in front of me. The hardest decision from my entire life wasn't choosing the road but deciding to end a chapter from my life. A chapter that's been impairing, clouding my decisions and made me forget what I really wanted. In the end I did not feel pain, I didn't even feel my body at all, I tried glancing at my hand but I couldn't see them, just dust, scattered away. I kept going until I wasn't able to do it any longer, the ground was so soft that it became a part of me. I don't know what will happen to me but I'm. . . at ease. My head started feeling like it was in flames, the pain was excruciating. . . I can't. . . I can't. . . breathe.

'Another one of the subjects dies. I really hoped the achromanyxicon would continue feeding on them while they're still breathing. We should prepare this one's replacement soon. '

'Understood, but what of the remains of. . . let me check the list. Apparently there was no name, I guess it won't be missed by anyone anytime soon, I presume. '

'Leave the remains in, the remaining fluids and cadaverous remains will serve soon enough. Now, return to your assignments. '

'As you wish sir, I'll get right to it. 'A new sacrifice must be made to appeal the celestial, with the hunger only increasing, I couldn't even begin to fathom what it might do if we decided to starve it. I left him alone to attend to the celestial and returned back to the outside world, away from the depths filled with misery and regret. Hidden underground, away from the eyes of the mundane world, they would never understand, those fat maggots, they deserve everything that's coming to them. I hated every single one of the people in this town, except some of them, the rest served as a reminder of my past failures. This town is big, but the people in it are shallow and bitter, just perfect for ripping.

'There you are brother, I've been looking for you for the entire day, you worthless parasite waste enough of my time as it is, so come on. 'I smiled back at my brother and ignored what he said, I wasn't going to show him any sign of weakness.

'I'm sorry for making you wait for Cristopher, I was. . 'Without any warning he punched me violently in the nose, making me lose some blood in the process.

'Does it look like I care about your pathetic explanation little brother? Now it's time to go back home, I will hear no whining on the way back or else. They'll keep coming. 'He took me by the wrist and forced me to walk at his pace. There were other people outside, but none of them stepped in, they never did anything to get involved with us. His hand felt like an iron chain, staggering and hurtful and I was his prisoner, taken throughout the town with people staring and wondering what I've done wrong as if it was my fault in all of it. I tried looking away from them so I wouldn't get in even more trouble with him. The rest of the duration of the road was long and not even once did I think about getting away from him. Sure, it felt awkward and I had to open them from time to time, soon it was over when we got home. Upon entering, I was released by my warden and went straight to my mother, staying as far as I could from him. There she was, staying alone in her chair, the only person who's kind to me. . . used to be kind to me. I grabbed her hand and stood by her side for a while, just the two of us, my brother already left out presence with no decency, not even for our sweet mother.

'I'm back mother. I hope your day wasn't as hard as mine. You know, it's really hard for us too, at least for me. We. . miss you mother, I miss talking to you, I miss calling us a family. 'My grip on her hand grew slightly tighter, yet no reaction, as usual, even if the doctor said it would help, just a liar, like all of them. But why her? She doesn't deserve this.

'Don't worry mother, I'm going to make everything just like before, that's the least I can promise. Then we can be a family once again. 'It's late and the nurse didn't say if she's coming today or not, I should prepare the dinner just in case. I had to cook for myself and the rest of the family, the food wasn't that good but at least, we weren't starving. After so much practice I got good at roasting chicken and boiling the soup. I wasn't a chef but she didn't spit it out. I got on the work right on the clock, without any flavours or other ingredients, just the same like before. An extra dish for my brother too, but we had enough. The food was ready not too long after, I brought the chicken to my mother first, cutting it into small pieces so she wouldn't choke on it, slowly leading them towards her mouth, piece by piece. She barely ate the food but I had enough patience. I stood right by and fed her, it was hard to do it, especially with the blank expression on her face, barely seeing any reaction or hearing any thought. At least, she didn't forget how to chew, it would have been much worse in that case.

'Come on, another bite. . . and, that's it. You know, I've been hanging with professor Presley lately. You should get to meet him someday, he reminds me of. . . you know. . 'Enough of this, she should take some of the soup and go to bed, it's late and I've still got work to do.

'We still have some of that soup that Alicia made. . . I just wanted you to know that. . . 'I was quick with the soup so it wouldn't end up cold and waited near her, spoon after spoon until it was empty. After she was done eating, I've led her to the bed and placed her there. The bed sheet was big enough to reach her once golden hair, after that, I kissed her for 'good night' Chris isn't around, right, I need to search someone first, then I'll go and eat, the job was above my personal comfort. I went outside and locked the door tight, going out by myself could be dangerous at this hour, but I have this pocket knife hidden away, borrowed from my dear brother to keep me safe. I started walking down the street, trying to look for someone who wouldn't be missed, a disposable individual. Most people are in their houses now, perhaps there's a homeless man I could take advantage of, that's right, I could search for one in the public square. I wanted to change my direction but I heard someone coming from behind me, approaching fast I concur. I kept walking with my heart between my teeth, I was afraid to look back and I didn't want to scream for help, that would alert and he'd attack me. My step speed got changed progressively, hopefully, he wouldn't be able to notice. I can still hear him, behind me, the prowler on his hunt. I know, perhaps I can reach the professor's house, it's not too far now. My hand reached into the pocket, reaching the small knife, shaking with sore muscles. I was able to feel my lungs pumping the air, in and out at an alarming rate. All of the sudden, I felt a grip on my shoulder. After that I broke down, I hastily turned around whilst taking the knife out and after that, I stabbed the guy in his gut. It was so fast that it took me a couple of seconds to realise what I've done.

'What have I done? No. . no. . this wasn't supposed to happen!' I was too afraid to pull the knife out so he wouldn't start bleeding, instead, I thought that he was probably just a teenager.

'Agh, why did you d. . . ' I tried comforting him but I could see that he was in pain, ready to bleed to death. 'Keep your hand on the wound. I know who can help us. . just do it, I'm sorry, I thought you were trying to hurt me!' He's probably not even in his eighteens, what have I done? He couldn't speak but he tried to get away from me, even if I didn't want to let go of him.

'Please. . . leave me. . . I'm begging you. . '

'It was an accident, you got to trust me, I told you already that I know who can help. . 'Neither of us felt fine with it but we kept going, almost there, oh no. . . I hope no one saw me.

'Just hang onto me, I won't let you die, you won't pass away yet. ' He was heavy but we got in front of the professor's house, I don't think anyone saw us. I had an extra key to his house, so we got in fast, I could see from the looks of it that he might not make it. . .

'Mister Prisly, please, are you here? ' 'Agh, make. . . it stop. . . it stings too much. . . please. . 'Blood came out of his mouth, dripping on the floor, thankfully the professor heard both of us and came quickly to our location.

'Sweet lord, what have you done Sam? I told you to bring someone who's still alive, haven't I? At least, that's what I thought I did. 'I could tell that he was mad at me, but time's short.

'I've got no time to explain, can we help him? '

'Fine, his wounds should be covered once we get there, just bring him down. . . nevermind, I'll give you a hand.

'This poor guy, it wasn't my fault, we both took a side, me and the professor and lead him to the secret entrance from the basement, going through the catacombs whilst he was still alive. Everything happened fast for some reason, I didn't know if I was still in shock, maybe I was, who could tell? We got to one of the empty vessels, there we left the boy down for some time. I was still barely breathing because. . 'Calm down, it's okay, he will be healed, after all, he has the chance of becoming part of something bigger than him. I need your help now to load him in, do you think you can handle that right now? Look at me Sam! I nodded my head and helped him open the vessels, we both took a side and pushed him inside it with care before closing it up. The vessels was transparent, I could still see the small appendages coming from inside, thick and long, entering his stomach wound and filling with colorless goo. The boy was unconscious at this point, he probably didn't even feel anything that was happening to him. But this wasn't the end of it, those appendages I saw before stretched from behind his neck, reaching and covering up his mouth, nose, eyes and ear holes and sockets, cauterising and blocking his orifices. He didn't need air or food anymore and since he wasn't rejected, this operation was successful. Bigger ones came to tie his hands and legs to prevent any movement or possible inconvenience. The connection was complete, the being most likely already got to his brain through his nostrils or his spinal cord. I was always fascinated by the process and how it saved so many of the people who came into contact. I looked back at the professor as he checked the vessels to see if everything kept its structural integrity, like the previous vessels.

‘Is everything in order prof? If I may explain myself. ’

‘Sam, were you followed? Did anyone see you with this man? ’ He was concerned, an explanation was needed fast, that's why I told him:

‘No, I don't know, I don't think. . . no. We both moved fast enough to avoid. . ’ He made lapses, from his front ending to his back, thinking what to do. Sam did it, this time, preparations must be done to cover the new subject, this is the last thing I needed, attention from the outside world coming from an association with a young murderer. And he's just standing there, scared, probably thinking that he might end up rotting in a jail, he probably might.

‘Look, Sam, I've got experience in this. . kind of situation per say, if no one saw you, then that's one less concern to think about. I need you to do something for me now, you have to stay away from my house for a couple of days, just to be completely sure that we're in no danger to get discovered, okay? Have I made myself clear? ’ Sam barely shook his head, being shocked also made him useless, his hands shaking, his eyes were red and close to tears, the kid was barely standing on his own two feet. Then he finally decided to give me an answer, after I gave him the time for it.

‘Yes. . . I will, I did. . . that's what I wanted to say, I understood. ’ He was ready to take his leave, but he rashly turned around to me before doing so,

‘Wait, professor, the knife. . . it's my brother's and I think it's still bloody, what about it? I can't be found like. . . I can't go to jail and leave my mother alone. . with him. ’

‘I almost forgot about it, it has been too long since the last time I've done something like this. Lay down for a moment while I'll think about what's out next course of action. ’ Sam complied with my command. He can't go back home now, not yet, his clothes must be washed, and his knife too, speaking of which, where's the weapon? ‘Where's the weapon, do you still have it?

‘He started looking and searching his pockets, finding nothing of the sorts. He didn't show me anything except his empty hand. Which could only mean that ‘You lost the knife, haven't you? ’ He looked past me, avoiding my question, he probably lost it somewhere along the way here.

‘I must find it fast before anyone else. ’

‘Professor wait. . . the knife. ’

‘I know Sam, I have to go back and find it, there's no one who must see or acquire it except us, that's why. ’

I was interrupted again from my thoughts, the boy must be taught some manners after it's all over. What could he be starring at a time like this? After turning around, I told him:

‘It's just the vessels, I know you've discovered a certain interest about it but there are more important. . . ’ ‘Look, professor, that's what I kept trying to point out, it's in the vessels, the knife is still plunged. . . ’ Sam is right but the knife is now covered in the colorless substance, still inside him, I can't remove it now that the small chamber has been sealed. .

‘Sam, did you leave the knife inside him during this whole time? ’

‘I'm sorry about it, I thought I took it out. . . but I need it, I took it out from my brother's room. ’ This was going to turn out quite challenging but nothing was out of my reach.

‘Sam, go out stairs and wash your clothes. Make a bath too while you're at it. There's also the problem with this fellow over here who we saved. You've never met him, understood? ’

‘Yes, prof. . . and. . is he going to be fine now? I can't take any more stress. . . with this and my mother. . ’ ‘He was saved by the celestial, now go, I still have to attend to the restoration of the other damaged vessels, this minor setback has gone long enough. ’

‘Wait. . . I almost forgot about it. . about my mother, should I go back after I've disposed of the filth and the blood spots from my clothes? ’

‘No! Haven't you heard me? We can't afford to draw any attention to us right now, you're going back home the first thing in the morning, now go, clean up and sleep. ’ Sam left after that, still scared, he didn't even look back, maybe I was harsh with him. . . too much is at stake now. I will go to the guest room. . . first thing in the morning and apologise. Where was I anyway? Oh right, the vessels. I went towards the broken vessels to continue my previous investigation. Somehow the last person that used it managed to gain some awareness and cracked it with a hammer. This may prove to be a real problem, if this one did. Who knows if the new lad might awaken too and make use of that knife. Hmm, shards on the floor, almost crystallised, they must have come from inside it, I should put on a pair of gloves before I touch them. A pair was already waiting for me on the table. I had no other choice but to use them, even if they were rough on the sides. I turned back to the broken pieces, it was quite fascinating, even after so many years of taking care of it, it's hard to believe that it's not invincible. The vessels should be regenerating in time, but the evolution is delayed even more. I touched the shards from the floor, they felt like nothing I've touched before. They were completely different than their previous state when they were still part of the vessels. I should take note of this recent discovery, the new lad should be written down too. I took the shards and placed them away in a jar I've left before on the table, hermetically sealed, before tossing it aside. The small handbook I was carrying came in hand when I started writing the progress down.

‘January 1925. The vessels has started its recovery. I managed to store away some of its broken pieces. Everything should go just as planned, the previously consumed subject has been successfully replaced by, what seems to be, another unnamed stag. On a personal note, I'm trying to think about what could he be dreaming about. A mental connection can't be established at this period of time, at least not yet. One can only speculate about what he will have to go through. End of entry. ’ I should go back and check on Sam since there isn't anything else to do. I will find out the progress on the restoration process later. The old celestial must have connected with him, right about now, forever closed in his dream, at least for the time being. Away from the conflict that brought him here and sealed in a safe memory for his own protection. His life got saved; the price got paid.

‘It's a nice town, he will get a better education here, he might even grow up to become an independent adult like his father. ’

‘Yes honey, can we not start it again in front of him? . . . ’ My mother always looked at my father with a smile, before continuing the bitter start of a fight.

‘I was merely saying that I'm just hoping he'll end up like his father, who's clearly not taking any advice from his parents rather than thinking for himself, even for one damn moment, pff!’

‘And what would you have me doing? They're helping us both financially and emotionally, I won't just turn my back on them after how much they've provided for us. They're also. . Technically your parents-in-law too, you could, at least, show some respect for them. ’ They both kept arguing for a while we were on the street, I didn't even get the chance to see my new house yet. . .

'I'm not going to be the man of the house instead of you, what example are you giving to our son when you can't even stand to your parents? I'm telling you, I didn't keep him inside of me for nine months just to grow up without a spine like his father, you could, at least, grow one for his sake. 'I felt like saying something though she almost told me that's not polite to talk back to your parents, I don't know why it was so different when it came to him. Why isn't he standing up to her? A mother should love the dad like she loves me, we still get into fights sometimes but not like this, it started happening quite often lately. I wish they'd stop it before it reached the point of them splitting up and I wasn't thinking just about this fight. . . I wish. . she was here too, she would know what to do. Before I could even enter the new house, or have my chance into their fight, sort of, they got interrupted by a man to come to greet us. I think I saw him before, perhaps in the past lifetime.

'Greeting madame, sir and the one and only lad. I believe we have met before, I am called Mister Fizzlerob, your new and hopefully future-old landlord. 'My mom quickly and stealthily bashed my father with her elbow so he would greet our landlord back. Their fight has ended soon after. They wouldn't normally stop until one of them was hurt. I guess this would be one of those special occasions that I've been waiting for.

'Ehm, yes, Mr Fizzlerob, It's nice. I mean it's my pleasure to meet you again. . my wife too. 'Well mannered, he almost bowed down and kissed the hand of my mother, but stopped right in time for my father.

'That's enough, we didn't really get to see our new home, so could you show us around. . . um Mister Rob, if it's not a discomfort for you. 'The landlord wasn't offended by that, even laughed at my father's expense.

'Don't worry Fred, it would be my pleasure to show you around and to your delightful companion. ' 'Ehm, wife? ,

'To your wife too. Now, if you may follow me. . 'We all followed him into the house, some of us anxious, others defensive but I presume they liked it. It was everything I wanted from the place I would spend most of my time in, a crescent of colours spread across the wall. Shades of green, yellow and white that covered the entire house from top to bottom. Even the furniture made its way here, even earlier than us. The bouncy couch didn't look any better than it did before as it almost barfed the fancy rug under us. I'm glad that for once, the small paintings on the wall didn't end up on the ground with shards to accompany them. The place almost made me feel mesmerised, with no fights around and with no roads to fill, I felt truly happy. All of those things made me forget for the time being about all the friends I've left behind before moving into this new town, especially since I've got no one now. I don't know how much will it take, but my parents will probably go and find themselves new workplaces and leave me all alone, just like my sister. I laid down on the wooden floor, not soft, neither too rough, watching above, just thinking and reminiscing about the past, how did I get here? It must have been merely a couple of months ago, as I thought about it, it seemed like the memories started manifesting right in front of my eyes and body. A blink of an eye and I was in front of a table with both of my parents standing and eating. I looked back at them before looking around.

'Are we back to our old house again? How did we get back here? 'This must either be a dream or someone granted me my wish. They both looked at me funny after that. Especially she did.

'Are you, okay son? Are you still feeling sad about it? '

'Leave the poor boy at ease, I'm sure he's just tired, that's all, right? 'They were both concerned, staring at me, while

I just stood like a dog in a corner, trying to figure out what happened.

‘Oh I got it, you just thought you could play a mischief on me, just as a tease because we moved. It wasn't that funny so. Just stop!’ I got up as I said that and slammed my fists angrily on the top of the table, making it shake a bit.

‘Theodore B. From veil, sit down this instance. I will not allow you to disturb our small family dinner with your senseless accusations. ’I was placed back down by my mother, maybe, somehow, she didn't know either what happened. I can't read them well from their face expressions. The only one I could figure out was my mother, being mildly annoyed by me.

‘Then, maybe you, eh, maybe you should apologise to your mother for that outburst. ’He's right, I did blow up a for a short while, but how did I. . . if they didn't?

‘Theo? Are you waiting for something? You mother is rather upset as it is. Pff, honey, maybe he didn't mean it, you said it yourself before, we should indeed cut him some slack. . ’They both got up from the table and started talking to each other, farther away than I could hear, leaving me alone and confused at the table. This situation was awkward, they both stood in their seats, arguing as if nothing has happened. Without even knowing that someone granted me my deepest wish. Maybe not my deepest one, close enough to it. Perhaps even farther away from my deepest possible wish. While they were still fighting, I thought that I could do something productive and find out if we were really in the past. I pulled my cheek, flinching it a bit, the pain stood there for a couple of seconds, making it as red as an apple. I don't know why I did it so hard, I thought this could be a dream, but that's out of the table now. That's it, I got up and snicked to the kitchen unnoticed. On the wall, next to where the cabinets where the food was stored laid a calendar that read the exact date of ‘August 10th’ I guess the date works and this is my old, my home. That meant that perhaps going through the distant past was possible. If only. The kitchen also had its back door, I went there and I opened it so I could take a better look outside. I couldn't believe it but we just came back to the town of Huffinghtee. There it is, the house of mysteries, I've always wanted to go there but I've never had the chance to. And I see that the garden was still in its place next to the tortoise fountain. Not to mention that Muriel hasn't bought her old house back yet. Good old times.

‘There you are, could you come back so we could finish our family dinner?’ I turned around and faced my dad, he noticed it too, that the face expression that I had before changed, I was feeling joy, close to it at least.

‘Yes dad, in a bunch, you could just wait for me there. ’No, this wasn't a joke nor a dream. This was actually a second chance for me to do the right thing and prevent my parents from moving and breaking their promises. I followed him, a couple of steps behind, there was. . . there is enough time to pursue them, to stop some things that. We all resumed our activity, I had no time to eat, though, I had a lot of planning to do, so I started pretending that I was eating, circling the food from my plate with a fork. Carefully thinking what should I do with the information I had. Some would abuse the information I had. Damn, If only I knew the right winning ticket numbers. I shouldn't let them know what's happening, if I act normal, I'm sure they won't notice it. I'm almost entirely sure they will forget my past outburst like they do with everything I've ever done before it.

‘Theodore, stop playing with your food and eat it already. I don't want to be forced to re-introduce the table manners from behind your head. ’

‘I'm sorry mother, I was just feeling, um, full, after such a great dinner you've cooked. ’She didn't seem pleased by my light lie and tried to corner me inside the small table. My punishment was most likely being beat for my questionable behaviour. Not her best job hiding it.

'It's okay, just go back upstairs. I'll take care of the dishes. 'I looked at her, surprised as she has never done that, it was out of her character. How could she show emotion? Not to mention doing something for someone else without being forced to.

'I'm fine, mother, I can wash them myself, no need to trouble yourself with them. 'But my mother didn't stop there and didn't let me either.

'Theodore, I wasn't asking you to do it, so go to your room, now!' My father had to step in after to calm her down, to prevent her from popping again, when all of the sudden:

'Calm down dear, he's only trying to help, just do as she said Theo, go to your room. 'I didn't wait for a third warning, so I just went upstairs, leaving both of them alone, yet another time. I should have known that except our location, nothing else has changed. Some minor things didn't count. Upon going back and entering my room, I wanted to be happy, it wasn't that much of a surprise that nothing has changed between them, but for some reason, I just couldn't do it. The thought of having to hear the same fights and arguments during the next months killed my joy. I couldn't focus on anything else but the two cursing voices from downstairs that echoed throughout the house. Well, changing everything wasn't my intention in the first place. I should start with small things If I could only remember something important, of, that's right, dad lost some money not so long ago while he was searching for some documents. Both him and my mother fought about it. He had to spend the entire night searching until he found them. Following that, he came home and got into another fight for leaving her alone. This trip must have also enhanced my memory, in no way could I remember that, in any other circumstance. In no way would I want to know that. And if my memory serves me right, it's going to happen tomorrow. Speak about being at the right place at the right time, I had to talk to him. There wasn't much time spent in the room since I made my way towards theirs. I stopped at midway from a yell that I knew too well. Both of them were still arguing, I knew that, If I was going to go down there right now. I would only get tossed back here without even having my appeal heard. I tried imagining this entire deal, quite lively inside my head. Every single time I tried to think of a way to explain myself the image of my parents shouting at me came to mind. If this is how it's going to go, I'd much rather wait for the opportune moment, maybe even later towards the night, getting here drained me pretty bad. The bed looked just perfect for me to sleep on, having a calm thought that I wouldn't get disturbed from my slumber, I went for it. Everything will be perfect, I just laid on the soft side of the bed and went to sleep without even bothering to change into something else more suiting. My eyes and their voices stopped at the same time for my sleep to go undisturbed. I wasn't expecting a bedtime story, at least not in the mood they were in. Perhaps I'll ask them the next time. Every night before this one was filled with passion and glamour so far, distant worlds that succumbed to the touch of my feet, I wonder if this time It will be the same dream or something new, the time should reveal it soon enough. It felt like I could be falling forever. There was no way for me to see from where did I fall nor towards where will I land. Throughout it, I kept my calm and silently waited for it to end. After closing my eyes, I woke up in the middle of a town that I've never been to before. I've had lucid dreams before, but this was so real that it made me question if I was dreaming or not. Next to me there was a pottery shop, or, at least, that's what I thought it was. There were some small pots and handmade object, all of them far from my liking. I should enter if I'm going to take a better look at it. The moment I approached the door, I got shoved out of the way by someone. I landed on my back from the impact without being able to see who it was. I was glad about it, judging from the size, I wouldn't mess with it. Not even in a dream. I got right back up right ahead and tried to look in the direction where, whoever that was gone, I wasn't able to see anyone. I couldn't even see what he or she was dressed in, not that I cared about that, it's my dream, so I should focus on what I want to see, the door and the shop for now. After that short delay, I managed to open the door and walk right through. The place screamed in my face, fantastic, I took a look around to find pots and urns of all sizes, some small and others big. What they lacked is some colour but that could be easily fixed. I would have done it myself if the paint wasn't so expensive. And if it wasn't a dream. The owner of this store must have left it unattended for some time now. I could clearly see that some spiders made their homes into some of the pots. Or maybe this has a meaning, dad always used to tell me, right before going to sleep.

'Son, our dreams reflect who we really are. Don't let them shatter or your true self will be forever lost. 'I should have paid more attention back when he told it to me, maybe I should listen to him more, at least from time to time, just like we used to when we all had the family talks. The tail of my right eye noticed something I didn't before, right after I stopped reminiscing the past, the owner stood right behind the counter with his back turned to me. Quick to judge, maybe he wasn't the real owner, I hope he didn't hear me think out loud when I said it. He wore a Capotaian and such a privilege he had, standing in the middle of an empty pot store. Perhaps he was ashamed after getting into a fight with that giant person who left the store a moment ago. Hmm, why am I paying so much attention to it? Dreams don't always mean something in particular so it wouldn't surprise me if this didn't either.

'Hello there, I came here, in your possible establishment and. . umm, I noticed that your merchandise isn't in its best condition. There's a lot of dust everywhere if you would take a look. And spiders in your pots, not to mention that someone pulled their seeds and left them on the ground. Hello? Haven't you heard what I said to you? 'He completely ignored me, disrespectful having his back turned, not moving any muscle to greet me back. I couldn't see any backbone either from where I stood. Oh no, a bit of my mother must be rubbing onto me.

'What could you possibly be doing there, mister. . . sir? 'I started approaching him, closer and closer to the point when the counter area blocked both of us. I had to see his face for an unspeakable reason that kept pushing itself through my head. The desire got stronger with each passing moment that I kept switching sides to get to see him better. Not even his sides were visible. I kept treating it as it felt, like a real situation. Maybe I should get back and regain the reins of my dream. Then I could do something, surely I won't get punished for it. The worst thing that could happen is either getting kicked out or waking up. Having them both happen would be simply unimaginable. The time for action was near, I got up with my feet on the counter, looking at him from high above, still nothing, his face couldn't be concave, there's something on his face. I started focusing on one of the points of his face, trying my best to figure out what's going on with him. I could swear to myself that I started hearing strange sounds, like nothing I've heard before. I looked away from the owner, right at the pots but the sound didn't come from there. The sound kept drilling through my left ear, getting louder and louder. I was too afraid to look what made that infernal sound but I wasn't sure it came from the store. I tried confronting my fear but I got interrupted by him. The owner grabbed my leg and pulled me down under. I got dragged down, hitting the soft spot of my head on the hard edge of the counter. Against my will I was held down by him, still in pain. He held my leg still, ready to lunge at me at any given time. I wasn't able to see him that well but he was the source of another set of sounds. I had to get away and I had to do it fast. I struggled to get loose, kicking his hand with my other leg, I wanted to crawl on the floor and get out but I couldn't. He revealed himself, coming closer so I could be able to see him. Where's his face? There's nothing in there except an empty dark hole. I stared at it, not moving nor resisting his power. I wasn't that afraid of him, I couldn't feel anything, not even laid around me, the whole room wasn't there anymore, it all got swallowed just like I got, all inside that hole. My body started breaking and I could feel my face burning and dripping on the floor. My attempt of grabbing it was a failure as it slipped between my fingers. I was surprised until I realised that our places got swapped, our bodies changed. But that's me, my face fleeing away from me. I couldn't move from the spot I was on. I could only stay and watch as my body kept dripping, leaving nothing but a skull with a hole in it. After that big shock, I passed out, not even knowing what has transpired or why it did so. I suddenly opened my eyes and woke up. My dream was over and I was still lying on the bed, untouched. It's hard to believe that it took only one second in-between being there and here. My dreams sure got upgraded since I got here, which bring me back to, oh, I need to find my father as fast as possible. I got up and rammed the door, not knowing how early or late it was, or where he is, that wasn't going to stop me from searching for him. The door almost broke down from the impact of my shoulder, making me stagger on my way downstairs. The pain wasn't unbearable but I could feel it with each step and vibration through my body. That pain served as another reminder of my failure to tell my father sooner about what's about to happen. If only I could prove to them that I had knowledge about the future, perhaps they would believe me and we wouldn't have to move out of the house. Focus on it, I had to find him now, on a side note, I should get rid of the bad habit of talking to myself. At least, I wasn't doing it out loud and if I did, well, telling my father about the lost money would end up being the least of my worries. When I finally managed to get through the whole, long staircase, I arrived safely at the table and saw mum drinking her coffee, her morning coffee, which meant it was:

‘Morning mom, has dad left for work already? ’

‘He just went out through the door a minute ago, why are you asking? ’ ‘I'll explain later, I have to go now if I want to catch up with him. ’ I told her while I made my way beyond the door, trying to find where he went as fast as I could. I know where he works, maybe I could get there before and meet up with him there.

‘Wait, Theodore, where are you going. . . ? ’

I started sprinting and ignoring her plea, she could still hear me when I said: ‘Do not worry mother, I will come back after, but I need to see dad first. ’ , right before I entered the Mayne street and got lost in the crowd. We didn't live far from it, but so many people used it to get either to their working places, parts of the town and, ugh. . getting pushed around. Someone almost ran over me with no decency whatsoever. I can see why my parents. . . I can't really see where I'm going. . but I can now see why. . . they would want to move out. So many people of all colours and ranks, all impairing my movement and my will to reach. There was no other choice for me but to walk with them. I could take a turn for the next pass but that would take some time. And getting pickpocketed while doing it wouldn't be desirable. The flow of people kept on going. I haven't thought about them until now. Like this tall lady wearing an elegant dress that's just passing by, hand in hand with her daughter I presume, or this. . .

missed him, or her too. There's someone I actually used to know.

'Hey there old man Jack, it's me, umm Theo. '

'Oh Theo, wait a second. . ' He was almost gone, farther away in crowd, I barely managed to pull him back to me, closer, so, at least, we could both move away at the same speed.

'How are you, Theo? What are you doing here, out on the streets at the rushing hour? It's dangerous for someone of your age, let me just take you back. '

'Wait, Jack, please don't, I really need to get somewhere. ' Jack pulled me out near the sidewalk, after that I managed to take a look and see that I wasn't even that far away from where I started, I didn't manage to get far at all.

I looked at him and politely asked:

'Please, mister old man Jack, could you take me to my father's working place? It's of great importance that I get there in time. 'He looked at me before looking away and seeing my mother in front of the yard, being furious, almost blinded by her rage. I saw it too and I could feel what was coming for me even before it happened though I still had an important assignment.

'Listen here young boy. ' Before he knew it, I tried getting away so I could get lost back into the crowd but he grabbed me right as I was about to do it.

'Whoa whoa whoa there, don't do something that might cause you regret it later, I'm sure that your mother might appear mad right now, but deep inside she loves you. 'I wasn't able to escape this predicament. He had me going back to the house, even worse, back to her, but something that I wasn't expecting happened, one second she was mad and in the next one she only looked concerned as if something happened to me. I can deal with this after, maybe there might still be a chance for it. We were both still far away from her, so she couldn't hear us talk or whisper, it was time for my second attempt.

'Wait, Jack, before we go, I need you to do something for me if you can. ' 'Fine lad, spill it out, I'll try helping you unless you're asking me to let you go, which I will be inclined to decline. 'I bit my tongue while trying to think about it, either way, me, him or someone else, as long as the message was received by my father nothing else mattered. I didn't want to move from where I was, nor did I care if any consequences sprung to life. My mouth opened, my teeth unclenched when I told him:

'Listen, Jack, I need you to deliver a message to my father. Look, I know it's your day off and you're not as young as you used to be, but I need you to tell him. 'He immediately interrupted me and said: 'Hold on a minute, how do you know that today is my day off? As a matter of fact, was that one of the reasons that you ran away with the crowd, unattained or near your mother? All of that because you wanted to tell something to your daddy, is that right? 'He wasn't keen on my behaviour and he was ready to drag me back without hearing me out, unless.

'Okay boy, it's time to stop this facade. '

'Wait, I didn't want to tell you this yet, I don't know why I haven't thought about it earlier, but. 'I stopped him from his march for a moment, his full attention was bestowed upon me once again.

'Fine boy, but after this, it's back to your mother and no more lip biting. ' 'You see now, what I wanted to tell you is that, in two weeks from now, your wife will pass away from pneumonia. Despite what you might think about it, it's not a normal flue. '

‘Wait a second, you're talking about my wife there, what's wrong with you? I've had enough of this, off to your mother!’

He didn't listen to any reason, even if his wife's life was in danger. I was forced to go back, getting closer and closer.

‘Wait, you're making a terrible mistake, please, take her to a doctor, don't be stubborn about it. ’ ‘I've already told you I've had enough of you. I'll have a little talk with your mother before, ugh. ’ In the meantime, while Jack and I kept bickering at each other, she must have noticed a change in my behaviour. She must have thought that I was running away from her, as I saw tears running away from her eyes. When we got back to her, I was unhanded and sent back into the house, I would have to wait for them to finish talking before I would get my punishment. I couldn't hear them that well, not even when I tried eavesdropping on the door. Supported on the desk near it, I couldn't stop but think about my failure. I want to change the outcome of what might happen, but it's already my second day here and I haven't done anything right. Well, not anything right. Perhaps I shouldn't have tried to desperately do that. Maybe I should apologise and tell her about my real intention. The door suddenly bumped and my mother came back in, feeling uneasy but not entirely hostile towards me. The look on her face was neither of calm nor angry. She just saw through me as if I wasn't even standing there. I didn't know what was she expecting from me but I wasn't going to apologise. I paid too much attention that I haven't even noticed her lifting up her hand until it was high in the air. Afraid of it, I braced myself for the impact, knowing that it would end up leaving more than a bloody mark. Waiting and waiting for seconds to come, knowing that I will receive my punishment for disrespecting and leaving her side was revolting. Then it suddenly came. A warm and long pat on the head that not only made me open my eyes to see her crying while caressing my long hair but it also made me question her. ‘Why are you crying? If it's because of me, I wasn't my intention to run away from home. ’ That was never my real intention but I didn't want to be forced to leave the place I loved either. She only got closer and closer to me enough for a hug between mother and son to emerge. Our connection felt so much more than before. I didn't know why but I felt like we could relate to each other like we never did it before.

‘It's okay Theodore, it's okay, I'm not going to hurt you, I'm the one who should be sorry. ’ She wasn't upset with me but on herself? Has she felt guilt for punishing me? No, this can't be it, though I can't complain, I did miss her hugs, so her reason is none of my concern no me. Wait, maybe this is my chance, she'll listen to me, I said to myself after breaking out of her soft and caring hands, going farther away from her, just a couple of feet away. We've both looked at each other as she took a napkin out of her pocket to clean herself up from all the tears she once shed. Obviously, she hasn't washed in a while but I wasn't going to push my luck and tell her that. I waited for her to be done with it so we could go on with what I was about to say. And right after.

‘Mother, this might sound crazy and you might believe it's just a lucky coincidence but I know that you and dad want us to move to, move to. I can't remember the name of that town at this particular time. What I'm trying to say is that I don't want us to move from here. ’ At this point, I wasn't able to look he straight in her eyes. That's when I figured that I had to end it as fast as possible. After a deep breath, I kept on going with it.

‘I know that it hasn't been easy with, you know, dad and the way he lives, but I could try helping around. I could start searching for a place to work and help you out. Please, just don't force me to leave my friends, my promise. ’

Again. I confronted her once again, face to face but she didn't seem to care, I didn't even think she even listened to a word I've just spilt out of my mouth.

'Do you even care about me or her?' She's not even blinking right now, not like she used to. I didn't think she was actually ignoring me, she couldn't be.

'Mother? Mother, why are you doing this? Could you at least say anything, If I'm wrong or if you agree with me, anything would do.' I approached her to check if she was breathing, yet not even a muscle was moved on my way. She can't be, no, I need to call for help, I gently snicked my hand to the door and opened it, slipping behind her and getting outside. I tried my best to yell for 'Help, anyone?' All of them looked frozen in their places. None of them is moving, but how is this possible? The people from the crowd are standing still just like her, as I looked at the sky above I saw that the birds and clouds were also standing still but in mid-air.

'Am I still dreaming? Well, this would seem like a better turn for a nightmare.' There's not even a single soul that could hear me, same must have happened to my mother. I turned around to see her do the same for me. It was no dream but a nightmare, her face was pale when she did it, lifting both of her hands and rubbing her face around. I couldn't move at all, forced to see her scratch her face and pull her skin out, getting closer to her skull with each stroke. She removed it as if it was nothing, a gruesome fate that I wished it ended there, but it didn't, her skull was visible but she wasn't bleeding. At least not blood. It appeared that quicksilver was pouring from there, though that wasn't possible. She managed to pull pieces of it that looked like they were broken before, leaving nothing but her empty hole and the same appearance as the shop owner I've met before. It's just a nightmare. My dreams felt so real lately but I had to wake up now, I had to snap out of it before it was too late. I watched her stand there, making strange sounds that got lower and lower. No sound at all came from her after, not even a bellow. She returned to doing nothing after that. I was still immobilised, waiting for it to be over. My mouth was wide open and I yelled: 'Wake up, I need to wake up now!' My body felt numb, on the other side I was able to move my hands once again. I couldn't believe they came back, but I wasn't the one who was controlling them. I had to watch them move on their own, reaching and feeling my face. This can't be happening, I wasn't able to do anything about it, watching helplessly as it circled my face, measuring it and getting into position. Screaming wouldn't help, even if I felt like it, I couldn't get away either, what was about to come? I saw it first hand. When I closed my eyes I started feeling it happen, stings across the face, when it happened, I was too afraid to watch my mother's entire transformation, that's why I looked away and didn't think about some of the parts. I couldn't watch her pluck her own eyes though I knew it was coming for me too now. The pain got worse but it wasn't going to best me, I didn't scream nor watch it, I waited for the pain and discomfort until it stopped. They were still closed. Still there, I wasn't going to open them yet, knowing that, the moment I opened them, that they might be grabbed and pulled out of my sockets made me keep them closed. I waited so much that I started hearing splashes of water. This can't be right, has the dream changed from all that pain caused by the peeling of my skin? Wait, was my face still there? And another splash, even louder than the last one. I don't think that was the only thing that changed around, it got colder but not cold enough for my body to freeze. It must be a trick to make me open my eyes, I could feel my hands over them, covering them up, waiting for their target. . wait. . but those, those aren't mine. I was able to feel and take control of my body, including my hands, then who's hands are on me?

‘Guess who it is!’ A soft voice whispered in my ear, supposedly owned by whoever wanted to hurt me. The voice wasn't my mothers. I was able to talk, my vocal cords were fine but I didn't know what to ask so I asked:

‘Why? I won't open them!’ I told it and waited in silence, hoping that I would get released.

‘Don't act silly now, just open them, it's me, Gwen’ The burden was lifted from my eyes, should I really trust this Gwen with my safety? I might get hurt again.

‘Are you just going to stay there and talk to yourself or are you going to see my new dress? I just managed to get it.

’She kept talking to me as if we knew each other, but I haven't seen her. I couldn't, nor did I remember her name at all, this must be a mistake. I can't deal with it!

‘Okay, if you're not going to open your eyes, I will have to do it for you. ’I could feel her trying to grab me by the eyebrows to force them open. I only managed to stop her in time when I held her hands away from me. She must have thought she was helping despite my struggles to stop her.

‘I won't let you do that, you won't take the light away from me, I can't let you. ’

My hands were dancing over hers and so was my heart, beating harder and harder.

‘I'm sorry, is there something wrong? I just wanted it to be a surprise. I should just leave now. ’Her hands released me and slipped away from mine. Footsteps followed after she was done, I wasn't sure if she left or not, who she really was but I was glad that our short meeting has ended. She must have left, enough time passed for that to happen, I hope it's safe for me to be able to see. How did I get into this mess? So far I've only tried to change the past so I could help others and myself. Perhaps this is just an obstacle, a crate in the way of my success. I won't be stopped by an inconvenience from my plans. To be fair, It doesn't make much sense now, none of it made so far. Surreal dreams and possibly travelling into the distant past would seem impossible in any other circumstance. But I am on the right path, I'm sure of it. This must have been a test of faith and trust that I followed, I didn't wait anymore and I opened my eyes to witness my reward. No one was waiting for me, I wasn't home anymore, yet again. I looked around while standing on the ground. The dirt patches were everywhere, some covered with grass but what captivated me was the giant lighthouse that stood tall in the middle of the night. Where could I possibly be now, there wasn't any ocean near my town, I could be anywhere on the map, not to mention lost. The temperature didn't let me go that easy either, it must have dropped lower when I was thinking about it. Lost and cold, I turned to the lighthouse, seeking for some shelter to spend the night. The iron door felt bad when I touched it with the skin of my fist, as they fell into contact repeatedly. No one answered my many knocks even after waiting for some time. I stopped trying to get in and instead tried warming myself up by rubbing the upper half of my body. I didn't want to freeze to death in an unknown place, that's why I tried one last time to get it open, but I didn't knock, this time, I pushed and pushed. . . and managed to enter right in. The door closed by itself behind me, the wind was strong enough to knock me towards the wall too in its way. No one in, no one in sight or maybe it was too dark for me to see, at least, I wasn't feeling cold anymore, I could even yell out loud that I was getting close to being warm. On the bright side, my memory was still working, I immediately remembered what happened and started touching my face. In my relief, it was still there and I could still feel no scratch nor scar, maybe I was indeed, just as I thought tested and proven worthy, but who was that Gwen. I thought she wanted to pull my eyes but she left soon after. Thankfully she didn't leave with my eyes in her hand, I still needed them to proceed. I really need to get some answers and some directions towards my town too, though I might get nowhere since I doubt there's anyone who could explain to me how I got here in the first place. There is also the problem, the dilemma. Should I sleep or not? It's inevitable, unavoidable and it might happen again, everything that happened so far made me believe it might happen again. Could I even wake up in another place, even more, different than this one? Would I be able to control it and go towards anywhere I desire? I must admit that having the power of travelling towards anywhere I wanted would exceed my wish of staying home. Maybe towards an even warmer place than this one. I barely woke up here, I could, at least, search for something to do first, something to take it off my mind before I go to rest. I tried my best to make out of what the shadowy figures in the dark were but I wasn't able to see. They were making dances, round in motion, trying to hide away from my sight. If only this place wasn't abandoned, I could have really used some guidance. Now, I will have to find my way back to the city, first things first, I need a torch or another source of light. I started moving slowly in front but I've immediately managed to injure my foot over something sharp. Whatever that was, it didn't manage to go through my shoe, I pulled it as fast as I could and backed up to where I previously was, I wasn't bleeding either, or, at least, that's what I thought. I could try to open the hatch once again, but the cold wind might come in and remove my one and only source of comfort I currently have. This place didn't leave me a lot to do, I wouldn't be surprised if I would have to go to sleep again and end up encountering one of those people again, the ones with no faces. I didn't even want to lay down so I wouldn't get stung again, I should try doing something, though, I'll get nowhere with this attitude. I had a plan or, at least, a part of a plan, look for something to light up and see what's going on inside. This time, I took another approach, I got on my knees and, with care, I touched the ground so I would know what to avoid. I moved at my own pace while still in the dark, I was able to hear the wind from somewhere, up above, even if I couldn't see the light I knew that there had to be an opening up there. So I continued my search and avoided the spot that hurt me last time, I haven't even figured what that was in the first place. As I thought, everything looks the same yet nothing can be seen, just the feeling of rock and dust in contrast with the low temperature. I had no idea who the last person who came in here was but he could have at least cleaned up the place. After all, I've got higher standards as it is. Aha, an iron rod, I grabbed it off the ground and it was. I touched it and felt it with both of my hands, cold iron and neutral wood, it was a torch with no flame to keep it company. I've got nothing to light it with, I got halfway up my feet as I thought I saw something moving in the corner. The place was warm but it managed to make me feel shivers going down my spine, spreading throughout the rest of my body and leaving as fast as they came. I knew then that I wasn't alone, I didn't know what it was but now, the most important objective was to bring light and fire to defend myself. And so the search was resumed, I tried searching for some flint and tinder, it must be down somewhere. I could still see the shadowy figures I've seen before, making laps from across the room, passing from one eye to another but I did not know the reason behind them nor did I expect it to be a goose one. Stone after stone, dust on the ground, I had the image in my head, the floor was almost delimited yet I couldn't go everywhere I wanted to. Stairs should have been somewhere around here but I couldn't feel any. They increased speed, probably to distract me but they didn't get closer, I was able to see and feel their motion all around. I couldn't see it well enough but I thought I managed to see some stairs, out of my reach, guarded by them, even if there were, I couldn't know if they'd hurt me or not. Should I take the risk and try approaching them? No, not yet, but I can't continue going through the dark without getting hurt, I'll have to find another way to light this torch. I took a swing with the torch on the ground, trying to create a spark but instead, it just bounced back from it. This wasn't supposed to happen with it, I couldn't see what it is but it definitely wasn't a torch, it was a metal rod attached to a wooden one, I didn't touch it completely before but I did it this time and managed to feel a spiritual compartment attached to its top. The more I touched it, the more I wanted to know what it is, I didn't bother to care anymore about the presence there was with me in the here, not that I had many other choices. This rod was fascinating, even better than a torch, the top wasn't a sphere, I touched more and more and it was some kind of dome, a metal dome that was separated by a line into two sides. It might be possible for me to pry it open, I gave it all my power and hands, trying to force it to open, it was hard and barely moving but I managed to open it. Inside, I revealed another dome, made out of a coloured and smelly substance I did not dare to touch, it had a faint glow to it. I was taken away when I noticed that all the shadowy figures started moving towards the upper floor, just as I finished opening the device. At least some of them went, I watched other go into corners far away from me as if they suddenly got scared. Clearly this was an important tool, I didn't know why it scared the shaped away but unfortunately, the light generated wasn't. . . wait. . light? Small amber light spheres came from above and the stairs, I could see them in their path, coming towards me. The device was still in my hands, it must have been tons of them, fireflies attracted and soon stuck onto it. I've seen fireflies before but there were nothing like them, they were almost the size of acorns and had enough legs to be called arthropods. They even shined the brightest light I've ever seen, even brighter than the sun. The light spread everywhere, making the darkness vanish away. It was this moment that I saw them, human-like shadows fleeing away, above, distant from the light and back to their own. Slowly fleeing and fading away as they made their desperate attempt to escape. I was horrified, but not by them, what happened. . still happening to them. . it's horrible. I felt bad for them, I followed one that was trying to make his escape through the small spaces between the hatches and I was a fool for doing that, I just wanted to see it but the light from the rod burned it. I could see it expand from the wall, moving to the same dimension as I was, right before dissipating away in thin air. For a moment, before it passed, I swear I saw it almost become a human being, trying to reach me in the same space before vanishing so fast. I've had the power of life and death in my hands and I've already abused it. I didn't want to hurt the others who have fled in terror beyond my reach so I closed it, forcing the bigger dome closed, bringing darkness once again before throwing it away. I didn't care if I crushed any of those insects from my actions. My place wasn't here and I'm afraid that those shadowy humans, good or evil are safer without me. I also knew that outside was cold and it might be possible that I might suffer from it, but maybe that's what I deserved, accident or not, even if nothing makes sense and my feelings are difficult to understand. I think I just took a life away. While reflecting on my own thoughts, I went towards the hatch and opened it, ready to go back out there. Before that, I felt, what seemed to be hundreds of hands grasping me, they weren't strong enough nor did they meant me any harm, they just held me for a bit until I decided to finally go. 'I . . am sorry. ' I whispered to them without knowing if they heard me or not, but right before I was ready to step away and out of their reach, the rod was given to my hand to be taken as far as possible. I took it with me, even if I didn't entirely want to, then I was gently pushed out of the way and the hatch closed behind me. This stick should stay with me for a while. A light flashed from the distance, making my other thoughts flee among the shadow people. It wasn't bright enough for me to see, another occurrence as before but I managed to make something out of it, some people were lead this way. I hope they didn't see, that they didn't know what I've done inside there. No one must know what I've done. I just waited to be saved by my dear saviours who were. . . 'There you are Theo, you said you'd be home before midnight, are you out of your damn mind?' 'Honey, calm down, you know how the young act. . 'I didn't think this was possible, but after seeing it with my own eyes, I wasn't the only one who was here, so were my parents.

'Mother, father, I'm so glad I could find. . be found, I've got no idea why I woke up. . '

Quickly interrupted by my mother who was nervous as usual, the same thing she does when I'm doing something I'm not supposed to, she continued to reply.

'I don't care enough to listen to it now, you can explain it back home. Wait, what's that unusual stick you're holding in your hand back there? '

'Leave Theo alone, you know how they act at that age, you can't nitpick his every mistake like you're doing it now, otherwise, he won't get the chance to learn from them on his own. 'I had to step in, I was getting nothing from the conversation with them. 'Can we not talk about this here, we'll have enough time after. . '

They both took me and we started travelling on a long and bothersome pathway. I don't know if they know how we can get back home but I will find out.

'So, where are we? ' I asked whilst waiting for a decent explanation and scouting the place around me. 'We're near the old lighthouse, now we just passed it. 'I had to be more specific than that if I wanted any answer. 'In what. . town are we, what is it called? 'Dad looked at me funny, probably having in his mind that I'm just joking about it 'We live in the sweet town of Gremary. Come on son, we've lived here for at least two months. ' I smiled back at him but this didn't feel like the right thing to do, this could only mean that I. . failed and now we moved yet again, to another place. Still calm because I knew there could always appear a new possibility for me, it could always happen again.

'Son? Theo? Theodore? '

'Yes father, Theo is enough. What happened? '

Both him and my mother thought that I've had many problems waiting to be resolved.

'Nothing, it's just that you didn't say a word after I told you where we are, almost as if you were in another world.

'Somehow he was right, I kept thinking about stuff I shouldn't, like those shadow people, I could still see them, hiding behind rocks and the foliage, following me.

'Just let him be, we'll reach to him back. . . '

They were following me for some reason, taking different shapes of the objects that came in their path, form to form, rock to rock, not even a long ivory fence would provide a challenge, so it would seem, yet none of their actions indicated what they meant to do. Maybe they wanted to get revenge for the others that vanished because of me, I've felt their touch before, I don't know if they can harm me even if they tried doing it. I still don't know why I decided to take the rod with me and didn't throw it straight away. What baffled me is the reason for not throwing it away by themselves, I know that they had the strength to do it alone, yet they waited for me to do it for them. It should return to my original plan and find a way back home, the rest if none of my concern anymore. We must have been going for a while on this. . not so lonesome road, because, from the distance I could see the town I was being lead towards.

‘So, back home. Why did we move here exactly. . and when?’

‘Son, we’ve gone through this before, we had to move because we couldn’t afford to live and pay the landlord anymore.’

Said my father before stopping, his words felt like a repeated speech, going once again for another countless time, it was somewhat meaningless now, though I never heard him say it before.

‘Give him some space will you? You know who. . said we should take it easy in his current state. We need to act normal.’

She tried to whisper in my father’s ear but I heard everything. We were almost in town so I didn’t bother to respond to that. I need to find out what’s going on without raising any suspicion, I don’t know about who my mother was talking about with my dad now but I will find out eventually. We entered the town from a pale road, no sign or tab to distinguish it. I almost tripped because of the broken slabs that laid on the ground in this annoying town. That made me wonder, ‘what was the name of the town?’ I asked whilst not expecting to get a response to which my father said.

‘We’re back home in Gremary, I’ve already told you that before. Are you feeling fine? And don’t lie to me now.’

‘Oh, you’re right, silly me, I must have forgotten that.’ My mom comforted me once more before going back home, this time, she didn’t hide it. Street after street we went, right and left then back to front. We even avoided going on the street with a flower shop on it because of my mother’s request but we finally arrived back home, too new for me, I didn’t even know how much it would last, but home. Maybe, if nothing changes again, I’d like to be able to explore the town properly, seeing that I can’t stop. . I shouldn’t be rash and lose the race before it even started. This place doesn’t look bad at all, it was almost like the previous place, replicated to, almost every detail. You could see that a lot of work was put in it but why? Gah, I shouldn’t get caught in nostalgia, I’ve merely been there a day, maybe two days ago.

‘Now Theo, that we’ve arrived home, you’ve got some explanation to give us. First of all, what was in your mind staying up so late?’ She yelled, ready to start a fight with me like never before.

‘You could have taken pneumonia or even worse.’

‘Okay, it’s late, we should all calm down, especially you honey. We could just talk about this in the morning.’ My dad continued defending me but that soon backfired, time after time and nothing changes between them.

‘Don’t take his side, you know he always does that, why can’t you be on my side for once?’ ‘But love, the doctor said.’

‘I don’t care, I know he has problems but that doesn’t mean. .’ She turned around to me as she realised how much her words weight.

‘Theodor I didn’t mean to say that. .’

They both tried appealing to me like I was some sort of special case but

‘There’s nothing wrong with me, I don’t know why you’re making such a big mess out of it. Maybe father is right, we’ll speak tomorrow.’ I passed right through them and luckily when they weren’t playing any attention, I hid the rod inside my sweater. It was amazing, everything felt the same as before, even the placement of my room, when I entered it, the same as before, except the paint on the walls which was a slightly lighter shade of yellow. Nothing about this bothered me, even if it was irregular, I pulled out the rod and placed it near the bed, it was late and I was highly in need for some rest. I couldn't see if they followed me but it's better to have it close to me, just in case. Now, I was wondering, if I sleep now, everything could return to normal but I've got no guarantee that it won't repeat again and I wouldn't end up in another realistic dream just like I had before. . . if it really was just a dream and not real. At least, I've got a soft bed under me this time, or did I have it the last time I slept? I laid on the bed and blew the candle which lit up the room, I don't know why my parents left it that way, the house could have burned down and then it wouldn't have mattered if they found me or not. I'm finally ready to, was ready, a couple of those shadows apparently followed me, I noticed two of them spread across the ceiling staring at me. I didn't take any sudden move, they weren't like the others, not as small, probably not as weak either, the device I used before was close to me but I wasn't fast enough to grab it. Even if I'd try to make a move towards, it would take too much time to open it. I just stood there, face to face and watched as their hands extended on the other walls from the room. So far, they haven't done anything worth getting alarmed off. Since I had the chance, I took it and examined their strange behaviour, it was just like my old biology teacher from my previous school used to say, every sign of life is worth studying, even if it's a new or old or might not look like much, you can always discover new secrets about it. I never thought about advice from school teacher before, but this journey brought back and in new feelings I've never felt before. I continue standing still without disturbing their movement and observed their shapes. They had no expressions where a human face would normally be, nothing about their body suggested otherwise, except that they looked like other people's shadows that ran away from their creators. The more I looked at them, the more mesmerised I became. Perhaps it was time for me to go back to sleep. My blinks got slower then faster until they got tired, I was ready to rest and I wasn't the only one who was noticing it, they started getting closer but I was too tired to react. I watched them come to the same plane as I was but I didn't care, if they wanted to hurt me they would have done probably a long time ago. I looked at them from the same level and dimension, I was right about it. . they just got closer and closer and wrapped their arms around, disappearing after getting in contact with me. It felt strange, not only the sensation but somehow they entered me and I couldn't see them, except one last shadow hand that I did not see from where it came from. . . I only saw it appear in front of my face before it closed my eyes. Maybe it was all a dream, I kept repeating that to myself before falling to sleep. My eyes were kept shut by them, or maybe my willpower didn't let me forget what happened before the dream. Before I knew it, I fell into it again, I was restrained by something and I couldn't see anything in front of my eyes. There was nothing I could do except try being patient and waiting for something to happen. I was able to feel the ground under my feet and pain coming from my chest. Both my mouth and nose were covered in something too, I could taste whatever it was, as soon as it came into contact with my tongue it just turned into the water with no taste whatsoever. There wasn't anything I could do but hear and try to understand what's happening, my body being motionless, not even tongue, it was moved beyond my will, I had to wait for the water to come so I could taste it. My head was the only part I could really shake, the feelings inside it were still confliction upon what was a dream and what was real. I waited there, knowing that this was a dream, deciding what's about to come after it will be over, just stay and observe since I couldn't offer any resistance anyway I wouldn't beat myself over it, not that I could do that anyway, even if I wanted to. I don't know how much time has passed, counting the seconds was too boring for me to. . . I could hear someone talking or whispering from the distance. Why and how was I able to perceive that? Not that it helped much, whoever was out there, I couldn't hear the voice. It could even be an animal. . . Headaches followed fast enough, making it even harder for me to concentrate at. . . then, I could hear another. . . no. . . two different sources of sound from different directions. The intensity of the pain kept on growing and it would continue over and over. . . until. . . I woke up from my bed whilst still being dressed in yesterday's clothes, still with a headache, smaller than before. I didn't get up right away, I waited for the pain to wear off so I could. I should be happy that I'm home, or at least, I thought I'm back from where I started. No, it was a wrong call, the shades of paint from the wall aren't the right ones. I waited, oh, I remembered, I looked down the bed with a bad feeling and saw that the rod was still there. At least now I was sure that none of this was a dream. I think. . . but I move through such different places, maybe the first time I move was a dream. I shouldn't bash on this place without giving it a chance, I got up and checked myself for any mark that might have been left on my body, there was none. I would have expected to get hurt whilst my guard was down but it wasn't. No caution was taken when I left the room to go down and find out that I was alone in the morning, my parents were not there. They'd always be down here preparing breakfast in the morning. In the kitchen I went and found a small note stuck on the fridge unit, I took it and received my response.

'Dear Theodore, we're not going to be here when you wake up, the dinner is in the fridge as usual, in case you forgot. Don't do anything rash, we'll be back soon. 'Signed by both of my parents who apparently had a habit to abandon me, just as someone use to do to me, someone I used to know. I was still hungry, though, I shouldn't let that kill my appetite. That unnerved me a little. I took the plate out of the fridge, filled with potato chips and some meat before started eating alone. Now, I didn't think about the other part written on the note until now, 'Don't forget to take your pills like the doctor said. 'A bunch of nonsense, bite after bite I've taken and I didn't want to eat any longer, the whole thought of my parents thinking that I'm some sort of little-problem child made me sick. I could understand them not having to eat with me because of their work, but this? My day got ruined the first few minutes I set foot here, I should just get out and explore. I went towards the door to get out but it was locked. It seemed like they also did not have any trust left in me to leave the house. . . but why did they let me get outside yesterday? How did I end up outside and near the lighthouse all by myself then? There has to be another way out, as I turned my gaze back upstairs, I thought I saw someone else there, going towards a room.

'Is that you father? ' I shouted but no response. I couldn't see much but a some long wires coming from a tall figure. There might be a small possibility of me being locked in without someone else besides. . . I felt like grabbing something to defend myself but I never fought before, I had no experience in it and couldn't do it, even if my life depended on it. My imagination was playing tricks on me in order to prevent a crisis, no way someone would be locked inside with me, to confirm it, I started walking towards the spot where I thought I saw someone. Up there, nothing looked out of the ordinary, except that the room where my parents slept was left slightly open. I was reluctant when I saw it if someone except me was really in here, that was the place where the intruder might have gone. I was not scared of that and opened the door, trying to scare whoever as inside. After I stopped to look around the empty room, I was wrong. . . perhaps I really had problems. I was about to discourage myself but I soon saw the small device laying next to my parents bed, taken away from my room with none of my knowledge or consent. That couldn't really mean that. . . they just took it from me, it doesn't sound like them at all. Unless those voices I've heard last night weren't some unknown gibberish, but them, talking about me and this. First they're trying to feed my pills and now they're taking my stuff? I've already got problems trying to figure out what to do, I don't need their help making everything worse. I can't take it back, they'll notice that it went missing, I should ask them to dinner or somewhere else instead. Suddenly I could hear some cracks and glass being hit from my room. Someone must have thrown something at my window. The rocks kept on coming, interrupting my line of thoughts. On my way there I thought that something important was about to happen to me. I entered the room and saw the rocks reaching and bouncing off my window, whoever is doing this will have to pay for it. I opened it and got hit in the face by a small rock in the process. Definitely not the best course of action. Luckily for me that the rock was neither huge nor hard enough, being able to leave nothing but a small bruise on my cheek.

'Agh!' I revealed a small screech before looking down at. .

'I'm so sorry' I've heard that voice before but from where? I didn't know who she was, I had to find out for myself

'Do I know you?' I asked whilst scratching my cheek, feeling a tiny bit sore from it. She looked at me baffled as if I was the one throwing the rocks at her window.

'It's me, Gwen, Gwen Orrows. . . We've been swaying together for some weeks now, don't you remember?' She was another kid, or, at least, she looked as young as me, maybe taller, but I still didn't know what to believe.

'Who are you?' I waited for her to respond whilst she kept a dull expression on her face, we were barely blinking at one another. This whole situation made me feel uncomfortable, as I awaited her response once again, stopping myself from giving any other reply so I wouldn't make everything worse. After a small wait, she finally decided to give me some vague information.

'I'm your friend, Gwen. Just come down, I know what will make you remember!' The distance between us was high and I didn't see any other way out of it with the door being locked.

'I can't jump down, what if I'll break my legs. Plus I don't even know if I can trust you. '

'Don't worry, ' she said with a smile on her face,

'I will catch you, I'll be there for you, ' she said,

'I promise!' she said enthusiastically. Against my beliefs, even if I knew better, I decided to trust her, another person I didn't know that well but she claimed to know me in return. I thought of it again, I decided to trust her and plunged down, hoping nothing will come to harm when I land. I felt the impact after, on something soft too, after looking at it, I saw the girl, Gwen on the ground with me.

'You're heavy enough, you know?' I got up as fast as I was able to and made sure she wasn't hurt. She gave me her hand and I pulled her up with me, away from the cold ground she has laid with.

'I'm sorry, I shouldn't have. . '

'Don't worry Theo, I'm partial to blame'

The situation I was in, not only made her laugh but also made me wonder, what now? I hate being called that annoying short name, I presume she knows my mother, she must have. . .

'Are you going to stare at me all day or will you follow me? Maybe you forgot why you even jumped here in the first place. 'She kept teasing me for no reason.

'No, I'm fine, just tell me what do you want to show me, I need to. '

She grabbed my hand and we ran away without letting me finish. I barely kept up with her speed.

‘Wait, slow down a bit. where are you taking us?’ To which she replied, ‘Don’t worry, you will see it when we’ll get there.’

We kept strolling into the city as if we were supposedly acquaintances and somehow I had the impression that she thought about me just like my parents did, as another problematic boy. I don’t know how she normally acts with other people but dragging people along without saying a word doesn’t seem very nice. Either the place she was taking me to was so important that it would dismiss any explanation or she had a problem telling me what or where it is. I can’t complain, it was not bad, she wasn’t pulling me hard enough for me to feel any pain and I could see the tower better. The streets were as clean as they could be, even stone hard with roads to follow everywhere. Every turn we took revealed house after house accompanied with either a small store or a facility though most seemed closed or abandoned. Maybe it was too early or there was something outside the town but we continued to go through the silent town.

‘So Gwen, where are. . oh I almost forgot. . . I mean to say, where is. . everyone?’ We suddenly stopped on the lonely street, just the two of us with no one else in sight. She turned at me and said:

‘There aren’t many left here, not yet. Now please, just keep following me and don’t let go.’

It took me some time to reflect on what she said to me before resuming our small trip. She must have been talking about the people living in this town, probably nothing, more or less. But what if. .

‘Wait, is that. . part of the town too?’ I thought I saw someone running from the distance but I couldn’t see who that was.

‘No, but in a way yes.’ Yet another non-straight answer, she was hiding something from me. I didn’t know much about her, except her appearance with her long red hair and a flamboyant choice of clothes, everything I could notice from constantly being dragged behind. Unless I could count her strong grip and strength in, I didn’t want to stop again just to look at her, not only that it would seem impolite but I also don’t wish to stop our walk. Though we’ve been walking for minutes and it feels like we’ve accomplished nothing so far. This very part of the town felt like a labyrinth, that or she was deliberately taking a turn for us to go into circles. I followed as we kept walking over and over until I noticed a shop we’ve passed by, not so long ago. It could still be a coincidence, maybe the stores here have the same layouts as one another.

‘Could you at least not go so fast? I can’t hold on like this forever.’ She didn’t stop nor did she take any consideration of my request, barely managing to justify herself with:

‘We’re almost there.’ Strange because no progress was made so far, we were just running through circles and loops and I had to point it out. There it was, I saw the. . again this time, I was slightly able to see the face of whoever that was, but no recognisable feature, not enough to distinguish.

‘There. . is again. . it’s running in circles too, just like us.’ She wasn’t reluctant about this subject, as if she knew the.

‘It’s a special case there.’ We took a break once again, watching from the distance as the mysterious person disappeared once again.

‘She was close, but now she’s stuck.’ The grip didn’t wear off as we’ve spoken, she was still afraid that I would let go and head off by myself that I was too curious to leave.

‘So it's she?’ She looked uncertain, just like I was before her.

‘I don't know, to be honest, it could go on either side. I only know that it was close.’

What was she talking about? Right when things started going back to normal, everything got ruined once again.

‘Close to what? Look, right now I've got no idea why I've even followed you but I won't do it anymore, not until I get some answers from you.’

‘Don't worry, we're far enough to make it, as soon as I release out a hand, keep walking through the forest, I'll meet you there.’

‘She tried to explain but I still didn't know what she meant, we were in a town with no forest in sight. ‘Far enough from what? I knew that following you was a bad idea. I should have known better than trusting. . .’ ‘Just calm down, no harm was done yet, you will understand it once we're there. . just. . .’ She looked at me again with another smile on her face, one for each occasion, before continuing.

‘Trust me!’ Before releasing my hand, I managed to pull it back but it was pointless as I soon passed out but not before being able to see myself get completely covered in steam, all before my eyes. . . I don't know what happened. I woke up in a room with no light and empty. I must have been laying on the floor for some time now with my leg being numbed down. A moment ago. . . I was with Gwen but now I'm probably in a sheltered place because of her. I should stop placing my trust into a stranger, even if some seem like they know me. This room sure looks like a giant box with a door, what's its purpose supposed to be anyway? It wasn't as empty as I thought it to be, my pants were covered in some thick blue dust. I managed to easily dispose of it, although it was spread to the floor and its corners. I went to check the door and eavesdropped before heading out, but I couldn't hear anything but silence, also, surprisingly I managed to open the door that wasn't locked but had a key lock that should have worked. Around me, it wasn't dark enough that I couldn't see but nevertheless, I had a hard time moving through this dark corridor. With my hands stacked upon each other, I kept going in the hope that I could find an exit and continue what I was previously doing. It felt cold, feeling every piece of the wall close down on me from time to time until I found another one of the doors. I tried pushing it to see what's inside but it was locked. The keyhole was too small for me to see through, not to mention too hard to see anyway, so I placed my head on it and listened. Groans and screeches, inhuman in nature, came from inside, getting louder as something approached the door. I tried backing down but instead, I got pushed aside by the doors that were almost smashed down in front of me. I quickly got away without looking back, I wasn't going to stand and find out what was in that room, which would make me feel the content of my actions. I didn't pay much attention after that, I just kept going, but from the distance and the long wall escalated so far by my hand, I could hear and feel the horrible banging on the door, almost ready to break out. I didn't check and avoided other doors I've come into contact with, I just kept walking and conserved my strength, feeling threatened by what might come behind me, way, way in the back. So far that I could hear it echo in the passage, the sound of a bang after bang came right before one last breaking sound followed by an animal roar like any other heard of. As It came into contact with my ear, I knew that it would come after me so I took my hand away from the wall and ran away as fast as I could. I had the distance but I didn't know how far it was behind me, I didn't know what it might do if it caught me, hearing the stomps on the ground. It couldn't be that fast, I didn't even know what it was but I did not dare confront it. I couldn't be aware of what was around me, that's why I ended up tripping and falling on the ground. My heart felt like it was going to pound out of my chest, trying to get farther away, attempting to make a run for it, I couldn't lie to myself and say that I wasn't afraid at all, so I started crawling on the ground as a desperate attempt to escape. I could hear the steps getting even louder, the beast getting closer to the very point of. But no, a final shade of hope came as a door opened right next to me. The probabilities of me standing near an unlocked door were low, but I thought, nevertheless, that I was saved, yet my hope soon vanished right after, as I didn't have enough time in order to get up nor to crawl inside. What is that? There was still hope as I saw multiple hands starting to reach out to me whilst getting the door open, even wider than before. I grabbed their hands and immediately got flung into the room, the hands had enough power to get me inside and to close the door behind me but I didn't know if it was enough. I didn't move after hearing it being slammed behind me, the noise should have attracted it, what if it heard the closing noise that the door made? My breath was being held for seconds to come, hearing the march, almost passing by until the moment when I couldn't keep the air out and started breathing again, inhaling from both my mouth and nose. The noise stopped right where I was before, I froze, even more in fear as I waited for the animal to make a move, I could only hear some gentle knocks on the door before the march started yet again. I waited and waited 'till there wasn't any sound anymore, I thought I was safe for the time being. I stood tall and looked around but the shadows were either nowhere to be found or they blend in with the room. I could have sworn that if it wasn't. Nevermind, I got up and decided that, against all logical sense, I would go back out there, even if it wasn't safe, I would still search for an exit. There should be a considerable amount of space between us, so I could take my chances. I got out, the door wasn't closed, though, at least, the animal wasn't smart enough to get past it, I don't know if I'm going to be lucky twice in a row, so I should be more careful. As I stepped outside my foot landed on water, a big trail was left throughout the passage or at least as far as I could see. Something was providing a faint source of light but I couldn't figure out what. There isn't time to ask myself about the architecture of the place, I need to get out, so which direction should I take? On second thought, I couldn't risk following it since I barely managed to outrun it the last time. . . . but I could also end up in a dead end. The whole time, while thinking about which path I should take, I starred at the ground and the water. That wasn't there before, which could mean that it was brought here, most likely by that animal, so there must be an open source of water from where it came, maybe even a way out or it could be an underground spring. I don't want to face it so I'd better head back. I closed the door behind me and started walking back, the water almost got past my shoes, it looked as if the whole place was about to get flooded. Strange, the water gave me a sad feeling, it almost made me despair. This didn't look so bright for me, with the water slowly but surely raising up, I've never even learned how to swim, in the case that it would get past my neck, this would become my watery grave. It isn't alarming at the moment, yet it didn't stop me from gaining speed, which ended up as being a bad idea, each step I took made a splash and ripples that probably reached the very end of. But I didn't slow down, I had to stop this or to find a way out or else I would drown. In case I was followed I could just check the water for signs, it would work as both an advantage and a disadvantage. The more I ran, the stranger it started feeling, as I stepped down, everything became shallow and harder to move. It wouldn't be late after, that I would feel branches and twigs being broken and split between my foot and the water becoming muddy. I didn't care because I wouldn't drown nor die from anything, far but close, in the distance but reachable I could see an exit. There was no light, though, it was probably night, I couldn't run but I walked with every move being a challenge on its own. The walls were covered in moss so as I got closer, almost falling apart with my coming, I reached the exit and got out. I managed to get out just in time as something was back in that tunnel, something tall and overwhelming. As I laid my foot on the dry soil, I found myself alone in the forest, surrounded by trees with black leaves and grey acorns. I turned around to look back from where I came from but the passage that brought me here wasn't there, not even the mud nor the water that were covering my legs. I remember, someone told me something about a dark forest, but I couldn't remember who or what. Seeing as my choices were limited once again, I decided to keep walking in the direction where I've originally been headed towards. The night was upon me, silent and full of ancient clouds that were moving at peculiar paces. My sight was limited but not as restricted as before, I could at least freely move whenever and wherever I wanted to and so I did. Why was it called a dark forest, I asked myself, maybe because of the definitory dark coloured trees that seemed to be moving when I didn't look at them for a while and turned my gaze back to them. At first, I thought that there were the shadows constantly following and protecting me like they've done before, but it wasn't like that. The forest didn't seem to have an end, not even rocks or small hills, just flat and filled with trees. It didn't help at all with my suspicion of their movement, again one moved from behind, then I turned to look for it in front of me, to be safe. So far, it wouldn't seem impossible nor unlikely, but they could prove to be. Pushed back, I fell down on my back from the direct impact with one of the trees that just sprung out of nowhere. I wanted to use it as a support pillar to get up but one of the branches became mobile and entangled my entire hand. The tree twitched half of its body around me, revealing a hollow filled with faces and eyes, all moving and blinking at me, as real as me but both voiceless and expressionless. I struggled to free myself but I couldn't do it, nor could I have known what it was about to do, as it opened one of the faces, deep from inside, barfing sap all around me. The roots were almost like legs, four in number or even more, sturdy and unyielding as I tried kicking them over and over. I could remember a similar event from the old stories my grandfather used to tell me, dark twisted spirits taking the forms of trees and stealing the faces of the victims. My time was running short as the branch reached both my hands and the sap almost swallowed my entire body. This didn't scare me, the sap secreted by it made me feel drowsy and removed some of the pain.

'But they can't be real!' I said it out loud before having my mouth stuffed. It couldn't be real, I closed my eyes and reopened them, there was nothing there. So far, I've kept falling over many obstacles that weren't there, that I forgot why I was even here. I even forgot where I am, another fully lengthen blink and I was standing near my grandfather Michael, reciting from one of his old fairy tales of demons and spirits. I felt joy from getting to see him one again, but it was shortly lived as I saw the forest being part of the room we were in. I should get up but he already started his story, it felt like a heavy stone, forcing me down to hear his entire tale before I could get to leave.

'As I was saying, Jack was walking alone in the woods, trying to find his. . 'I think I've heard that one before, not too long ago, as I was forced into the body of Jack, controlling him, feeling young and feeble, all of this whilst hearing Michael's voice as if he was here, right next to me. I couldn't move, at first, if there's something I was able to learn from my previous encounter, it's better to wait it out.

'Young Jack, tall and prideful, but cracked in his head for what he has done, he walked alone at night despite all warnings. 'Released, I was able to move, there must be a way to change this story without having a bad ending. I chose not to move at all, the story couldn't go on if I didn't choose to listen to it and the commands are given to me.

I'm not anyone's toy to be reckoned with.

‘But Jack was not moving, light on his boots, realising his mistake, one after another. A bad choice he made as the hollowers saw him as an easy prey and started moving towards him. ‘It wasn't the same forest but those things sprung again and started moving, just like the voice said they will. I didn't know if it was going to work but I tried hiding in one of the bushes near me. Will they be able to see me in my hiding spot? Waiting in silence, waiting to live and hear a response from. . . I was able to fit inside, away from those pests, though I could hear them move, impaling the ground under them.

‘And hid away he did, but it was not over so easily for Jack. They searched and searched for their long roots and grooming branches. Young Jack was about to be found as the earth itself spoke to the hollowers, revealing his whereabouts. ‘I hid no longer, I got up, out of the bush but failed in doing so, I didn't escape.

‘And so they caught him, two in number, claiming their prize, each of them one limb and most of his skin that would last up through the spring. ‘I wobbled my legs as hard as I could, I wasn't able to remember but the story could have ended in a bad way. They dragged me away, getting reach to, each get a half, then I took a rock and threw it at one of them, managing to hurt one of the faces inside. They all looked infuriated when I did that, getting red and dripping sap all over, I might have cut my life in half now. Enraged, the branches held me tighter, the single drop that barely got to my face almost left with a third sided burn, having the same feel as boiled water had when it came into contact with my skin. No voices came to save me and I was afraid that I wasn't going to hear it, coming right after my post mortem. A final attempt was needed, I closed my eyes but still felt trapped, at least, I couldn't look at their horrid faces, a nice thought at least.

‘Even if the situation was dire. ‘And it came back for better or worse, the voice of my grandfather would become the harbinger of death or life.

‘Jack wasn't afraid. Ehm, as the lumberjack arrived just in time. After all, Jacks should care for each others. ‘I opened my eyes and saw him there.

‘Slashing and cutting the branches’, pushing them away from me.

‘They weren't strong enough to face him so they retreated into the night. ‘The kind lumberjack left his axe down and ripped whatever was entangling my legs at this point with his capable hands.

‘Old and thorny on the outside, with a pure and caring heart, he helped poor Jack to get up and get rid of all the sap in the world. He only had to find his way home first. ‘He didn't look old at all nor was he like a bush or a garden, but I thanked him for ‘All your help, sir? ‘ He muffled his beard before telling me:

‘I'm Raphael laddie, just follow me, these woods aren't safe at night. ‘He grabbed his axe and lead the way, scaring all the trees away. Quite skilled with his axe, it wouldn't surprise me if the start that just fell because of his sky cutting swings. I almost started thinking about the stories told before me. I had to snap out of it before continuing walking through the woods with him.

‘Away from harm, the hollowers at ease, the axe got closer to his knees Jack felt safe but his parents did not, their precious son disappeared, left alone at the mercy of the lumberjack's beard. ‘I couldn't hear the last part but I had to know, what did he mean about my parents? He couldn't be talking about my real ones, maybe I should focus on my escape before I get distracted away from it. The lumberjack wore an old red uniform with blue stripes and a small cap, quite detailed for an old story. As we went on, I asked him: 'Well, can you. . I can't believe I'm asking you this, but can you also hear the voice?' He wasn't upset nor surprised and kept a pleasant look on his face for our entire trip.

'Don't worry about it lad, every story deserves a great narrator and a happy end. '

'So you knew all along that you aren't. . '

'Real? Hah, don't be nutty, who even knows what's real anymore. You must be new I presume. ' He told me as if he knew something I didn't. Either he was fake and only existed in this story or he was trapped as I am, it didn't matter which one it was, he looked happy enough for the condition.

'Wait!' He said whilst stopping me from taking a glimpse around, the sound of leaves falling along with branches and getting crushed between something hard on the ground made him do that.

'They both stopped with soil in their tracks, not so far away laid the exit, not too far from their reach but an old enemy never retracts. 'He kept looking towards every side whilst trying to keep me safe, we would

'Run for it, grandpa's voice said it's not far. '

'No, we can't do it yet, lad, we might have to draw them in, then make a run for it. 'He wouldn't let me move from the spot nor did he tell me about what he had in mind, or if he had a plan at all.

'I know what's coming next. . trust me, Jack. '

'Fine'it's not like I have a choice. . . actually, as a matter of fact, I'd rather. . '

My words were stolen as I saw too many hollow trees to even count, surrounding us, all turned with their faces towards us, singing and others screaming in harmony. Right as I thought they were silent, something made them broke their most precious vowel.

'And the tall trees marches to what seems to be a bitter end for young Jack and William, who stood there waiting, they wouldn't even try acting as they saw the threat coming for them. 'We were both silent for a while, waiting for something, but for what? I looked at Raphael and didn't see any trace of him being scared nor doubting, even as he turned his stare towards me, even in this critical situation, he kept his smile alive. Whenever it would end, as insanity or relief, he had courage, enough for both of us. 'So, what now?' I asked him, whilst our chances of survival got lower with each root taken towards us. There was no time, the hollow trees formed a circle, leaving us no space to pass through them, that was the moment when he grabbed me by the back for some reason. We both starred at each other again on what I thought it would be the last time. The smile broke down, finally, he could fake it no more.

'Don't worry lad, I will be right behind you. 'There was no time, I wanted for both of us to escape but he lifted and threw me far and beyond them. I landed up on the ground but I was not hurt. I got up as fast as possible to see if. . Raphael.

'The lone lumberjack into the forest, bearer of smiles, he sacrificed himself preventing the lad from sharing his dire fate. '

I couldn't hear his voice past the screams and shouts nor was I able to see or help him. I wanted to run straight to them but what good would it do? The exit was in my reach, I could see the end of this forest, but what if he was still alive? I didn't want to abandon him.

‘The end was upon his reach, Jack only had to get out and he would be away from danger. ’No, I won't do it, I turned away from the only way out and charged at the hallow trees. I knew that I wasn't strong enough but I wouldn't let him die. Far enough to add some power to that charge, as I was about to hit them, damage them or not, something stopped me, grabbing and holding my legs off from even trying. The grip was strong, even stronger than the last time, I thought they got me, but, when I looked down I saw the shadows having their hands ensnaring me, trying to throw me out of the forest, one leg at a time, one step behind. ‘Jack only had to get out and he would be safe. ’Again the voice and now this. . . I tried touching them so I could free myself and help Raphael but my hands went through the shadows. I could not stop them nor help him, I was forced to back down and see him, no, not even him but those oaks trapping him, soaking him in sap. I threw myself on the dirt and shoved my fingers and hands into the ground. They would not let me go, I couldn't even be a worthy challenge as I was easily overpowered by them. Was this my punishment for killing one of their own? Being forced away from trying to help my friend? Still taken without my will, I plowed the soil with my fingers, throwing leaves and rocks out of the way, but not even the sounds of that could get through the sounds barrier created by their harmony. Hopeless, I didn't resist anymore, whilst on the ground I let them get me away towards. .

‘Safety, Jack has done it, although reluctant at first, he managed to get back home, just in time for winter. ’The forest was away from me, the hard ground turned into white snow and it felt much colder. Too cold, my hand got hurt but it, yet I was able to get up and shake it off, the hands got away into the snow and left me a long way from the forest. I looked at my hands and didn't see any mark from being dragged, neither was the forest the same, the whole scenery was covered in snow right in front of me, with every blink a new layer would be added. It would seem like where one story ended, another one was about to start. I should be happy that I can move now but I'm not, even if I didn't know him, I'm afraid that he might have died for nothing, I'm afraid that I might forget him, no. . as long as I keep a smile on my face, fake or not, a part of. . . I can't believe what I'm even implying, a man just died, I need to get help, I need to. . but he could still be alive. No way any of those oaks was real, or even alive but it they weren't, maybe, neither was him. I was lost, I just wanted to get back home, I didn't want, I didn't wish either for any of this, I don't even know where I am now but, I turned around and yet another town appeared. But it wasn't the same, it never was, it might never be. I had to go through this, I thought that if I'd bear enough, I could finally get home to my parents and everything could get back to. ‘A normal town for the inhabitants that watched over it, but little did Esther know of what expected him in there. ’The voice that once sounded comforting got repulsing. Agh, my chest felt like it was about to get ripped open. A sudden surge of pain quickly came by and left after without any trace. My legs were shaking, I opened my shirt, buttons were thrown around but I couldn't see any visible wound nor could I hear the voice of my grandfather. The pain was authentic and came from inside, breaking me apart. I placed the buttons back in order to recover from it, then I continued walking but whilst still in distress, I didn't know what to feel, not only that I was hurt mere seconds ago but I couldn't stop thinking about that man. I can't remember the name of the tale if only I knew it.

‘The mysterious stranger entered, the-the-the town. . ’Something must have gone wrong with him too, I don't remember if the story had so many repetitions in it. I looked around the town, it was quite nice but he lied about people being it, or did he say it hadn't? The houses in it had a rustic look, made of oak and probably other types, I really hope they weren't the same time as those in the forest I've gone past. I looked at them and from sides I noticed that they had no doors or any visible way to get in, so what was the point of their existence? I kept sniffing around whilst waiting for the voice to trigger an event or something, for the story to go and-and for me to make my escape, so far nothing. I started wondering if something, agh. . . a second time, the pain from the top of my chest came back, I grabbed a hold of it and waited in the middle of the village, alone and hurt, ready to throw up from the pain. The second time it came it staid longer, my breathing got harder to keep without passing out. There wasn't any specific point from where the pain came from, I just merely held the skin off my chest in an attempt to ease it. When it finally went away, it left me almost powerless, unlike the first time. I had to escape as soon as possible, I doubt I could withstand another blow. I tried walking through it, barely being able to keep myself up.

'Empty. . empty. 'His voice started changing, words too became either inaudible or unrecognisable.

'ons of choenix go back, go back. 'The only words I could understand and it wanted me to go back, after all, this?

'No, I won't listen to you! Did you hear me? I won't have it your way!'The houses were decaying, the snowflakes were melting, I was afraid of the thought of the world collapsing under me, as the decay and erosion came through the very ground under me, everything whilst hearing the voice

'Go back!' going over and over, echoing in my head. A headache wouldn't stop me but the crack in the ground and the falling debris would, I couldn't run but walk and try my best not to get hit by anything. None of us would step back, not even with my pain, I got so far that it feels like I've been through worse before but I don't know when. I couldn't see an exit from this town, just a long passage made out of the houses being stacked left and right, over another. I. . I realised how much it resembles the passage I've been through before but with some other changes. . . and that I had to constantly dodge and try my best to remain alive.

'Fall down!' the voice said with a change of tone. The buildings were no longer falling or getting destroyed, I didn't understand what the voice tried to say by. . . Down, right under me, the ground cracked, as ice from a frozen pond but there was no water under. I didn't want to move, as soon as I even dared to lift my foot, even more, cracks came to be. I was standing on thin ground, knowing, deep inside, feeling that the mysterious voice might come back and tell me once again to 'Fall!'And the ground was smashed right under me, making me fall in a dark abyss with shards that had the same colour on the ground. While falling, I couldn't see much but the hole above from where the light came, getting smaller as I fell deeper. I didn't scream as I confirmed to myself that nothing I've seen so far was real, so I only had to enjoy and wait. I was happy, in a strange way because of its peacefulness, unlike my life at home. . . I didn't want to think of that very much and ruin the moment. Even though it was a long fall and where I would land was uncertain, ugh. The pain coming from inside didn't stop. . not even now. I used both my arm to cover up my chest and pushed as hard as I could but the pain was still immense. This has to work again, I opened my eyes and closed them back, doing it over and over again, not even the shadows could take it and left my body, floating high above me, shaped like kites. I remained alone, truly alone, this time, falling, possibly too, ugh, death if I was wrong about this not being real. I closed my eyes one last time and kept them closed, waiting for the pain to go away. The pain went away but my heart followed it too as I felt an impact on something. I was scared that I would feel an immense amount of pain but I landed softly onto, what did I land on?

'Come on Theo, you're here just in time!'A friendly voice came, could it be? Was it truly possible? It must be Gwen,

I opened eyes and saw her, pulling me up.

‘Where are we? How did I get here from falling?’

I’ve taken a glimpse around after she was done helping me, we were in an old town, there is something out of the ordinary about it but I can’t place my finger on it. The people around us were wearing rain coats but it wasn’t raining and none of them seemed concerned about me being here or that I got where I am from falling from a hole in the sky. Luckily for me that I didn’t end up falling on those thorns from the ground, though no one dares take care of them.

‘Are you done cataloging them or can we go? It looks like a storm is about to come.’ I didn’t look at the weather until she mentioned it, shifty clouds were slowly gathering, dancing in the sky and getting ready to cry.

‘I saw that. So what? I enjoy rains, it reminds me of home.’ She had a concerned look on her face, she kept switching her look towards the sky, then around and back at me. Gwen then told me:

‘It’s not about the rain itself, but what it will bring.’ I didn’t know what she was talking about but I could see others taking refuge in their homes, lock their paths.

‘Come on, there’s still time for us to see it, then we can get out of this town.’

‘Gwen, I still don’t know what you’re talking about, I’m still not sure if I could. . .’

She stopped me as I was ready to dismiss her and completed my sentence

‘trust you because I barely met you. And I just want to get back home, that’s what I always wanted, I know, you’ve told me that before but you forgot it.’ She had a sincere look on her face and she also knew exactly what I was going to say, which shocked me. Even more, I actually believed her. Perhaps it was possible that I had problems with my memory, so I decided to follow her, believing that she might be able to push me in the right direction.

‘Fine Gwen, I trust you, lead the way as you please.’ Gwen nodded and we started walking through the town. Quite dark but not enough for it to be night, just enough to make the place look ever creepier. I’ve never seen a place like this before, we’ve walked near tall burned like buildings, some entirely closed, others entirely barricaded. Why were they left that way, closed and covered? I thought to myself. I didn’t come in here to search for their secrets, but I swear I saw someone looking, no, staring at me through some of the cracks, that’s why I asked her,

‘Gwen, why is there someone in that abandoned house?’ A shiver returned across my spine and my blood dropped in its place, it wasn’t my imagination but that look, whoever gave me, stayed with me even after we’ve gone far enough from. .

‘Don’t look at anyone directly, try not to look at those either’ She said to me, but I was too curious, despite her warning, I started searching with my gaze around, trying to find others who were hiding, I wanted to get scared again, I just found out a feeling I didn’t know I had before, almost ecstatic as the fear ran out. Gwen suddenly stopped and I almost hit her.

‘Watch where you’re stopping, I could have. .’

‘Here it is.’ We both stood there, in front of a huge mansion, as shallow as the rest of the town. The hardwood toothed iron and harsh stone gave it a sinister, unworldly appearance. High up to reach and spit the clouds but not visible outside the town, even its dark towers had the appearance of sharp claws, trying to rip its prison open and escape. Chained to the ground as if it were alive, there was no reason for such a place to be imprisoned. Even the figure stood not far, guarding its place but my vision was taken away from it, towards something of a much greater importance. A giant mask right above the entrance, bigger than anything I've ever seen before, made of ash, stone and something unknown. Its gaze spread across the entire town, its nose blew mist to hide the rest and its mouth forever changing in my sight.

'It's beautiful, especially that. . thing in the middle, it reminds me of the. . . The ritualistic masks from the stories my grandfather used to tell me. . . 'Gwen grabbed me by the hand but this time, it wasn't forced, we just looked at it as if it was alive, sentient, trying to whisper to us, calling me.

'Theo, Theo. . Theodor'I just noticed her shaking me and calling my name but I couldn't look away from it. Even when I tried ignoring Gwen, I felt pain and got distracted as she slapped me hard enough to scratch my cheek and let some of my blood get loose.

'Come on Theo, snap out of it, we're running out of time!' Another slap and I couldn't hear anything but a high pitched noise inside my ears. I saw her lips move but the sound was too loud, even when I tried to cover up my ears, it didn't stop, it came from somewhere inside my head. The texture around the mask and the manor started looking similar to the ground or maybe it was the other way around, it all looked like burnt wood, somehow weld together. The material wasn't the only one changing, even the noise in my head took on the form of a voice. Nothing else could distract me. I wanted to hear it, to be able to heed its call as it started whispering to me 'vanquish. . 'I was thrown on the ground from being hit, I looked at who did it and it was Gwen, holding up a lamp made of. . the same wood as before.

'Are you out of it yet or should I give you another spin? '

'No, wait! I'm fine. ' I said whilst getting ready to stop her, just in case she changed her mind, but she did back down.

'Don't look at it anymore, let's go. 'She then threw the lamp away and got me fixed.

'What happened Gwen? Why is everything so much different now? Why is everything made out of wood? 'I didn't realise it while staring at the huge mask but it wasn't an illusion, everything did share its appearance, from stone to build. . .

'Come on, you can look on our way out, they might come back after us. 'She took me away after, on her road, would we end as we started?

'What was that and why did you take me here? '

'I wanted to show you the truth again though it's getting more and more dangerous every time we're doing it. 'We went through alleys filled with stumps and salt and right before we took the corner, we also had to take a break. She didn't say a word and spoke as quiet as ever.

'Don't make any noise or they might hear us. ' She said before taking a peek and turning back. Gwen was stressed as if she 'Saw a ghost or what? '

'I had to stay quiet, this could get messy, I don't know if you've seen them before. ' 'What are you talking about? There's so much you've got to explain to me' As I tried getting an explanation, she didn't look like she cared or listened to me, she kept taking peeks around the corner. She turned back to me and said:

‘We can't talk here, I've already told you that’

‘Listen, I'm not taking another step until you've told me everything you know, also am I the only one seeing this?’

‘What are you talking about? Look, if we don't get out of here, they will catch us and I won't be able to explain anything to you after!’

‘Who will get us?’

‘Gwen took to be closer to the corner so I could take a look just like she did before me. Wooden soldiers that wore no uniforms, almost like walking trees patrolling around. It wasn't anything special but I didn't take it as a joke either. I was suddenly pulled back right before they turned their gaze upon me, but for a fraction of a second, I was able to see.

‘No, this cannot be’

‘Theo, are you okay?’

‘She looked at me as I slowly lowered myself down the wooden wall, my lips were dry and my heart was prowling in my chest. . they. . ’ We’re the same as before. They want to take my face and gouge my eyes out!’ I was scared that I would make a noise and alarm them.

‘Theo come, don't break on me now. ’I was afraid that maybe, this time, it would really happen. .

‘Theodore, they might be heading this way, snap out of it. ’My body stopped itself in place after I saw my hands starting to, slowly turn into the wood too.

‘Theo, please, I don't want to lose you again, please, let's just run together, the two of us. . ’I could feel the loss of control over my own body, but I know what to do this time. I took both of my hands and covered my face, wood or not, they would have to cut through them if they wanted to get to me. After that, it was only a game of waiting, I wouldn't give up on my life, especially since I knew they were out there. With all this mayhem going on, I almost forgot about. I didn't know where Gwen was, I was too scared to look after her, they would have caught me. I didn't hear her either, after so much time, maybe she escaped and maybe she's safe now. I felt something, no, someone grabbed me from both sides of my arms, they were taking me against my will, yet I couldn't see who it was since my eyes were still closed. They were open, knowing that something wasn't right, I saw two hooded people seizing me. The town came back to normal but they wouldn't let me go, even against my struggle.

‘Where am I now? Who are you two? Let me go this instance. . ’I couldn't end what I was about to say because I got punched instantly in the face. The hit was strong enough, as it almost knocked my jaw off my face.

‘Is that. . . all you got?’ I was immediately punched a second time, but this time from the other one, I couldn't see after, the punch landed on my left eye and I wasn't able to open it after. I didn't want to get hit again so I just watched them drag my legs off the ground, it was a bit painful but not as much as their punches. I was dizzy and my right eye couldn't do as much as before, especially in these conditions, I wasn't able to see well but I thought it looked like. . gallows. My eyes got wider and I finally noticed the group of people that stood in front of it. Were they taking me to my own execution? I got up on both of my feet and kicked one of the hooded acolytes, I was able to make him trip down and release my hand. The other one noticed me and got ready to jump and attack but I lunged at him and bit his hand. I tore his skin and even let some blood out, I could even feel his bone being close to my teeth, if not right in it. He did release me but only after screaming in pain, alerting the unsuspecting crowd. I started getting farther away without giving them time to react, jumping away from the hand that almost got me from below. I didn't look back anymore, I didn't know where Gwen went but I remember the path that leads out of here, before that I had to make sure I would take the most difficult to reach spots if I wanted not to get caught. The noise from behind me gave them away, the mob was angry but something changed as rain drops started falling to the ground. On my way, I managed to get to the same passage I thought I was on the last time with Gwen. It was far from normal where I stood and I only knew half of the way, and the other one only from glances but that didn't stop me. Hunted, they were probably ready to get me, I tripped down over something and got covered in dirt. I managed to get up easily after that and continued making turns but townsfolk were everywhere, in almost every corner I took, giving me a distasteful look and starting a sprint towards me. My limits were close to being reached not too long after that. One more lap and I could escape this nightmarish place, right when I was close to it I felt a hand touching me but not from behind, I know I took a box-like path but someone still caught me. I was chunked inside a room but there was no door in the passage I went through.

'Keep your voice down, this time, I am not sure that they can find us, still, I won't take my chances with it. 'Gwen was there and she was 'Fine, you escaped'I gasped as much as I could because I knew it wasn't wasn't over.

'So what happened after Theodor, so it balm. . 'We were standing in a small room that had a barely functional light switch, the way out was blocked, probably to hide us even more.

'Look, Theo, I grew up in this town so it's better if you don't know a lot about it. My mother showed me this secret underground tunnel, it should get us out safely. 'Gwen said it while looking at the door behind me, over my shoulder.

'It looks blocked, I can see the keyhole under your arm. '

'Don't worry Theo, I got the key if you're ready we can just get out of this damned hole of a town. 'She opened the door and revealed a bunch of stairs leading even further underground, even those were lit up by lights. After deciding that I was ready, I went to the stairs and waited for her to lock and shut the light in that room, I had to make sure I wouldn't get caught again. I didn't even know if I'd be able to tell her about what those mad people were intending to do to me.

'Gwen, mind if I ask you something?

'Do it quickly, as soon as I'm done with this, we're out. '

'Okay, I will, um, where does the electricity to power the light bulbs comes from?' As expected, she didn't give me an answer but was rather evasive about it, instead, she told me

'We got no time for that, it's time to go. 'We both started going down the stairs until we reached the bottom of. . .

The stairs lead to an empty bottom with no doors, no passages, not tunnels, just some strange writings on the ground where I stood.

'I don't see any way out Gwen, are you sure we. . 'I turned around to face her and I was stabbed. A bloody blade went through my chest and. . it came from. . Gwen.

'Why?' I asked her. . .

'Why did. . . ? '

Blood started coming out of my mouth and I knew I would. . . pass out and. . .

'I'm sorry Theodor, it was an accident!' Her voice almost changed for a second. . but she pulled it out, leaving me enough space to fall and bleed on the floor. She let the blade fall, close to my reach, not that it mattered anyway. The last image I saw before me was a glowing light up, above and the stairs leading to it.

'Do you still want to go home? '

'Yes, I would get to feel. . . content!'

'Even if that meant, going through all of this. . again? '

'It's the only place that made me feel happy. . the only one I know, so yes, I would go through everything again it meant going back home. . even if it didn't last long. Even if my mother never spoke to me and even if my father hated himself for doing it. ' 'Very well Theodore, but you won't remember any of this, ugh sin a hiwt tress I wry hut no one'I woke up in the morning and went back downstairs, as usual, my parents were arguing.

'So much time has passed, I don't think they're searching for him'I would hear the voice from time to time, otherwise, it all came to normal. Middle of the night and I just woke and set up to see the professor, mother was sleeping last time I checked but in order to be fully sure of it, I snicked out, in my mind, though, she would react and be mad at me, just like a normal mum. It took some time for my brother's arrest, I kept thinking about it, from time to time but I truly knew he deserved it. On the way there, I went more cautious this time of year, I wouldn't want to get another one after all. The road between my house and the prof's became more like a stroll, with the average man passing and giving me a stink eye, I couldn't care less about it. I opened his door as I arrived, the key fit in just like a glove, after that the habit continued.

'Greeting professor!'

'Greetings Sam, cough. 'I welcomed him back whilst trying to hide my dire condition. It got worse but I hope I'll get to survive through most of it. He went back to his work as I kept doing mine. Cataloging new subjects got harder, bigger names, larger body mass. . . My pills were on the desk next to my work. . It was a nuisance but they kept me alive. Sam saw me the other day when I went for the vessels. Far behind, he kept telling me he has a request to make and I think I know what it is, given his situation. Not yet, though, we just finished stepping April to one of them, it should be full for the time being.

'Professor, are you okay? '

'Yes I am Sam, why aren't you working now? '

'I'm sorry, I just saw you drop your cane and I thought you had another. . '

'I'm fine Sam uh, I was just thinking about April and. . . how it could have been avoided. 'I looked towards the secret path where her vessels would be.

'I wonder if she's fine in there, I wish I could be there for her. . to guide her, to. . '

'I'm sorry again professor, it's all my fault if I didn't bring it up, perhaps it would have been different. '

'No, it wouldn't have, April chose to do it on her own. There's no one to be held accountable for her actions but herself. '

'Will I ever get to speak to her again? '

'Perhaps, only time could tell. You really have to go now, go back to your bindings'The professor was right, I shouldn't disturb him anymore, he suffered enough anyway. On the way down, I made sure everything was in order, the lights lit up as they were supposed to, with a stock of light bulbs laying in the corner of the room I passed by, the other access doors were closed. The only problem was that water kept dropping from the ceiling. Nevermind that, small drops aren't going to flood the place so I'm going to take care of it later. The main chamber was filled with vessels. Some filled entirely and others empty, after seeing so many people enter them, I almost got to fully understand how they worked. Almost, with the help of that and the prof's notes. I don't know how much it will take, but I will get to take his place one day. He became even more distant towards me. . and even towards her. The plan remained the same, I would finally get to be reunited with mother. I started cleaning the organic vessels, one by one with the acidic substance, leaving no trail, trace nor spots of any of the previous users. Strange in composition, even stranger in appearance, they were hard as steel insides but everything else was made of something I could only see, transparent but tight. I was instructed not to touch it, nor did I do it. There was also that incident when one of them got cracked, but it healed after a while and nothing was lost. Three of them cleaned well enough, for now, I still got my hands full for this night. My whole schedule got turned down but I could try looking in the back for her vessels. And check how she's doing. I don't want to upset him either but I wonder if she's okay or not. It dug tunnels for itself to fit even more of them, finding the right one where she's located could take some time.

'Sam, come up here for a moment, I need your help with something. '

A look was all I needed at its body and structure, one more before I thought to myself, what is she doing? 'A second please. '

Far but not beyond, one of the filled vessel was different from the other ones, so was the one standing in it, someone special was in it but special to whom? One last time he called me and this time, I decided to give in and come.

'Good morning uncle. '

'Morning Alice, judging from the looks of it, your night, night. . . night'

'Are you okay uncle? 'I got up from the table and tried aiding him.

'No, stop, I'm not your uncle, balm. 'I didn't know what to say, at first, I even thought that he might have had a mental illness because of his old age. Nothing he said would come as a surprise to me anymore.

'No, I do not possess such an affliction'

'Okay, you can stop now, you couldn't possibly. . '

'Read minds? No, we are connected, everyone here is, young one. 'He didn't make a lot of sense, but 'It will all come to you in time, but for now, you are safe here, you will not forget. ' 'Wait, I don't really get what's going on here nor if what you're telling me is true, could you, at least, try to explain to me, from the start to where we are now? '

'No, you wouldn't be able to understand nor comprehend, others have tried and they all failed. '

'Okay, but can. . . First of all, can you really hear me without me moving my lips or making sounds? '

'That is correct'Wait, have you really heard me or you just said that to appear like you can? 'Indeed, I was and I am able to, now to the previous matter. . 'Oh yeah, I almost forgot, speaking of which, you said I won't forget but you contradicted yourself by saying I won't be able to remember because other failed.

'It is safer for your well being if it stays that way. 'You will have to tell me sooner or later, or I might be forced to find out for myself. Also, why? How come I'm not surprised at all by what's going on? Did you lie and I forget something or do I not know?

'No, feelings are affected by the stream, I can't give you any more information for now. 'Wait, 'We're not done yet uncle or whoever you are. . . What is the stream? Where's my real uncle?' 'Don't you just stand in there like a statue, say something. Say something to me, you can't just tell me that and just. . ugh. 'Okay, maybe it's just a bad joke he decided to play on me, let's see how much he can take before he'll break. I got closer to him and started slapping him across his face, from left to right and vice versa.

'This should teach. . . 'He really was like a statue, I wasn't even able to move him, I touched his skin but it felt as solid and hard as concrete, his eyes too were blocked staring at me but at the same time through me. I hoped it was really true, I used two of my fingers to lunge into his eyes but they were stone cold. I guess he won't be of much assistance, I could go outside and talk to somebody else. As I reached the door and tried looking on the other side, I noticed that there was nothing beyond it. I backed down as I felt the depth of it wanting to come in, a giant abyss at the edge of the house leading to an indescribable feeling of emptiness. I closed the door back, being afraid of lights I had to take a deep breath. This seriously can't be happening, no, no no, I went upstairs to the second floor to be able to check the window, I thought I could see something if I was higher. It didn't look as if it had an end to it, regardless of where I turned my gaze to. I took a coin from my pocket and threw it outside, I've read from somewhere that it was a good way to figure out how deep a hole can be, so I waited. . And no sound was heard. I couldn't spend the entire night or day waiting for it, I came back to the first floor, then I realised, the basement! My uncle used to joke about a secret passage in it, perhaps there's a way out through there. I ran to where the door used to be but no. . this couldn't be, it was the same as the front door, its every exit leading to an inescapable way to the chasm. I closed the door and sat down the table with the statue of my uncle. Whilst thinking of a way out, I kept drinking my tea. My memory felt like it was getting divided into quarters, I blinked for a second and I woke up in front of a lake. It's the lake near my father's house.

'April, dinner's ready, I've been shouting at you for minutes

'I'm sorry papa, I was just. . uncle being a state and. . '

'After dinner and please don't make fun of your uncle, it's not polite. 'I followed him back but I didn't feel like myself at all, nor did I remember having a dinner with my father. He didn't seem surprised about me knowing about my uncle either, even though he's been hiding him from me. Somehow I got here and since I've already had some time, I guess it would make it easier for me to think with my stomach full. We both sat on the table and started eating the soup he made, I almost started missing being able to dine outside. I wish I've spent more time in this old place but it's been silent ever since she left. It was no palace but it certainly had a place in my heart and neither was the food stale or sour, as usual, he would start slowly but get to a delightful dried pork loin, simple but enjoyable.

'So, how's your soup, honey? '

'It's fine paps. 'I stopped for a second because I knew he would stop too, giving me full attention, which he did, soon after.

'I've been meaning to ask you about something important. '

'What is it April? What's wrong? '

This was harder than I expected. I wasn't afraid of the response but of what it might lead to.

'Am I. . 'The phone started ringing, luckily we weren't too far from it, it was stuck on the wall outside of the house.

'Am I? '

'Just one minute April, we can finish this conversation after. 'He got up and walked towards it.

'But I need to know!'He turned around in his track just to assure me that

'it won't take long' before making a run towards it. In his clumsiness he almost plunged into the wall, managing to stop himself right in time so he'd avoid it. He turned around again and signaled me that he was fine, right before he answered the phone. I couldn't sip from my tea nor eat anymore, I could only make swirls in the bowl and watch him get consumed by his work. I swear, sometimes, I really wish I was. . . 'ugh'No, this is supposed to be a family dine, what's left of it anyway, but I saw him getting close to ending his call with a smile that turned into a frown. We both stared at each other from the distance, I knew that they probably called him away from work, feeling disappointed I turned my look away from him. To be honest about it, that's not the only reason that made me look away from him, I thought I saw something behind. Something plated with four conduits on its face. After looking back at him, it went away and I tried keeping my distress away from him. But he knew too how I felt, we both did know each other well, I wasn't even going to ask anymore.

'April. . I. . 'He came back but I didn't bother to look at him.

'It's fine papa, just go, I can clean up here. '

'April, at least, let me. . '

'No', I raised my voice and told him,

'I don't need anyone's help, just go and leave me alone. '

'I'm sorry April, I only tried to. . '

'I don't care what you tried, you're the only once I got after mama died and you. . . you're barely here anymore. . 'I didn't cry even though I felt like I had the grief of the entire world on my shoulders, draining its sadness and despair. Even though I despised him, he still came closer and hugged me.

'It's okay now. . . I'm here now. . . '

'Too little too late father!'I escaped from his embrace and stood right in front of him.

'What will you choose father? Your work or your own daughter? I hate being forced to be alone, I can't live the rest of my life like this. '

'April, it's not up to me to make such a decision. '

'Yes it is, it's always been, you can't expect me to sacrifice my happiness for your sake! Not any longer. . ' 'How will we live then? I can't afford to leave this workplace or even to get to the point of selling the house, we still haven't paid. . . I mean I haven't paid the. . . '

'Don't mention her, the only thing you could ever afford is losing her and now. . . even me. 'My memories were shattered, it felt as if different versions of myself relived all of my memories, making new choices, better ones, making old ones or even repeating themselves forever. Was I even in the place to judge if one decision was better than another? I didn't know how they were connected, I was only aware of that whilst sailing a small boat made out of what I could feel. I couldn't remember if I had an accident and lost my sight, only that I was rowing through the water, hoping that I could get safely to the land. Despite that, I could, somewhat remember things from my past, images and the way they made me feel, they brought comfort in a sea of anguish. The water was cold and I wasn't able to check how deep it was, nor did I hear any sound from my surroundings. My arms were tired but I didn't want to stop, even though I could be in the middle of nowhere, stranded away, there wasn't anything I could do, other than reminiscing of the joyful colours I could still hold onto. I can still remember, almost vividly of my happiest period of my life, it was my birthday, eighteen years old.

'Come on, wake up. 'I switched sides in the bed, trying to remain hidden in it.

'Don't be like that April, it's time to blossom, today is the big day!'

'I'm sleeping. . . mother. '

'Don't be such a thorny brush, maybe if I tickle, you might consider. . 'And so she did, right through the fabrics, she managed to get to me and disturb my slumber

'Ach each haha, okay stop it. I'm awake now, I'm awake!'I couldn't resist her magical fingers. She always had her way with them, more than I could ever know.

'That's the spirit, now, shall we go ahead with your appointments, your majesty? '

'We shall, but could I, at least, get some more sleep before that? '

'Oh come on April, life isn't made to be slept through, you'll have enough time to sleep after this day ends. 'I was tired but the sunlight came through the window and got eclipsed by my eyelashes, my mother was merely standing beside them, waiting for me to get up.

'Ehm', before grabbing me and gently trying to pull me over.

'Okay, I got it, you don't need to treat me like a child anymore, after all, I'm mature now'

'More or less April. Now, should I keep brushing you off or could I trust you to come into the kitchen for breakfast? ,

'You know you can trust me, mama, I'll be down there in a minute or two. 'She rolled her eyes over the way down, I knew she would listen to reason, I got up as promised and fell on the soft rug next to my bed, from there the light rays weren't as strong but still warm and peaceful.

'April, don't make me come up again. 'But not for long, soon they would both start nagging me, which I didn't want to happen, so I finally came down to them. Mama was laying down the dishes whilst papa was washing his hands. I still remember how silly he was, getting his hands all dirty from his yellow dust. Where on earth he got it from goes beyond me. Mother and I sat down the table, waiting for him to finish so we could eat as a family.

'Can I taste one of the waffles before. . . ? '

'No, watch your manners, a young lady should behave well enough. '

'Oh mama, times changed, I don't necessarily have to act a certain way to be accepted. '

'It would actually and certainly help you in your life. '

'If you say so mother. 'We were enjoying the short conversation while waiting for papa to finish but he didn't. . .

The water kept on running and I could see his hand motion never changing, it remains the same, up and down, left and right and they didn't even appear like they were dirty at all, not anymore. I got up from the table and started approaching him, a strange scent of citrus came from towards him.

‘Papa, are you alright there?’ I couldn’t initially hear it but as I got, closer, I started hearing a strange noise coming from him, it sounded like a bunch of rocks being struck by lightning in a storm but I couldn’t explain why it came from him. He suddenly started moving his hands, that’s when I also stopped from walking towards him, I watched from sides as he closed the sink.

‘Mama, is papa fine? Am. . . Am I the only one hearing it?’ I turned around and she wasn’t facing me anymore, the noise got louder too. She was never silent towards me, not after she got cured, it didn’t make any sense for her not to speak to me. I kept turning from one to the other whilst being baffled by the situation. In-between both of them I noticed that mother also got up, the noise got even louder and now came from both directions something. . . wait. . I felt caught but not by them, but by something beyond my reach. Calming myself down helped me notice that both of my parents were cracking and shattering like glass. The sound stopped with their shattering, their parts fell on the floor but they weren’t made of skin nor meat but something else that melted right away in a white liquid. I tried grabbing it with my hand but it slipped away on my finger and not a single drop of it remained. I didn’t have any explanation for what has happened and something told me I shouldn’t stay in the house any longer than I was supposed to. Unshaken by the events I’ve witnessed, I took a step outside and felt something hit me in the head, something that landed onto the ground right after. It didn’t hurt me, but, as I reached and grabbed it, luckily it wasn’t lost in the vast sea of grass below me. It was a small coin, but from where did it come from? I looked upside and noticed that the window was opened, then I asked ‘Is anyone there? Hello?’

To my avail, no one answered, so I went back in to check who was up there, carefully trying not to step into the remains of my parents. I must have lost my mind because none of this was possible, although I kept going, hoping there was something that would come and break this bad dream and I could regain my mind just as before. No one was upstairs, I looked even in my room, then my parent’s room, then who left the window open? I approached it and looked at it, no sign of anyone that used it, so I tried closing it but ugh. The more I tried pulling it down, the harder it took me to realise that It was stuck open. I was distracted only for mere moments before something else came by, I could see, not so far from my house. . . My parents stood at a table with all my friends and other guests of sorts. . . I could even see my little. . . someone that I didn’t know too much about. They noticed me looking at them, they waved at me. But my parents were broken downstairs, how was this possible? They kept making signs, trying to make me come over, smiling at me as if nothing happened. I nodded in disapproval at their request, I knew something wasn’t right since I first laid my eyes on them. They didn’t seem to take my long distanced refusal too well, at least not all of them. Their bodies twisted around, taking unreal shapes, bending their hands and legs where they shouldn’t be. It was ghastly, even their faces formed black holes, deep inside they weren’t humans anymore. I could barely hold myself in place with my finger almost making holes through the window frame. The table broke under their heavy bodies and upon seeing me not comply, they started to slowly approach the house. No time to think about it, I stepped back and tried to get down as fast as possible to lock the door. I bashed into the desk and broke the lamp, It almost tripped me down the stairs and I barely managed to not cut myself on its sharp edges. I was there and almost so were they, it must have been mere meters between us, I jumped across the room and closed the door. I’m glad that being an athlete ran into family, else I wouldn’t have made the jump. The sound echoed behind it, just like my parents before, but louder and harder for me to hear without having my eardrums damaged. They kept bashing the door and I didn't know how much I could last, pushing against them with all the might I currently had. I had to keep on pushing the door as hard as I could so they wouldn't break through. A blow almost managed to make me lose it but I stood my ground, I didn't know which would come first, the breaking door or me passing out from a headache. I couldn't stand the sound, I backed away for moments. . . The entire room was shaking in from of my eyes, especially the door, I couldn't even hold myself on my feet. I turned to the kitchen and grabbed a chair, I managed to set it against the door. . . somehow, but it came at a cost, I fell on my back. I felt dizzy and unsure of what was about to happen, I turned on my belly and crawled away through the liquid, which I didn't care about anymore and stopped not so far away from. I was safe, at least for now, I couldn't hear the cracking sound anymore so I figured that they just. . A flash came into my mind, the window was open and I didn't have much time, every step I've made counted, I got up and started sprinting upstairs. The time felt like it was slowed down but it didn't stop the pain, I stepped onto the glass shards but I had no time to cry nor suffer, I almost landed on my hands as I got there to see. . . one of those deformed bodies crawling through the window. Maybe it was the blood going down from my feet, the loss of the blood itself or the desperation but I felt as if I lost. . . that I lost my light right in that moment. But as it made its way in, the window quickly closed on it, cutting more than half of its body down. I was still scared and hurt as the remaining dismembered body tried pulling itself closer to me, with a dark hole where its face should be. The hole looked more like a vortex, the more I looked at it, the more it changed, I slowly started walking towards it whilst on the ground. Maybe this is how it was meant to be, I didn't know what it would do to me but I trusted my guts and they told me to do it. . . But it felt so welcoming towards me, as if it was my destiny to do so. I hope this is. . the right decision. We both moved towards each other at the same pace, almost synchronized, even with its impairment it was able to imitate my movement. The thought of it being so fast despite it being broken made my heart tremble. When I stopped, just to check if it would do the same it did. I wanted to see what was it hiding in the hole because it looked deep enough. I kept moving, then we were both face to face. It stopped then with no move, even the sound dissipated. The hole was big, I could see that I was wrong before when I thought it just had a hole where its face should be, it being way bigger than that. The whole head got enlarged, it was enormous, so much so that I could fit in. Would I dare try it? There could be something beyond it, beyond darkness. I bit my lip in excitement. A surge of adrenaline came into my body. I didn't even feel fear nor remorse for what was about to happen, a just curiosity of what I was about to see or find. I gulped before taking a gamble, it could be dangerous but what isn't? I moved my head and entered it, my eyes were forced shut whilst making the entrance, I couldn't see by what or by who. I was able to open them shortly after, revealing a small compartment made of flesh, deep, deeper than it should be and on the other side was the face of my. . . His eyes were shut and so was his mouth. My body felt quite numb too but I could still feel my limbs moving around. Not enough room for me to stretch my hand and try reaching him so I decided to open my mouth and tried talking to him, even if it felt like a bad idea. The feeling of excitement got killed right away by the image and connection with reality, yet I was still too rash in my actions

‘Are you really. . . ’His eyes and mouth got opened in a flash and he started screaming. Drops of blood started coming out of his mouth but it wasn't enough to reach me. It was so unexpected that it made me panic, I used my hands to pull myself out and barely managed to get away. . . That thing, my. . . Started making those cracking sounds again and flailed its arms uncontrollably. I was flat on the back and kicked his arms away, it changed back into a fight for survival, I wanted to try to escape but It grabbed my ankles, I couldn't escape its strong grip. I started flailing my arms too in an effort to make him back down. Meanwhile, downstairs, the door was broken down, sounds of wood being chopped were noticeable. It seemed that I was at the end of my powers and my life soon to be forfeited towards nature's abomination. No, this isn't how it happened. Even if the colours of my memories were bright, this memory was bland, I knew that this wasn't how it happened but I couldn't remember the right version, the original line of events that happened. I don't know if. . being on this boat made me lose my mind or not, no matter how many times I try. . or tried, I can't remember it, I need to. . to find out what happened, how did I lose my sight, I believe that I didn't. . . I couldn't have died there and this would be the afterlife, right? Talking to myself isn't a good sign either, but I think I can get past my birthday, yes, I was finally getting ready to set foot in the whole wide world, an explorer, no, an achiever of great things.

'Incredible, unknown discoveries just waiting for me to reach them. ' 'You forgot to mention being a dreamer, and let's not forget your modesty!'

He said with a smirk on his face, if he wasn't a good friend of mine, I swear I would. .

'What? Cat got your tongue? '

'Stop acting like a jester if you don't wanted to be treated like one Mark. '

'Speaking from experience I presume? '

'Now you listen here. . '

'Wait, down. . . tone it down a notch for a second' He said whilst looking outside the carriage. I didn't know at what he was looking but he was quite rude acting in that manner.

'Wait here for a second. '

'Mark, what are you going to do? ' I asked him as he appeared to be ready to jump out.

'Don't jump, you could get hurt badly. 'He turned at me and said

'It's fine April, I always know what I'm doing. 'He jumped out, scaring both the rider and the horse, it was already paid for, not to mention that we were almost there so we had enough time for a small detour. I jumped out too, trying to see what was going on, Mark was standing in a crowd, surrounded by tall men and women who gathered up for some reason. I got closer and heard

'Madame, I'll wait for you here. 'Almost forgot about that, I turned around to face the rider and told him, 'Don't worry friend, the destination isn't that far, we can make it on the foot. 'I got dragged into the crowd by Mark,

'Wait a second, could you just please take it slower for a moment and tell me what's. . . going on? 'My gaze turned away from him, towards a street entertainer. At first sight it didn't seem like anything special, I see people like him all the time, to say the least, better, he was trying to juggle with some ivory bells and ended up dropping all of them on the ground. Everyone started laughing, including Mark too but I was the only one staring at him with not even a whisper coming out of my mouth. Or at least that's what I thought, there might have been another soul that didn't laugh either, but he was probably just as bad as the rest of them. I placed my arms one atop of each other whilst he was ready for his next act and started backing away. How could I have embarrassed myself like that? The look on his face, on all of them, I just couldn't. . .

'April, watch out!' He shouted, just in time that I managed to stop myself from going further on the street and avoided getting trampled by one of the horses from the ongoing carriages. Mark came and took me back on the sideway. Everyone was just staring at me as if I have become the center of amusement. I looked away in fear that they might see me cry and started walking away without saying a word. I knew that Mark was right behind me but I couldn't tell him, not until I was farther away from them.

'April, come on, slow down. . . it's okay now, I just want to know what happened. 'Scratching my arms and trying to calm down, I tried walking away as my path got cut out by Mark who probably had enough of this.

'Please April, can we just talk about it? You can't just run away from your problems, not forever at least. ' 'Mark, let's just go. . . please, I don't want to see anyone except him. ' 'Fine, but he's not the only one that matters. Don't forget about us. . . please, just think about it. 'It wasn't too far now, my secret wish came true and we both kept walking the rest of the road quietly, though I could see that he wasn't content at all, nervously scratching his chin, pulling small hair tips from his beard. And I couldn't believe that he didn't get rid off that frustratingly purple cap on his head. In a way, from the angle we were on, he reminded me of. . .

'Why are you staring at me? What's wrong now?' He asked as he stared back startled.

'It's nothing, just forget about it. '

'No, you started it so you might as well tell me why were you staring so profoundly. '

'I wasn't, I just wanted to see something behind the. . . fence next to you and it just happened that you were in the way. 'We both awkwardly looked into different directions after that, back to silence. This was most certainly not helping our relationship and it wasn't going to mend itself either. But the silence was broken once more as we arrived at our small apartment, I was happy to get home, after all, I hated having to leave papa alone for a large period of time. Both Mark and I entered and left our luggage next to the coat hanger, we didn't carry much anyway so there wasn't any problem.

'Papa, I'm home. . . we're back home I meant to say. 'I quickly tried to apologise to Mark as I didn't want to offend it.

'Don't worry April, I know. 'I managed to make my way back to the living room so I could see him, the kitchen sink was full of dirty dishes, I had my work cut off for me after, I even passed some thrown laundries that I chose to ignore on my way there. The house was in a bad state but at least, it was affordable.

'Papa, here we are. . . we didn't leave you alone too much I hope. '

He was staring at me from his chair, barely blinking, the plague hasn't left much of him intact. Though, I hope he wasn't

'Upset, right? We had to go and buy you the medication doctor Alexander prescribed. '

'Maybe we should let him rest some more April, you can't just force him to. . '

'I can what Mark? You were going to tell me what to do? You meant to say take care of my father, is that what you were going to say? '

'Don't start doing that, pretending that you're the victim in all of this. '

'Mark, I'm not pretending to be anything, I need to take care of my papa. Is it so hard for you to be more supportive?

'He lost his nerve soon and even interrupted. . .

'I've been patient enough but you can't have both me and dedicate the rest of your life to that. . . 'My thought. 'Don't you dare to talk like that about my father, I haven't asked you anything nor did I force you to say with me. '

'Fine, perhaps I should leave, it's better than staying with both of you. '

'Just go out and blow your steam off like you're always doing, there's no point in talking to you anymore. 'He was mad he left, slamming the door behind him, his threats of leaving were getting old at this point.

'Sorry papa, I almost forgot about your medicine, I'm also hoping that you won't take him seriously. We're arguing like that all the time in private. . . He didn't mean it!' Papa still hasn't said a word, he just kept staring at us throughout the visit, blinking but no whisper. I got closer and took a blanket that laid near him, trying to cover him up since it got colder than usual in the house. . . too abnormally cold.

'April. . . '

'Yes, papa? Finally decided to respond I see. '

'T. . tur. . 'He was struggling to even say a word, I'm surprised he managed to say my name in his first attempt. 'It's okay, there's no hurry at all I'm not going anywhere. . . I might have to go around and find out why it got so cold all of the sudden. 'I looked around, the windows were shut, probably the ones upstairs were left open.

'Wait here. . . oh sorry, just keep trying to. . . you know. . 'He wasn't doing well and neither was I, what was in Mark's mind, making me have to pick between him and my happiness? I had a more important task ahead of me, the entire house felt as if winter came inside, even colder than outside. I tried going where the stairs were supposed to be but they weren't there, even after gazing around the room, the ceiling, it appeared as if there was no second floor. Perhaps I'm letting myself get affected more than I thought, but to go as far as imagining another level to a house that I visited constantly? Perhaps I'm also overthinking it, I must be thinking about the old house we used to live in, however it doesn't explain the temperature drop. In that case, the only other explanation is that there must be a window open in one of the other rooms. . that must be it but which one? Silly me. . . there are no windows in our rooms, they never had in the original design. I'm going to have a headache if I keep this up. I had to stop my investigation for a moment as I've heard sounds coming from the entrance, following them in order to see what's going on. . . I forgot to close the door after Mark left, enough time has passed that an intruder could have entered the house. The place wasn't too large nor too small, If I went around the corner, whoever came inside would notice me immediately so I had to be cautious. Yet. . . my father is right in the living room, in the case of a burglar, I'm afraid to think what would happen. I don't have enough time to think this through, he can't defend himself. I wanted to take the nearest lamp I could see so I could use it as a weapon but, no. There wasn't any in the house, maybe someone redecorated, now I can't see anything in my sight that can be used for the same purpose. I stopped paddling as soon as I realised that. . . this wasn't my memory, that wasn't my father nor any other acquaintance, so to whom did this memory belong to? I resumed my row as I had no other choice, with the past intact or not, I had to focus on the present and maybe just one more time so my hardship would ease, this one had to be mine, the day I got married. I've known Jonathan for years, ever since I moved into town and almost got arrested. It was the middle of the day, or maybe midnight, the time wasn't important, just the fact that I got there, maybe it wasn't a fact at all. No, I've been married to him for at least four years but I can't remember the day we wed, at least, I can remember him, I couldn't dare let myself lose his memory even if I tried. Tomorrow, yes, it was an important day, he will be promoted to become the chief of detectives or was it the chief of the department? I've always confused them, strangely because I believe I'm also a detective. I work with my husband, I think. . We were in the section one day trying to work on a case, we lived in a small town, not many people to defend nor others to commit crimes but it would happen from time to time. Not many officers joined us, just two others and the chieftain who didn't do much. Sometimes I thought that I deserved to become the chief, I was even more qualified than he was, not to mention that I cared more than him.

‘April, are you done with that report, honey? You've been staring for some time at it? ’

‘Yes, I'm almost done here, It just needs a good ending. ’The report title read ‘Disappearance case. ’ but no name written in the title, nor was a fingerprint or image displayed.

‘Wait, so who has exactly disappeared? ’

‘I don't know, we just got some reports about a missing person that no one could describe nor give us any other details about. Were you just blankly staring at the file or what? ’

‘I just wanted to be sure, that's all. Quite a peculiar case. ’

‘Indeed, it is. ’I took a sip from the coffee before placing it back on the table, I noticed that something constantly made ripples in it. After looking at the mug for a while, nothing came to be, I couldn't tell why, maybe it was because of the boring case I was assigned to, or. . . What's happening to me? Someone's life might be in danger, I'm supposed to help, not to make time pass. Let me see, four of five feet tall, more or less, unidentified eye colour, no facial features, gender unknown, but it says right here that we had the person here, directly into the interrogation room. Jon is working on his papers too, I shouldn't bother him now, at least 'till I finish this mess up. I think I remember someone, I've spoken before with.

‘Honey, it's getting quite late, how about we head back home and resume our work tomorrow? We're not getting paid for overtime. ’

‘But what about this missing person? He could be dead from what we know and what about his family? I. . . ’

‘He has no family nor many friends, the ones we've spoken with. . you know what they said. ’ ‘I don't know what's that supposed to mean. ’

‘I was referring to what they said, you know this, another reason we should head back home, you're even more tired than I expected. ’

‘First of all, it's not even that late. ’Upon glancing away from him, directly onto one of those clocks from the wall, I noticed that it was barely after midnight. But the clock was most likely broken since its hands went counterclockwise.

‘Nevermind that. ’

‘Look, you can go and try talking with the co-workers in the morning but you won't achieve anything in your current state, everyone needs some rest from time to time. ’

‘Perhaps you're right, maybe long sleep could help with the case. ’

‘Thank you, I was getting tired of reorganising the same old papers. ’After carefully placing all of my notes and files where they belonged, we closed the section and went outside on our long way home. The night was beautiful and I could see a. . .

‘Hey look, a falling star over there!’ Jon pointed towards the sky far above.

‘Make a wish. . . actually do not wish for the missing person to come back, I’ll use mine for that. ’

‘Jon, come on, you’re not supposed to tell me your wish, it might not come true afterwards. ’

‘Oh, like it would come true because some old superstition and not because our detective work, perhaps mine in particular. ’He didn’t feel that much of a stranger as he said that, unlike before. We both smiled and joked on our way, with the wish in my mind all set, one small detail, I was wondering, who am I? I wish that my question would be answered, even if it might sound silly, even if it would be considered wasted, I just want to know.

‘Are you feeling fine?’

‘Yes, sorry about that, I was thinking about you know what. . . ’

‘I’m sure it will turn out fine, now, we’re almost there thankfully. ’I wasn’t too tired but he looked as if he was ready to pass out in front of the door. I had to be the one in charge to open it, all because of his inability to fit the key in the lock. ‘Protecting the innocent I see, one door at a time. ’

‘It’s just a door, don’t act like you’ve caught a burglar in action. ’

‘If burglars acted like you when you’re tired, this town wouldn’t need officers like us, would it now?’ ‘After a couple of unrecognisable mumbles from him, we entered the house, tired as ever. I felt like I could sleep on the floor, the bed felt divine as I laid forth in it, safe near my loving husband.

‘Hah’, he slept the moment he reached the pillow, with me awake for some time, doing nothing but staring at his face. There’s nothing wrong with me doing so, I didn’t need his permission anyway to do it. I never took the time to look at my husband before, I didn’t even know much about him either, this strange thought ran through my head. . . Now I was convinced that I was going insane but. . . I don’t believe Jon is my husband. . . no, that’s not it, I don’t think that I’m his wife. I covered him up to his shoulders with that warm blanket, just before going back outside. He was so tired that he didn’t notice me, nor the sound of the closing door behind me. April or not, I had to find more about the missing person, I need to go back to the station and take that file with me. No one saw me walk through the town, it was too late for that unless I counted the crickets and frogs, almost stepped on one of those buggers but that didn’t stop me either from getting towards my destination. Oh. . . I just realised, I was the dummy!The door was locked and the key was back in Jon’s pockets, too far and hard to reach without walking and alarming him of my plan, so, unfortunately, I had to improvise. In one way or another, I noticed that one of the windows in front of me were big enough for someone to fit in, I can’t believe I’m going to do this. . . They were big enough for someone to fit in, I can’t believe I’m going to do this. . They were indeed high enough and I was sure that I could reach them if I jumped and grabbed onto the ledge. Also, they didn’t seem solid enough to withstand what was I about to do. . . . A rock was laying near the sewage holes, convenient as if someone wanted me to do it, I grabbed it nonetheless. No one was around to see me, I made sure to look around everywhere, no one in their right mind would be out at this hour anyway. I chucked it, successfully breaking the window, the glass shards didn’t even close near me and they managed to land far either farther away or inside the building. A few of the shards remained attached to what remained of the window, not enough to hurt me. I took a head start and jumped. . . After that, I tried jumping again with an even greater distance in-between my past and current attempt. Despite my best effort, I couldn’t do it, indeed, it was unreachable, by a long shot, I wasn't even able to touch its edge with the tip of my fingers. And I tried, jump after the jump but no result, the plan wasn't thought through, though there must be another way in. The station was big and connected with other buildings, tight enough that there wasn't any way for me to go around unless I was a ghost, but then I guess I could walk through the front door. Focus April, getting inside. I've already got some property damage going on if I'll ever get caught, I guess that breaking in won't make things any worse, I'm a detective after all so I'm just doing my job. There are lines one shouldn't break, though what I'm doing is just. . . I took a look at the door, even tried pushing it around but it wouldn't budge, if only I had knowledge in. . . What was that? Sounds of a big animal screeching came from somewhere. I had to investigate.

'So uncle, enough time passed. . . Are you going to tell me something new or not? '

'I've already told you that I'm not your uncle April'

'I know that, ugh. You've been quiet so far and since I can't really escape, do you mind telling me where are we? '

'You're safe April, in a safe memory. '

'What do you mean by a safe memory? A memory can't become a place and I don't remember being trapped in a void with someone who looks just like my uncle. '

'You will understand when. . '

'You keep saying that but I don't, nor will I be able to understand unless you tell me so, please. . . It's getting frustrating. '

'Don't follow the sound. '

'There's no other sound except the one created by our voices. 'It stopped again, like a small timed toy, leaving me once again alone with my thoughts. I don't know what he's trying to achieve by making me contemplate on his nonsense, by now the idea of jumping made me comfortable. Not even the coin I threw reached the ground so will I be able to?

'You're safe in a memory!' he said, it said at this point.

'How can it be safe if you've got danger two feet away from you? '

I screamed in its face, pointless as it hasn't responded yet. I still enjoyed doing that, I didn't have many things to do around, except re-organising and trying my best to not get bored from it. I could try throwing more stuff outside but it might leave me out of objects to re-organise around if there's nothing to move. Standing down my chair for the countless time, looking at him and being somewhat surprised, every single time I laid my sight upon him brought back familiarity even though he wasn't my real uncle. He didn't want to harm me, not help me either, I wonder what's his real objective, what could it possibly want.

'I noticed that there's a long way down there, I kinda thought about where it ends and how is it floating in thin air. I mean I haven't come up with results yet. . . but you know, I'm getting there. 'What a great conversationalist I thought, he was really helping me through his experience and advice. Well, it's time to move everything again 'till it decided to speak up, it wasn't actually that bad, come to think off, every time something changes in the house, it left a new impact, almost as if I was somewhere else. If only I could change him, not only that but he's too heavy to be moved around. The couch should be the first thing I should take care off, but to where? I should make some place for it before deciding where it should stay, perhaps if I. . A few steps away from the table and I managed to step into something, it got on the entire floor. So greasy, sticky and it came out of nowhere. I walked towards the kitchen and started looking for a mop, it wasn't going to clean itself, after all, that and 'I doubt you'll help, am I right?

'Not even a flinch, I didn't need his help anyway, the bucket and this mop should do the trick, I only need to dip it in some water and I'll be set to go. A flip on the sink but no water came out, droplets, I guess that was another one of the inconveniences of not being tied to the ground, but now I couldn't use the mop, unless. . . Unless I could use it to throw the liquid off the floor and out the door. I felt the bucket behind since it was of no use to me anymore and got the door open. The distance between the pool and the opening wasn't that great, I could only hope that it won't get stuck on the mop. I started throwing it, driving it outside, changing its course towards the void but it just fell back to its original position, as if it was alive and moving on its own. Even parts of it, the small dose that was stuck on the mop fell back in the big puddle. I threw the mop away in a feat of frustration, none of what I've tried worked so far. This place was wearing me, slowly but surely mad, both in rage and in sanity. If I can't get rid of it, at least, I could roll a carpet over it, I immediately took one from the closet. A wide selection of them, though. . . this one used to be my mother's favorites. . I'm sure she would have liked seeing it once again, father's old chair too, these two should go hand in hand. Who would have thought I could've had so much fun in this constrained place? Perhaps I was in an ocean, I thought to myself, abandoned by someone to die alone in a small and almost empty boat. If that was true, I should be thankful that whoever did this had the decency to give me the means of survival, after all, If I manage to find some help I will be safe. So far, still nothing, I can't even hear the water making splashes but I can touch it with the paddle. I was so self-absorbed by my memories, by what was real or not that I forgot for how long I was going. Too bad they didn't keep away the hunger and the thirst, I could really help myself with something sweet, or anything at all. The water, just like myself is probably salty, I could try it but It would be more bad than good. I'm afraid to think more than I have too about the alternative, dying alone here, I did think about it though and for some time now. I can't even figure about something that could help me in my aimless sailing. The memories made me happy even if they were short re-lived but they don't have the same effect as they did once, changed or unchanged. I could try something new, like trying to imagine living someone else's life. . Yeah, that's it, something to spice up my demise since I doubt that remembering the moment before I lost my vision will bring it back. Also, what would be the point of it now? What could I be now? Rather who should I become? I could live and end my life happily in my own fantasy, maybe I should live a far more common life with no one to disturb me and my affairs. Either a princess or a plebian, maybe a hero or a villain, time isn't on my side so I think I'm going to be a. . . A terrible roar followed the screech I've heard before, it must have come from the other side of the town, maybe a couple of animals reached our town. I could see through some of the windows that lights started coming out, I wasn't the only one startled by whatever was out there. The case will have to wait for now, even with my failure, I could, at least, redeem myself with this one job well done. Another one. . This one came faster than the last time, I've got nothing on me but I could try to calm the beast down, I ran to the point where the growl came from but no animal in sight. In my rush, I didn't originally see it but one door was opened. My uniform and badge are still on me so I guess it won't be trespassing. Thankfully I almost slept with them on. I approached the perimeter, whoever was in the house was in danger so no time to waste, I jumped in and looked around, still no one or nothing.

‘Hello? This is Officer April, I’m here to help!’ I waited near the door but no response whatsoever, even if a rabid animal was here, it would probably get alarmed by my voice and hopefully back down. No! Growls came from somewhere upstairs, it could be anything, from this part of the country, a wolf, maybe even worse. I know that people started noticing, if I were to go back and call for help, I would end up looking like a coward. . . they could even start distrusting the protection we’re offering them, no! I can do this, alone. The kitchen was close, looking more like an armoury at this point, I took a blade and with the spit in my gut, I was ashamed that I had to resort to this, but if it’s really a wolf, it could seriously hurt people and I couldn’t allow that. Each step I took got me closer but at the same time farther away from my own security. I thought I had the upper hand, a weapon and my wits against animal instincts, sharp fangs and claws. Maybe not so much but I always thought myself to be a lucky woman. After all, I managed to get so far just fine and very much alive. I got upstairs and saw that thing. . . Turned around with its back, standing in front of a window, my hand was shaking and I could barely hold the knife in it. It wasn’t anything I could possibly prepare against, a beast like no other, no, it was like a small hill that sprouted legs and came to life. My heart was beating fast but I tried keeping it low, same as my breath up to the point of passing out. I changed my mind about wanting to fight it, three or four times my size, at least, I kept as silent as one could be. I didn’t know how fast it was or what it was looking for here, but if I’d try to run it would be possible for me to get caught after my first step. The people of this town, I need to think of their protection. I’ve made a vow, my safety comes after theirs, the window he was staring at lead towards the other side of the town. The height was quite much, if it went there and I would decide to follow on the same path as it, I could break my legs from the fall. I couldn’t see the beast in its entirety, yet from the shakiness of its body, I could see that it was getting ready for something. Could be anything, regardless if it was a dressed lion or not, If I attack it I could kill or harm an endangered species, or get myself killed. How did it end here, though? I’ll find the details later, it isn’t moving yet so, there’s a small gap that leads to the other side of the town, I could try getting there as fast as possible and draw it as farther away from the population as I could. I’ll figure out the rest after. I waited for it to make a move, I needed some time to get around, but as soon as it started shaking I yelled at the top of my lungs:

‘Over here you oversized skulk!’ My body turned around whilst yelling it and sprinted towards the exit, I didn’t know if the beast was chasing me, yet, at the same time, I knew it was close to my back. Sprinting through a pair of stairs wasn’t the best idea but I didn’t have much of a choice in the matter. I knocked one of the desks in my way, with papers flying all around, but I did not fall nor did I look behind. A jump is all it took me to get outside and to close the door behind me. In that one second, before I managed to shut it, I saw a horrendous smirk on its face, its long pointy limbs and strange twisted small eyes. I wasn’t sure if I closed the door by my own initiative or because of fear. Far from over, I could barely keep it closed from being rammed into, with every hit feeling as if it was going to break on me and trample my body. I held it in place with my best of limits, with no key to lock it up, I was never the type to cry but the situation got worse than before. . . The hits got stronger and my arm felt like it was going to fall, almost numbed down from the pain. The cold iron door hurt me more than I thought it will and I could see no one in sight to help me, even if it was my job to protect them, I . . . needed their help. My feet were rooted to the ground, my shoulder got closer to being dislocated on the spot, each impact added more ink to my death sentence. It was too strong for me alone to bear its wrath.

‘Please stop. . . please just stop!’ I’ve pleaded and cried for it to stop, to no avail, a wild beast is still a wild beast in the end. One knock, one last one threw me away from it, managing to crack a bone from my arm, I screamed in pain whilst on the ground. I haven’t fully realised it but my entire left arm was broken, I wasn’t even able to move it, let alone defend myself with it. Beyond my power, I couldn’t stop wailing, watching the door, it neither opened nor rammed anymore. Still hurt, I couldn’t get up and check it out, maybe that was the fear, changing my words, preventing me from moving any further. I was glad that I had some time to grab some breath, but why, why did it. . . ? The window! No, ‘agh, no’, the pain was too strong. I couldn’t make it in time to the other side, let alone try to attract it.

‘Help, anyone? Officer down here, please. . . anyone?’ I saw the lights before, I was sure that people would come to check the loud sounds out, yet no one in sight and I was stuck down here. No, I need to think optimistically, that’s what ma always wrote and she was right, I still had my right arm, with its support, I lifted myself back up. My arm was still damaged, so badly that I had to hold it with the other one for the time being, no time to search for aid, my plan remained the same. I walked and walked without being able to run, or at least not without adding more pain to it. I took the first turn to get to the other side of the town and waited for any strange noises to give it away. Silent for now, not a good sign, it wasn’t this house, nor this one, this one didn’t even have a window, I checked multiple homes, looking for the one it was in. There, the window was open, but again no sign of it. Wait is that? For a second, I thought I managed to see a tall figure standing at the frame. . . It couldn’t have been the beast, it didn’t have a leathery hand. Maybe I was paranoid but I started thinking of it, not as a dumb beast but intelligent, able to open doors and windows, ugh, focus April, you can study it after it’s safely away from everyone. But, speaking of the beast, if that figure I thought I’ve seen before wasn’t it, it could only mean that it managed to get out to where I was. No, this wasn’t good, I was already crippled and it had two ways to escape if it hadn’t already done so. . . I felt a cold breeze on my back as if someone was breathing, someone who could potentially help me, ‘Oh thank. . .’ I turned around and got grabbed by it, I screamed in pain as it held both of my arms with some sort of hooks, it pushed right into my broken arm, damaging it even further. There was no way for me to fight back as it was crushing me. . . It lifted me from the ground, far enough that I couldn’t reach and kick it. . . I kept screaming in agony as it moved its bruised extension around me ‘Stop. . .’ Fear came running through my head, I was about to lose control and get crushed.

‘April!’ I’ve heard my name before the sounds of shots being fired. . . before all going blank. Then I stopped, the ship finally arrived at somewhere but I didn’t know where, land ho or not, it hit something. I reached it with my hand to feel sand running through my fingers, the sensation of its warmth brought gloom but also the joy to my heart. I must have reached civilization, or, at least, an island, hopefully, filled with people. The first steps were the hardest, right off the shore I thought I could barely stay on my feet whilst walking into the unknown land, the sand was so warm. I wasn’t able to feel it inside the boat but I had no shoes on me, not that it mattered anyway, I could even start kissing it joyfully just because I escaped my water tomb. I wasn’t able to move fast, barely one step ahead at a time, the joy of not being dead quickly went away from where it once came. My situation wasn’t going to leave me anytime sooner, even if I was rescued, I would have to live the rest of my life like this, alone with no family nor friends to help me in my time of need. It made me wonder if it would have been better if I died there or If I should return to it.

‘I can help you with that!’ A voice came from somewhere but I couldn't determinate from where.

‘Who said that and where are you? ’

‘I'm right here, come on, don't you want to be there when it starts? ’

‘What are you talking about? I'm in a serious need of help, could you please aid me? ’

‘Don't worry, the festival is about to start, I want you to meet someone’ Her voice betrayed her before, maybe a child or slightly older, she probably didn't understand my situation, that's why I asked her if she could:

‘Call your parents to help me please? You don't have to tell me your name if it makes you feel uncomfortable. . . but I really need some guidance’

‘It's okay, they're at the festival, so is my friend. Do you want me to take you there? It's not that far, I won't bite either unless you want me to. ’ I was going to start wandering around but it could be dangerous, I knew nothing about the place I was in, so I might as well put my blind trust into her, hoping I won't be wrong, after all, it was probably just a small girl, I doubt she could be able to hurt me.

‘Sure little dove, but I might need some help, I can't just walk alone guided only by the tone of your voice. ’

‘That goes without saying, don't worry ma'am, I won't let you down. By the way, I love your dress, I'd say we're almost the same size. ’ I felt my arm being grabbed by her as she said it, followed by a small surge of pain. I doubt that it came from her but I couldn't be sure of her intentions.

‘Are you fine? Am I hold your arm too tight? ’

She noticed it too, perhaps it did come from her.

‘Don't worry about me, I'll be okay. ’ Spending the whole time rowing the boat really took its toll on me, I don't think I ever felt as weak as I feel in this instance.

‘Oh, could you please take us on a road? I've been stepping on these rocks for some time and it's hard to avoid them, well you know. . ’ Her grip strengthen after my request, or was it coincidental? I didn't know why, but the path we were on hurt me more than it should.

‘No, this is the road. I'm sorry but there is no other way. How come you don't have shoes? ’ ‘I wish I knew why, I really do, but I don't. I don't even know why I can't see or where I am. ’ ‘Amnesia, it happens a lot in their parts, a friend of mine had the same. . . You know what? I shouldn't bother you with my story, you've got enough problems as it is. ’

‘No, go on, I don't really got anything else to do, except avoid small chunks and you know, listen to you. ’ I like to imagine that she smiled as I told her that, it wasn't as realistic as my memories but it was enough for me.

‘Well, we were close. . . very close, we must have been friends for years, childhood friends, then, on one cold night he just forgot about us, just suddenly, all blank. ’

‘That sounds so sad, is he okay now? ’

‘Well, he's doing. . Let's not talk about that for the time being. ’ She didn't tell me much about what happened to him, so I had to except the worst,

‘I'm sorry, continue with your story. ’

‘Well, you can't really. . . um see. . but not so far from here, there's a lighthouse, that's where he lost it, I've tried my best to help him but he didn't listen, for some odd reason he wouldn't open his eyes. I had to stay with him for the entire night until his parents came. '

'But didn't you say it was a cold night? Where did you both st. . 'A rock on the path almost tripped me over, it felt, though, almost as if I was pushed into it.

'Oh sorry, old roads, what can you do? Anyway, I was getting there, no need to question me about every small insignificant detail. '

'I'm sorry, I just found it. . . Nevermind that. '

'I won't, now where was I? We both spend the night in the lighthouse, we were just staring at each other. I even managed to show him my new dress, though it got ruined in the same night, no worries though, I can always get a new one. After that, I tried my best to make him remember who he was and what happened to him but my effort was in vain. We're almost in the town, you could ask a doctor about your feet and you know what. . '

'Thanks. . . For your concern. 'She had no reason to be lying to me, but I still had a bad feeling about her. So what was it after all, did she spend the entire night with him or did he wait for his parents to arrive? I feel like, asking more questions would only make her more upset, which wouldn't do me any good.

'Well, I've been with him during his recovery, I was practically living in the same house, trying to help him. I took him throughout the town and into other places and. . . right when he started making progress. . . he. . . I'm sorry, I shouldn't cry. '

'It's okay dear, go on, it's normal to feel grief for a lost friend, I might have a napkin inside my pocket if I'm not wrong. I placed my hand there, but half way in I got stopped.

'No, wait, I'm fine now, no need to concern yourself. I'm dry now, see?

Oh, sorry. '

'Yeah, so how far are we now from there? The town that you mentioned before? '

'We're almost there, we just need to take this shortcut through the woods. I hope you don't mind those things on the ground. '

'But you said we need to take this road to get to the festival and the doctor. . . you said nothing about a shortcut. I don't even know your name, let alone, I'm supposed to trust you? I need some answers now!' I placed my foot down and stopped. My arm also slipped away from her reach, I didn't know what to make out of it, but this little liar wanted to take me somewhere else I suspected.

'I know this might look strange. . . '

'Enough with the jokes, I've grown sick of them, and I've heard all of them so you can't excuse yourself now. I just need help so you could act a little more decent. '

'I'm sorry, I didn't intentionally made them. I mean, I didn't want to offend you at all, it's just. . . '

'Just what child? You can't even begin to comprehend about how I feel. '

'It's just that I'm still mourning my friend and. . . 'I interrupted her again, I got sick of her poorly made excuses, if she didn't 'Want to help, you should have said so. I can just. . . follow the road towards the end and find someone else who could really help me. 'I started awkwardly marching alone. It was hard, my feet hurt and I was afraid to step alone but I had no other choice.

‘Wait, look, I can see that you might not trust me now. . .’ The sound of her voice came from my right, I pretended to look in another direction, she probably knew why I turned my head, I only hoped that she would get the message.

‘Ignoring me won't help you get there, you don't. . .’

Her voice got louder as she stopped behind, probably after deciding to leave me alone. ‘even know where you're going. ’

‘I'll find the way myself, I know you're lying about it, just like you did with those other things. ’

‘I haven't lied to you about anything, you couldn't possibly begin to know that and I also don't see what the big deal is. ’

‘Of course, you don't, just stop following me. . .’

‘I'm not following, it just happens that I'm going the same way as you are. . .’

I knew she lied again, I may have been blind but I wasn't as blind towards her deception.

‘Towards the town you said you'd take me, but the road doesn't lead there?’ It was the time I stood up to her, child or not, she had no right to treat me like that.

‘It's almost time, you should get ready!’ He started moving and talking again, this time, a bit sooner than I've predicted, nevertheless, at least, I had its pattern memorised.

‘For what should I get ready? Look, it's never really that easy with you, is. . .’

‘No’ as he said it, I could feel the tone of his voice being even more serious than before, increasing, up to the point where I couldn't miss nor ignore what he was stating.

‘Core memories are about to crash into each other. ’

‘But what does that mean? I'm all ears here. ’

‘You need to. . . to. . .’ His face cracked, just like glass or ice. Was this supposed to happen? I wasn't sure of it.

‘Uncle, are you okay?’

‘I didn't want to touch him, fearful that he might shatter into small pieces, leaving me all alone. I was walking back and forth, trying to find out what should I do, I shouldn't let him leave me, not again.

‘Be. . .’ I looked back at him and saw him trying to, despite being at the point of cracking up, trying to help me, trying to warn me. ‘be safe. ’

Were the last words, followed by a smile before his body burst out like a mirror.

‘Nooo’, I shouted whilst grabbing pieces of him that were spread across the table, but it was no use, as the last person that was trying to help me died. It was now that I understood what my father said before a part of him died. I had no time to remember and definitely no time to cry as cracks began to form all around, covering the entire house. They weren't small ones either. The second I saw the liquid on the floor spilling into the abyss I decided to run upstairs. No time for mourning, It hasn't reached up yet but I was afraid of what was about to happen, I would break his last wish but I had nothing, it wasn't up to me. I wasn't the one causing this, I didn't deserve this. I looked down the stairs and saw that I got to safety just in time, as the entire floor broke just like my uncle's body and fell down, I knew that I had nowhere to go, there wasn't any room left upstairs, just empty holes covered by doors. It was only a matter of time, it would seem like I was going to be forced to make the choice sooner than I expected, maybe I wouldn't have done it at all if it wasn't for these circumstances. The choice was too hard for me to take, I still didn't fully understand what he meant by being inside a memory, I was too afraid of death, of falling to the deep's end that I curled into a small ball and. . Just waited. I did my best, trying not to think of it. No happy memory could come up at all, not that I could think of any, given the situation, except my papa's final. . I was sitting next to him, just the two of us, in the hospital, he was still sleeping whilst under treatment, the doctor didn't know what was the cause of it. I held his hand for the entire duration, for how long he had left.

'I'm still. 'It was hard for me to speak, I loved him so, so much and I never had the chance to 'apologise for everything I said, for the hard times I've done caused you. For making you the reason mother left, yet, you were there for me. The entire time, even when you were sick, even when you and ma fought I knew that you had a good reason. I thought only about myself, even when you lived with me and Mark for a while, I'm sorry it had to end like this. They told me you may never wake up and I might never. . 'I started crying, my hand was still wrapped around his warm embrace, I hoped that he would try to do the slightest movement, signaling that he might recover, I didn't know what else to say but I had to. It wasn't enough.

Nothing was enough, nothing was enough, nothing could possibly explain my behaviour.

'I was a dumb girl back then okay? I didn't understand what you had to sacrifice and when I finally understood it was already too late, for any of us. 'I couldn't even look at his face, he was too peaceful, covered into the bed, silent, I just wanted to hear his voice and not for once but for the rest of my adult life. If only I had the chance to make it up to you, to spend my every moment in your presence and tell you how sorry I am. The adventure of a lifetime is everything you ever wanted. I wish you were able to live through it.

'If I could go back, even for a moment, I wonder. . . but I can't, I can't erase my past nor my mistakes. Even thinking about it feels like an insult towards you. . . I can't change the past, I can't tell you that I'm sorry because you won't be able to hear it. . . 'We were never able to speak to each other as adults, I blamed and resented him for so many things.

'I wish, we would have had the chance to sort it, that I wasn't so blind to. . . '

Outside the room I could hear knocks, someone else wanted to see him, but who?

'May I enter, is anyone here?

'A scrawny voice came from the other side of the door, a voice that I haven't recognised but I politely accepted, thinking that it might be one of his friends from work, coming to pay their respects.

'Yes, I mean. . 'I cleared my throat and took out a napkin to clean the tears off my face

'Yes, you may. 'I didn't pay much attention to him at first, I was here for papa after all, but. . . he was the only one except me that came to visit him, no one else cared so far, not even his supposed other friends.

'Do you mind if I sit next to you, miss? '

'Stay wherever you may please, I wasn't, I mean I never were the kind of other people around. 'I wish that was true, it just came out of my mouth without giving a thought, no, It wasn't my intention to be dishonest, even towards a stranger.

'Fine, I wasn't telling the truth there, I'm sorry, I'm just. . '

'It's okay, I know how you feel, your father often spoke about you. 'I couldn't look before, but now I was too ashamed to even re-think my decision, he probably hated me, at this point I hated myself so I couldn't blame him.

'Don't worry, he only spoke keen and well about you, he loved you April, you know that right?' With the tail of my eyes, I could see him turning his head towards me but I didn't look back, I was trying to hide my tears from him. No, this is too painful to remember, of all my memories, that's the one I hated the most, being forced to accept everything I've done to him and he died, he died and I had to live with that, not even my uncle's comfort could make me feel better. The rest of the glass house continued shattering, one crack at a time, there wasn't much time left, I had to finish the memory. . . for his sake. The man next to me, it was the first time I've met him, my uncle, I remember him grabbing both mine and my papa's hands.

'Look at me April, I'm not trying to lie to you, he did.' I turned around and stopped him.

'He did what? He loved me, even after everything I've done? You don't know me, I don't even know how to meet my father but I doubt you knew. . . 'I pulled my hand away and stared at him in spite, who did he even think he was?

'I know I might not have been there for him when he needed me, we've had our differences, but I tried keeping in contact with him, at least for a while after your mother left. '

'Who exactly are you anyway? And why would my father tell you about her?' I still didn't know who he was but he looked like he knew me well enough, not to mention he knew some personal information about me

'April, my name is Presley, I'm your uncle and obviously his brother. Now, I know this is quite sudden. '

'That's. . . I don't know what to say, my father never told me about having a brother. . . 'I didn't know if I could trust him, he looked strong, probably stronger than me, if he was a thief or worse pretending to be my uncle, he could end up being dangerous, especially if he planned to hurt us both. I couldn't leave him alone, there's no telling what he could do.

'I can see that you're worried. There's no need for that, I've already checked in with the nurse.' He handed me an old scrappy identification paper which reads both his and our family name, I gave it back to being done but it looked fine from what I was able to see.

'I'm sorry, I thought you weren't. . . '

'I know, better to be safe than sorry, we need to talk about something personal. '

'What? What could be more personal than talking about him?' I said whilst pointing towards my father. 'Which we're already doing? Maybe you're ready to explain why you weren't with him during the accident or why you've never helped us? Perhaps you came here to apologise, is that it? '

'Nothing of that sort.' I looked away for a chance out, even if I've already looked a thousand times, both my time and memory were about to run out. . . and when that happened, every crack around and under, perhaps even beyond would shatter it and fall with me. I wish I had more time to remember, painful or not, it was a part of me and. Maybe on the other side, he'll know I thought about him in my last moments.

'He couldn't hear me anyway. I've studied patients like him before though it might help if he heard familiar voices. Not that mine was much of it, I've been more like a stranger to him than a brother. '

'I know what you mean, I could say the same about myself, we never did what he wanted. It was all about me, even after my mother left, not even once the thought of how selfish I was came through my mind. . . 'He interrupted me, he wasn't such a bad person, I was able to see that even if we barely met for minutes, or maybe the fact that I could relate to him in sorrow clouded my judgement.

‘Maybe. . . ’

‘I think. ’

We both began talking at the same time and stopped accordingly. It was embarrassing for both of us, two people who're related and barely met on a grievance.

‘You should go ahead Prissy. I doubt I can say anything anymore. ’

‘It's fine, you could just listen to this, I know that this might sound strange, or even crazy, not to mention sudden, depending on how open minded are you and. . . ’

‘Stop please, if you're going to bring some spiritual nonsense, I'd rather prefer to keep it away from my father. ’The last thing I needed was an insane acquaintance, maybe it was possible for him to be dangerous after all, though I should wait and hear him out. He could end up proving me wrong.

‘No, it's nothing of that sort, it's actually something else, you could say it's out of this world, listen April. . . ’

‘Get out now, or I will call out the staff to get you out by force. ’

‘April, please, he's my brother, I know what I'm doing. ’

‘Don't try to explain your, whatever might be, you just came here after so many years of not caring about me nor my father with some sick expectation, you disgust me!’

‘I cared about my brother more than you could ever think, even if he was stubborn sometimes, which I can also see in you too. ’

‘Lies, you said it yourself before, you weren't there for him. Why would I believe you then, uncle? ’

‘I don't expect you to believe me, I've barely managed to deal with it when I found it, but I know more than you and I can actually help my brother rather than pity myself near him. ’His words were harsh, but I wasn't going to just stay there and take that from him.

‘Listen here you. . . ’His face had cracks all around, running under his coat, down by the neck.

‘Are you. . . ? ’ His face then got even more cracks and his entire face got pulled inside into a dark hole, this wasn't my memory, this wasn't supposed to happen. I was in my house, unable to get out of the memory, he's getting shattered again, same, quickly happened to my father and the entire room, even faster than before, I had nowhere to run this time. In a last attempt to redeem myself, I wished to grab my pa's hand but everything shattered, falling into darkness with all of the shards impaling me. Some of them landed in my eyes right before my fear of heights kicked in. . . I could feel the wind blowing my body, as I fell, I couldn't remember anything nor did I wish to, even if it was possible. This was the end for me, I was sure of it. The hole I was in must be deep, then again, my memories did dry in the same way, as I fell with my thoughts, strangely I couldn't think of anything but how thirsty I was, not that it will matter after I'll reach the bottom. Alas, I was at peace, I thought to myself one last time. A scream manifested itself. . . no, it was Jon!The shots were more than enough for the small hill to take, he dropped me down. Was it dead? I could see it, so big, a creature that was never seen before. . . why. . . are you hurting it, Jon? I was too hurt to speak but I saw him fending himself from it, emptying his firearm.

‘Don't hurt it Jon. . . it just wants to play’ I closed my eyes for a second

‘I think I passed out. ’

‘Don't speak April, it will all be. . . ’He was holding me in his arms, ‘Where are we. . . going, Jon?’

I looked at my hand, I could barely see but.

‘I think. . . it's blood. ’

‘No, no, no, we got no hospital open at this hour. ’

‘Jon. . . ’

‘There must be another one in the next town, I'm sure of it. ’

‘Jon, please. ’

‘I'm here April, I won't give up on you, stay with me please!’

‘Why. . are you crying, Jon?’ Everything seemed so sad, even the clouds cried with him.

‘April, you're going to be fine, hold on. ’And then I realised, in that moment, Jon never said April but Veronica, I wasn't his wife, but. . the ‘pain felt. . . so real. ’

‘Don't talk, we're almost going to get there, after that, everything will go back to normal, I promise, just don't give up yet. . ’He was holding me so tight, but my heart didn't let me tell him that, maybe it wasn't even my heart either. My right hand was strong enough as I just had a morbid curiosity. . . the big hole in my chest bleeding away, close to my small ribs, I managed to shove my hand and pulled it out. . . Time felt like it was slowed down enough so Jon wouldn't notice another hole that laid in my heart, it replaced the spot from where my parents used to be, but it withered away. Even when I thought I finally met someone, the last family member I knew to care about, to love me unconditionally shattered away alongside with me.

‘I wish I could live a new life, even for another day. . . . But it wasn't meant to be, it never is with me, probably never will be no matter how many times I'll try. After so much time, I forgot what I came for in the first place. So I had no use for it, I felt it some more in my warm gasp, it's been long since I felt the warmth, even for second. . . before I threw it away and withered with it, the rest of my body as the rest of what remained to be my heart. It was over now, just one last walk ‘Alone, I don't need you to follow me anymore, look, girl, I don't even know your name. ’

‘It's Gwen, but you've missed it already. ’

‘What are you talking about? Listen here you little prat, I don't know who do you think you are but don't you dare underestimate me. And another thing. . ’The ground was shaking uncontrollably, enough to make me bite my tongue.

‘Oh no, don't move a muscle!’ Gwen said, the tone of her voice almost ran. . I wasn't even able to finish it as I was tackled to them ground. Something passed, I could feel the wind being ripped apart and the sound of wood being crushed, something not so far from where I laid on the ground. Gwen was holding me down but not long enough, I think she might have saved my life. I was lifted up, back on my feet but not before she whispered in my ear:

‘It has a limp, he cannot see, he's faster than you'll ever be!’

I didn't know what she meant with that, but I knew it couldn't be good. As she held my hand, we both started running as fast as we could without having to say a word to each other. I could sense the source of an infernal heat coming from somewhere not so far away from us. I couldn't control myself as I saw the hunter ready to charge again and released her hand. That made her go in a different direction than me. Hopefully, it might help us dodge the hunter's strikes. This wasn't good, it looked as if it was going to charge her, I turned around and yelled at her:

'He's coming at you, stop in your tracks!' My senses were sharp but not enough for me not to listen to Gwen's command. The wind caused by his motion was more than enough to get me out of the way on its own but I wasn't sure about Gwen. The place must have been wrecked in his way, whatever it was, it wasn't human.

'Keep going, straight ahead, I'll tell you when to jump. ' Said Gwen, whilst not so far from me that I could feel her. The sounds that thing made while charging were frightening but I knew that Gwen was able to get out of the way just in time.

'I don't know if I'll be able to keep up with you much longer. ' She told me and who could blame her after seeing the dress she was in? The chances of us escaping it were dying by the minute and we were about to join them. I had no idea why it resented us, me so much. I had to get to the bottom of it before it was too late,

'Any idea on why he's trying to hunt you? Roll now, as far as you can towards your right. 'Just in time, I thought, this time, it got close enough to almost scrape my entire spine off my back. Gwen got close enough to me and helped me get up before going away again. I was running out of close calls to take, 'I don't know why he's doing any of this, I can't even see straight for. '

'Shut up! At least for once in your damned life, learn how to take responsibility for your actions. 'Gwen was right. . I stopped. Her voice was far away from me, she was still running. Then. . He took me by the head with one hand and by the waist with the other one. My feet weren't on the ground any longer, away from the stones. My feet were away from the rocks as the wind passed both of us on the way towards the horizon. I could still hear Gwen from far away. She didn't yell anymore.

'Get ready to jump when I tell you!' I told her, I wasn't sure if the hunter held her ears sealed tight but it was worth the shot. We were almost there, the hunter slowed, just one shot to get rid of him. I was the first one to jump on the pale road, landing directly on my knees. The pain didn't worry me but the thought of her not being able to escape. The hunter was almighty and fast but he lacked one thing, balance.

'You were right. ' She said towards the last moments. It was too late. . The hunter tripped while entering the town, the slabs destroyed, his grip weakened.

'Jump!' I yelled at her with all my power. The hunter crashed through one of the houses, getting to the point of releasing his grip from her. The house fell on him in its entirety, wood and rubble starting to cover the entire area. She tried her best to jump at that point but the hunter grabbed her leg right when she was about to do it. The debris caused by it managed to fall and crush her leg, among what remained of the hunter at that point.

'Ahhhhh!' She screamed in pain before stopping to her attempt to grasp some air. My knees were in the worst shape, yet I didn't stop. I came to her aid and removed as much as I could from her leg. She kept silent for the entire period I did it, not a single wail came from her. I turned her around and dragged her away while she was on top of me. With care, I had to be sure she wasn't straining any more than she had to.

'Gwen. . . stop. '

'Don't speak, it's true what they say about conserving your strength. '

'Gwen. . 'Her mouth could barely spill my name, this wasn't good.

'Please, just listen to someone else for once.'

‘Gwen, my ribs!’

I stopped, right near a wall, still trying to hold her safe. As I tried finding out what she meant by it, I couldn't feel any. There weren't any. The charge, his hand and his fall must have caused him to.

‘If only I knew. ’

‘It's fine Gwen, it's not your fault. ’In the end, I was able to open my eyes and see once again.

‘I was blind for far too long but not anymore. It took me way too long to understand why I was that way. I tried my best to justify that everything I was doing was the right thing to do. Lie after lie, I hadn't lost my memory. I knew too well what I was doing the entire time. We all did. What I did, what I've become, it was all for him, though I couldn't have done it alone. Trying to set things right became an obsession for me, for how many times I screwed up with him in life. Regardless of what you might think, I am no monster. I had to make up to him in a way, even if he wasn't aware of me. To give him the adventure of a lifetime, to give him friends to care about, people that listened to him and what he had to say. I could see him in my dreams but not from my eyes. It was amusing how he was sorry. I acted selfish my entire life. I'm ashamed of myself. I didn't do it for him but for my own purpose. To fill the empty spot left in my heart from his absence. It was too late then and it's too late now. I wish you could see what I'm seeing now.

But don't worry about it, Gwen. No take backs. ’

Theater of Bones

Ten years passed like that. My old bones aren't what they used to be, but at least, I managed to beat them to it. Either that or they stopped trying altogether. The train should leave in two hours with no delay and no stop, at least unless some intervention comes along. One trip only with a ticket almost knit in half, with a rubbery feeling almost to be set aside. I'm not even sure why I'm doing any of this or why I'm keeping him around anymore. I should've known that he'd do this at one point.

Time made me softer, but I was missed him in a way, even with the attempts made to forget him before I decided to come. I'll have enough time to deal with him after. Steam blew off the train, making enough space towards the ceiling at the open dome near the windows.

Almost soothing and distracting, still not enough, having to think about him, to worry about what could happen to it in my absence. It made me consider whether or not I made a mistake listening to its request.

Strange, how I thought that stepping through the station, walking through the endlessly moving crowd of people could distract me from my problems. I was indeed wrong, in more than one way. Those people in the station didn't only look but acted with a strange scent of blandness. Even less than that, I was expected to give a thought to back home. A stink eye from here and there, maybe even two of the sort. I couldn't even look past the one man who looked as if he was going to come and start something, with such insolence to be given towards someone with a better condition. It wouldn't surprise me if they came from the same batch. Well, at least with some differences, back home you'd know the one well enough willing to give you a stab or two. "Ehm. "I raised my voice as one of the men passing by came close to stepping on my toes. They didn't even demand an apology but snarked instead. "Excuse me. Could you tell me if this seat was taken?"The small distraction and those lavished boots distracted me from the lady that decided to approach from my rear.

A tiny smirk and clothes that'd scare any other despite appearing so practical. A certain level of eloquence must be maintained to distract any passing stranger from finding out my identity. Suspicion had to be kept away, especially from someone who seemed as if she could twist my words with no second thought. She waited for an answer from the same spot, twirling her fingers as if no patience could spend. So much that one of her nails, polished, was ripped away from her hand.

"Miss, you may sit down. After all, there's no law preventing you from doing that. ""I know that I just thought about being polite about it.

And in case you may wonder, my name is Genevie. "My eyes went away, ignoring her small presentation, I had no intention in socialising with her more than the conduct required me to. She made as much sound as she desired when she sat down, probably on purpose too. Looking in a different direction before twirling her long hair not so despairingly as one may think. Her annoyance still didn't distract me enough, though, I wish it did. "You're not much of a speaker, are you?Well, I can understand that I've got many friends like you and let me tell you something, it gets quite bleak after a while. Not to mention the boredom of not going through this amazing trip.

"People were already getting inside the train despite there being a giant difference of time before it'd go away. I was standing on the bench, taking cracks at the wood. My body movements did so, but she didn't get it. Somehow being my problem for not being more specific about it but that was about to change. A more direct approach was in order now that she wasn't looking at me any longer. "I'm afraid I've got to apologise for it though I'm in no mood to appease the small conversation you're attempting to create.

So please excuse me for not indulging you in the banter you're trying to conceive. "We didn't look into each other's eyes expecting her to be in the least agreeable mood. I got up from my seat and started walking away with no intention of turning to her seeking for a fight.

People started looking awfully slothful at us, making it worse for both parties at stake. As I may or may not be, I had time to kill and in no way, I would do it on the account of another insignificant person, especially one that didn't even attempt to come back at me after what was said. Either ignored on the purpose or she saw them look like that too.

The station was large, at least that's what I thought about it the last time I scouted its corners and turns. Distance had to be taken for now if I were to avoid any possible meeting with her. Though in no way could I have known that I'd be walking through the scouted areas again, walking to the wardrobe of dancing people just to avoid someone. And lose time too on the side.

They didn't make thing easier either, moving around, talking to each other instead of doing something important. Standing in groups under the fading light of lanterns, having no intention to use any transportation. They disgusted me to the pit of my stomach.

They kept trying to drown me with their good disposition and their lustful joy. Luckily for me, I had good lungs or else it would've been much worse. Despite that, there was no reason for them to do it, no holiday, regardless of how important it was could make so many people cheer and wonder. My peace would be disturbed once again by the hooligans who tried dwelling in something they could never understand.

Being a train station was no excuse for their out of proportion behaviour, their dressed and robes. They were acting as if they were in a grand ball or of that sort, wearing their matched clothes and garnets, in red and yellow. I did my best avoiding the cluster of people and any other sad attempt of a pickpocket who might have tried his best to steal what's not rightfully his.

Seemingly, they were not trustworthy, none of them, just the mere sight infatuated me with anger. What I was doing now, before and from this point on was tipping to a grander scale that they could even imagine. My peace and quiet were put to an end as I saw a small parade erupt inside the station, with people behind its back, cheering in exchange for their lives to get a meaning. It makes me wonder how's Sam doing, hopefully not as worse as I am. Though, with every passing minute, my expectations were slipping away.

"Pardon, my intrusion. "

From behind I didn't notice it at first but a hand extended. Hearing the small ringing buttons attached to his sleeves took me away from the hard nausea coming from the crowd. An agent of enforcement arrived along with his barred suit and coathanger of the side. He didn't seem to recognise me from the look on his face.

"Yes?What could be the reason for bothering me in such a loathsome day?"

While giving him something to chew on, I noticed something else. His companion, a younger man, young enough that there wasn't any moustache nor beard on his face. Judging by the uniform, lack of a badge, not to mention constant fiddling of his jacket, this was most likely his first day on the job.

He has kept aside with nothing to say as the other one did the heavy lifting for him.

Strange, I felt. How in an unsorted way, I was the same with Sam before. "I'm sorry to announce that we've received a complaint before about someone who just so happens to match this appearance of yours.

"The other one stepped in to do the part required, not sure on himself with his knees barely hitting one another.

"You see, someone complained about being insulted by what you. . ""How dare you come here and accuse me of such things?"My voice was almost ready to echo around in the grand hall we were in, enough to make everyone look at me with shifty eyes. I had to get rid of it and do it fast. "My time will not be wasted on such lowly manners.

"He places his foot deep on the rough ground before going on, again without the help of his lackey.

I was able to notice, some rubble coming off in the air as he did it, something wasn't right. "We insist that you may consider apologising to the person you might have offended. In case you were not aware of it, this station has a strict policy regarding a matter of that sort.

We will not restrain ourselves from en. . From going on and kicking you out, regardless of the service you've purchased while in here. "Kicked out after the trouble I went through to book for the ticket?Not to mention being a stupid law, the person who had an ill will won't cease to target me after. The drums rolled, trumpets frowned and for a moment, our insignificant conflict died off under the sound produced from not so far away.

I could see the young man in training holding a cap in his hand, trying to act as serious as possible without giving away the desire to join the small orchestra.

His feet said otherwise as he kept pounding the ground while trying to accompany them. "Well then, do you have any proof to support your claim? Perhaps another witness that saw me commit that felonious act? You know, something other than a statement that may or may not be true?" He scuffed his stuffy eyebrow without thinking I'd be able to come back at him. Perhaps it was my scruffy appearance or my specially picked guise that made him think I'd be an easy target. One thing was sure, though, at this moment, we both knew I was right, not only from what I knew but also because of the shortsighted rule they tried enforcing onto me.

The small break in his speech gave it away. It remained a game of waiting for either of us to give up and go our separate ways without being forced to come to our vicinity anytime soon.

And something told me it was about to come sooner, now that thing seemed to settle around everywhere.

People stopped gazing and everywhere around there was a slightly better ambience. Something in his pocket rang, the time of his surrender came even sooner than I thought.

His stuffed hat almost fell out after he tried reaching into his pocket, making me wonder what was really in there. "Fine, go on your way then.

You're lucky that we got even bigger fish to catch or else we might have called you in. ""Yeah, you're lucky. Sir.

"They kept it short and turned their head to follow their backs. Couldn't say I liked their short conversation, nor having to stay with my aching rear. Behind them, not so far, I managed so see the woman again, displeased from being released so soon from the agents.

Just as I presumed, she was still bearing ill will toward me, something that would last.

It didn't bother me as much as I thought it would. At least not in a way that would push me towards seeking vengeance. With my back turned away from here, I could finally return to search the place thoroughly. There was still time to explore, to look around for more. Even if most of the people didn't seem any less shallow, the ones that barely arrived now.

Despite my opinion of them, I dare not eavesdrop as I still had some decency. I couldn't say the same about them after noticing their pretending motions and whistling of the paper. In the middle of the station with not many around to talk with, I finally had an opening to read the purchased ticket.

"To Flocksome. Bah. "The destination was hand-written by the man who pointed me towards this place, unsure why. Two-way too, wishful thinking. Bah. My ticket fell off my hand just as a nimble rider almost ran me over. His feet had some sharp parts that could inflict some burns or worse. Merely in the shear of luck, I managed to get out of the way, just as the guillotine was ready to have at me. It sent it away with the help of the wind generated from his awkward stepping.

Where are the agents when their presence was required and how come they haven't come? Floating away with the wind, above the others around, I decided to chase my ticket so I wouldn't lose my only chance to get away. "Blast it!" I kept trying to make my way past them, going around, jumping across edges and trying not to step on small children or animals.

Those were most important, having a hard time distinguishing one another from those two. Disorienting motions and flashing lights, their small created world shattered my every expectation as I tried crossing past them. A small entrance slightly breeds into the crowd as I tried chasing it. I saw it, getting closer to a big furnace. Who placed a giant furnace in a train station full of people with flammable paper items? With strong flames that made me wonder how come they haven't melted the steel that encased them. The owner of such a thing didn't own either a blacksmith or nothing of some sort so why was it there? Making my way past the tallest fellows didn't let me any choice but to bash it through. Pushing them around and splashing other as I stepped in one of the uncleaned puddles from the ground. I jumped and grabbed it right before the embers got closer to burning it in thin air. The heat and the flame almost reached my hand, leaving nothing but a slight mark on it. "Gah. "And such a scene I've made, I turned around from the furnace to see all of them being annoyed at me from the mess I created. The ones that decided to stay and not get caught in the stream, they were at least happy to oblige a challenge of mine. Their claim to anger over the fact that I managed to throw some of their luggage away on my way here. Regardless of what they've seen me do, I didn't bother to come back and appeal their call for blood and demand for compensation. With my head turned I kept walking away in the opposite direction without giving it a second thought. For once I was glad that the music managed to cover the insults and the personal attacks directed towards me. Since none of them dared to approach, I didn't bother to respond either. And I couldn't forget how lucky I was that the enforcement agents weren't on the way to get me. At least not for now, despite having something telling me they'd come to seek me much later. My arm was still sore from all the on-going commotion, yet I remained satisfied after receiving my ticket back. The only comfort I would get, especially after it went so close to its utter destruction. At least, until I managed to see her again. Having a bit of conflict seemed to widen my spirit as it was. Wearing a skinny suit with stripes, her small hat tall with a flower bed on it. I was able to see it bounce back from the reflections coming out of those train's windows. She was following me, the smile giving it away. "Bah" I said it out loud, almost furious, one pest after another. A follow swoop placed the ticket inside my pocket and grabbed a few pills instead of it, swallowing them as they came out. An awful taste and not enough, I should've brought more. With a misdirection that most likely came from her side, I managed to lose the track of her. And I didn't want to turn either and reveal myself. The nerve of her, a proper young lady that dares prowl at someone like myself, that's unheard off. Especially after so many laps I did. Even the clock above us didn't move much of its hands, merely seconds passed. "A beauty ain't it?" A man approached, barely younger than me, few years at best. "I guess. "Somehow unnoticed until he pointed out but it sure had some glamour around it. "Is it made of oak?" I asked him as it felt like whatever was exchanged between us resonated at a different level than the rest of the crowd. Surely looking the way it did, with many men sculpted on its sides, bowing down towards the globe above of them. "Would you believe me if I told you that it used to be an oak that just came out of the ground and fashioned into the clock you're currently seeing?" "In the middle of the station?" No hole nor a shatter from below, there was nothing to indicate that was he was telling me was true. "Indeed it came. "He was wearing a gardener robe with tools aside. Leaving me without saying goodbye to head off and water the clock. While looking around, I wasn't able to see anyone looking around at any of us, nor shocked by the absurdity of what he was doing. I should've not been surprised by it, especially since none approached me about the unturned events I've done. Small talks like this one had to be avoided for now unless I desired to get cuffed and escorted out. He didn't look back, taking care of his clock as I got carried away by my slim feet. Seeing as such, I said it out loud. "Now, this looks like some place to lose some time. "Walking carefully, this time, and watching my step so no one would have the jump on me. The many places in front screamed their call for me to visit and check them out, regardless of them being useful or not. One, in particular, it seemed as if there was an emporium full of musical elements, enough to get my attention immediately. Practically calling to me and many that were gathered around with the pigeons. A young man played his trumpet in front of me with such conviction, not far from where I was going. Unsurprised by it since the store from which he most likely took it from wasn't far. More than possible that I would've ignored him while on the way if it weren't for his precision and honed skill that stopped me from it.

Nothing else needed but a small sparrow pillow to rest on and his trumpeted as he didn't appear to be a beggar, not even to ask for something fair in return for gracing everyone around with his abilities. I felt compelled by his music and notes to stay and admire his phallic tune. His fingers glancing over the buttons and the hook like no other, making notions unseen before, neither by someone as experienced as I was. And if the music alone wasn't enough, he had a strange looking instrument, well crafted, to say the least. Which made me question whenever or not he bought such a rarity from such a place. Its pipes were long, contorted and almost spiked in nature, golden but also rusty, with buttons that were more like valves slipping through his fingers. He seemed to know what he was doing and getting rewarded for such. Listening to its master and so did he. Such an instrument, I had to know the place from which was taken as none other managed to get my interest such as his. A feat undoubtedly though his innate skill he managed to remind me of composers of the old such as Lius and Zappa. I had to speak to him since I would never get a second opportunity like the one presented in front of me. He didn't take many breaks from the likes of either, neither did I when I was at his age of coming. None of the others seemed to care nor recognise the talent he had, reducing the potential that could belong to a master to a mere station entertainer. "Quite the show you've put on so far, I'm fairly impressed. Most terrific even if I were honest. "The boy looked at me and nodded before deciding to please me and take a short break from it. His fingers retracted as if his deal with the instrument ended, coming as farther away as possible from it. He looked around, probably to check, yet no eye to bat after he stopped playing. A sad expression on his face before responding to my question. "Thanks, I guess. Too bad you're the only one who seems to think that way. "He gazed as he said it, checking to see if I was honest as I said it. "I was. In case you were wondering. "He shied away from me after displaying my thought. "You shouldn't be discouraged by them, kid. It will get better than this, trust me, especially with the help of the potential you've got in your hands. "He didn't seem to listen to most of what I said. His sweat ran down his trumpet, following the course towards the rest of the floor soon after. My words were wasted on him, despite that I still wanted to help even if it'd end up for nothing. He seemed to be worth the time, especially since none decided to give him any. Opening my mouth but delaying it after seeing him blow some hot air away. I couldn't force myself if he didn't want to help where not needed, leaving me the option of returning later. "Perhaps I've misjudged you for someone clearer headed. Though. "I took a break to see and noted of the attention of his. "You shouldn't waste the hard work and finesse you've displayed so far, it would be a shame for this world to have another music man dying. "A few means looks on the way didn't make much of a chance, especially since I thought I recognized some as being the ones I've defiled their luggage before. The thought of it baffled me and kept me, momentarily in my place, just to wait for a response, even the slightest sign of approval. "Listen, I know you mean well but. . ." His sweat solidified at the sound of it. Traveling through from a spot blinded. A firearm heard from not so far. He looks around to see and grab what needed while I tried thinking of the next course of action after. Everyone started flailing around, trying to get away as fast as possible, others ducked on the ground so they wouldn't get hit by whoever was out there. I avoided and had something in mind, that whoever sent me here, knew all along that this was a trap. The way was unclear making my attempt to keep my position still harder, to avoid any of the bashful runners. Luggages were dropped below in their path as the chaos seemed to be sprouting from there. Pushed away by the horde, I lost sight of him. My actions weren't my own anymore as some of them, with their cloaks left behind and their dryness rubbing off, were getting obscured with their march. "Stop pushing!" A yell came out right as their attempt to shove me and deliver to safety against my will was in motion. Other were yelling and going by as we were all pushed around, being in the same pot, something was growing hotter. "Let go of me. Don't touch that. Thief, help!" Were some of the shouts I've heard and I was helplessly being pushed by people who looked as if they enjoyed it. Attempt after another and I couldn't force my way past them without causing more trouble, even if they. Looked scared and I could see it melting off their faces. That made my slight resistance lower my guard and let them take me farther. Trinkets dropped from shops standing by, either robbed or something bigger. I was still limited and couldn't do much to enchant my sight, especially with all the people trying to get closer and step on each other on the way. Another firearm shot and they were already turning into screams, the likes of which, the panic, desperation I have never seen. Extra care was needed so I wouldn't end up on the floor, certain moves to be made, something to not thrust me down before them. The chance ran through my mind, him being just a distraction to scare the rest away. Hysteria was flying through the place among the now abandoned instruments. It seemed to me that as we passed, they were the first ones to run to safety with their most valuable treasure being left behind to rust. The fanfare seemingly dead yet I was wrong, pushed through in the midst of it I heard. A trumpet being played so loudly and timed, I recognized immediately to whom it belonged. Immediately known, it made me think, of doing my best to save him after feeling a connection. Sounds of fear and discomfort came from a place that wasn't in my view, sounds that didn't belong to any walking pioneers or screaming gnat. The place was crumbling under my very eyes, the shackles between my feet and hands weren't showing any signs of letting go. "Just let me pass!" Wasted on ears that didn't care while their expressions remained something remorselessly distant. They saw me try to resist the heat wave and still denied my entry. A darn pickpocket struck his hand through my pocket, abusing the dire situation we were all in and stole my ticket. I should've known and expected. "Stop the damn thief!" My hand almost met his but not fast enough to make a difference. It left me only with an opening to see a golden ring that laid on the middle finger, carved with a symbol that I've not seen in a while. That left a bitter taste as I knew I wouldn't get to see him ever again. "I've been stolen from!" But any remnants of them trying soon laid dead. As from there, beyond, a rain of shots started falling above, breaking the giant sphere of glass and letting the shards fall onto all of us. I covered my head with both of my hands and tried avoiding contact with my eyes, thought I felt one slightly hit my in the head. A flesh wound, unknown but the gloom sprouted more. I removed my self-appointed blindfolds to reveal a chance of pace and some people disappeared. "Who?" But I was the only one talking while everyone kept screaming and walking instead of trying to confront whoever was causing all the disturbance. And the only one who managed to see how they made a mess in their path, pillaged stores and broken lobbies where once business arise. The only one who realized that these shots were mere distractions as something worse was about to come soon after. My fellow human being pushed for what felt like minutes, away from the sound of music and weapon's mistrust right outside. My last grain of defiance has now run over as we approached the last miles, the place was in the worse condition I've ever seen it, paranoia and distrust ran among all of those in front of me. They took me outside and finally let go where I could finally stand still, even if my rest had to wait some more. Agents everywhere and I stood in the middle of everything. So many to possibly count, escorting and helping the escapees that barely managed to get out. They now avoided that it wasn't asked for, even if I laid in the middle of the route they went through. Now that it came to it, I approached to ask, someone to speak to at last. "Agent, what's the deal here? I was forcefully shoved out of the way and even robbed because of it. And how come none of your forces have entered the place already?" A mistake as I didn't take the time to observe, mere glances before I'd get my response. Tinder, some crushed stones, and fences. Something happened outside while I was gone. The agent that I approached, his lips of olive colour and his sides ever darker, his uniform and hat didn't leave me anything else to think, rather than him being a high ranking one. "And who do exactly are you to order me like that? If you've got any inquiry about something that you claim stolen, then you're free to talk to any of my subordinates around. The rest is none of your concern so set aside." -edit-Bah, if I knew he'd act that way I wouldn't have asked. He pushed me out of the way to take a better look before making some sings for the other to come. Not everyone managed to get out of the station as of yet but It wasn't my concern. Though, if it kept going this way, I doubt that everyone will be able to escape. Wait! I threw my glances all around, scanning the crowd, scratching, almost impaling my neck with my fingernails and couldn't see. He wasn't out there, neither was she. Neither the musician nor the woman that was following managed to escape, not, I would have seen them if they escaped. I was in the front row of the people who managed to get safely outside. She couldn't have done something stupid like try following me when I ignored her and got trapped in there, could she? Just my luck, trying my best to go uninvolved and manage to do the opposite. And with these incompetent foolish agents, I wouldn't doubt it if they'd fail and manage to get her killed. Somehow I felt responsible for it since It might have been my fault and the train will be delayed now more than ever. More and more agents made their way just as I thought, trying to get as many troops as they could inside. They were different than those two I've seen before, clearly they didn't come from the station. Not only more serious but well trained, fit, closer to becoming the elite. Sneaking behind them would be insane, they could detect me over a misstep if I tried. And I doubt that the worst thing they'd do to me would end up getting thrown out of where I already was. I had to be unsuspicious among the distracted peasants and try finding another way in. One that wouldn't end up sending me to the local prison or worse. Just a little more "and?" they were gone inside and the main gates were closed, leaving no one than two guards. Two women to be more precise but I doubt I could take on two soldiers, especially at my age. They weren't looking at me fortunately, neither were the other people, now I could say for sure that the lady hasn't followed me. Both of them were still inside waiting for me, or someone like me to save them. On my way, I lifted my coat so I could hide my face, that way, in case I'd be caught I could, at least, pretend that I was trapped in the station with them. At least, if the stuffy agent doesn't get to take a good look at my face. The way ahead was clear but I had no time to take it up the rear, I turned around and headed towards what I thought would be another entry point to the station. I knew I shouldn't have picked the biggest station in the republic but it was the host of the fastest trains. How could I take in consideration of an attack of anarchy? Or that I would meet such a talent in such a long time? Fate had something in store of me, that or I haven't left my house in a long time. The wall that held it in place was too hard to break through, the wines that grew towards the top were too thin for me to climb on. The windows were too high too to jump on, not to mention most likely tough enough to take a point blank blast and still stand, with or without the wall accompanying it. Wait is that. . . ? "Hey you? Where are you running to?" I was the one to see her go away this time, running across a platform. The rust on the metal almost crumbled as she stepped on it, leaving me no time for an explanation nor to understand what was happening. Sigh, it could be even worse than I thought, they could even be harnessing a bomb. I had to be quick, even more than I thought I had to be. The corner came soon after, I wasn't as discreet as I was before, not afraid to make mistakes or to trip down, especially when I could lift myself up immediately and fight it. I almost ripped away a brick as I curved myself so I wouldn't slow down my speed. A panick mode started in me, one that hibernated inside ever since. Well, no time for that now, I saw it, an open door. It wasn't really open but it represented an open opportunity for me to get in. . . Locked just as I thought and I have never learned how to use a lockpick. Not that I would use one in a place swarming with agents, that would be just ridiculous. Perhaps they haven't thought about locking the gate leaving to the train itself but that's close to where the shooter might be. It wasn't entirely unexpected, having the Percusor using the train too in this illustrious day would have attracted unwanted attention towards any unwated visitor. That would also explain the highly volume of agents that came so quickly. Now, back to the job at hand, as I was done asserting the situation, it left me nothing more to do but attempting a rescue. I ran towards the horizon, trying to listen to anything that would give away their location. No sound, so far, I stopped around the corner and took a short look before I went on. The coast was clear and I knew that meant they were all still inside. A few shots came again, right on time. I didn't know if it came from the agents or the crook but the situation was about to get a lot more dangerous. No train was in sight so I jumped on the rails, hoping I could get the upper hand and ascend from below. The jump was rough but nothing broken, I walked on the train when. . I started regretting my decision. Far ahead the sight of a coming train got closer and closer by the second. Timing wasn't my forte. The bar was set too high and I couldn't lift myself in time. The conductor saw me but I doubt he'd be able to stop before it would crush me. I started running towards the stopping point, forced to rush right into action and with a sound loud enough for everyone to notice my entry, regardless of their alignment. MY back almost turned, I yelled "Slow down the train" while still running from it. Hopefully I wasn't heard by the wrong side or else the impending doom might become the least of my concerns. Gun shots kept ringing not far and I could feel like I was getting close, not only towards them but to my last shot to get out of the train's way. I wans't build for doing this, my breath almost got throw outclocked, enough to leave another man out of comission for days at least. The train wasn't slowing down, that conductor must be a damn fool! "Slow down I said" I almost coughed my breath out of its system. "You'll crush me if you don't!" But it refused to do so. This was it, close enough to the point and the impending danger was almost behind me, even with my best of abilities and attempts to escape. Even if I attempted jumping, it would get to me right before the motion, not to mention that it had enough metal downstairs for me to duck under. That was it, the small metal ram that would block the train, this was my last chance, one last. . . The sounds of the train arriving at the station came out of nowhere. Luckily for me, I've managed to hide myself in the bathroom, or else I might have ended with more holes than my trumpet had. I placed my ear on the door and listened. "Check the port! You check the and starboard! I will make sure that the hall is safe, if you see any of the passengers, you know. . . what to do. The rest of you come with me, we'll make sure that they won't get to escape in that train. "Their footsteps were loud enough to make me swallow my own teeth in fear, I didn't know who they were but they didn't seem to care about my own safety. I didn't move and slowed down by breath so I would be undetected. Oh no, they got closet to the door, the thought of me dropping my trumped and trying to hide in the stall came to mind but they would find me right away. There are shadows under the door. They stood there for a while.

A. . . Are they listening the door as I am? Please don't look down, my feet are right in front of them too. My lungs can't take it any longer either, what have I gotten myself into? The door almost got opened, hitting me in the nose. I bit my tongue so I wouldn't scream right away. "Wait, you there!""Yes chief?""I said, the rest with me. The culprits won't hide themselves in a stall, now come""Immediately sir" That was insane, the door got closed and I got away, at merely a needle from harm's way. I want to scream at the top my my lungs but they could come back any moment. So, no way out, windows locked and I'm not able to play my trumpet to make the time pass. It's just my luck to end up in a sitatiton like this one. I should have listened when mom said I should become a painter. Or a scholar, or a lawyer, or anything that could really help me. I scrambled away from the door and entered one of the stalls so I could rest on one of the seats inside. At least I could say in here until help arrives. . . The door closed behind me and another one opened. Not again. Someone was inside, I hope I made the right decision when I got up and stood on the stall so they wouldn't notice me inside. It worked before, I could only hope that it would work once again. Moans came from outside, or inside depending on who it was. "Agh, ugh. Damn train, damn agents, damn them all" Wait, I knew that voice. At least I thought I knew who it was but I chose to play it safe so I wouldn't come out in front of a dangerous fellow. If it is who I think it is, it couldn't be any good. I knew I shouldn't have stolen his ticket but I had no money to buy one of my own. Quite a lousy day, he didn't even choose to give me a coin despite the praises he gave me. Telling him that I accidentally took his ticket out of his pocket and left with it wouldn't stand up in court.

At least, if we made it that far, with a shooter on the loose and those guardians snooping around, there wasn't any problem of making future plans anymore. "Bah, my crusaded spine" The mirror was broken, right when I thought I could use it to find out what was wrong with me. That cursed train almost managed to kill me and the agents weren't trustworthy enough for me to approach them. At least, I could rest here for a while until I continue my journey.

"Achoo" Someone sneezed, another person in the bathroom with me. "Get out right now, I've got a weapon and I'm not afraid to use it. "One of the stalls in front of me opened, revealing a part of what I was looking. "Oh, it's you. I was just looking for you, bairn. Just as I planned finding you in here. "I had to admit that it wasn't the reaction I was expecting, for such a young man, he didn't even happily imploded with excitement. Even Sam got happier than him when I asked him to do chores around the house. "What happened? Were you hurt? Look, it's over now, I've almost gone through hell to get here and escort you to safety so let's go. "There was no need for him to speak since I knew he'd follow. . . . "Oh. I'm sorry if I may have looked surprised but I wasn't expecting you to be the one who came to help me out. "Darn, I don't know if he knows that I'm the one who stole his ticket, I should get out clean or the guilt will strip me down. "Ehm, about the reason I'm here. . . ""No need for an explanation, we need to get out and fast, there's no saying on when will the agents return and from the looks of it, they won't be that happy with what we've been through. ""But I've really got something important""It can wait until we're out of here, now come on before I decide to drag you over. Wait a minute. . "Oh no, I feared that might happen, he must've figured out what I've done, he could even decide to turn me in to those officers. The rest of my life would be lived in a tight cell with no trumpet and with no one who could listen to my music. At least, I could go with dignity and admit my mistake. "You're right, I did that mischievous act. ""That can wait, but I forgot that someone else is in here that needs my. Well, perhaps now it would be, our help to get out. So what'cha say?I really need a new assistant. "I didn't know what he was on about but I was at his mercy, it would be wise to follow and do what he says. "If it won't get that dangerous, sure, I'm in. "The ground started trembling, gurgling things from up and down. An explosion could be felt through the walls and ground. I was about to fall down but he grabbed me just in time. "Hold on, I believe it's a big one. No matter of what happens, don't let go of my arm. "He grabbed the sink and held both of us in place as the room felt like it was going to break down with us. The windows cracked and a wave of dust had its riders go under the small gap under our door. The sound of a metal plate and a big one from the looks of it landed somewhere outside. It stopped soon after and I released both his hand and the sink. There's nothing in the station that could have made that possible sound except. "The train. . ""What are you talking about?""I believe they might have blown the train. "The dust settled down and luckily for me, my ears weren't pierced by the sound of the impact that happened not so long ago. This would've made my ticket useless even if it wasn't my train. An occurrence like this one would end up delaying my plans for at least one day. "Are you sure they. . destroyed a train?I mean, that's hard to believe. ""Trust me, I know how strong explosives can be. Now, we can profit out of it since most of the agents are either distracted or dead. Come on, we still have someone to get out. ""Okay. I'm still not sure if it's safe to say, maybe we can wait for help to arrive and in the meantime. . ""Look, kid, you've got talent but clearly you're not thinking very well in a situation like this one. Where's an explosion, there's another one to come soon after. If you want to wait and get buried in gravel, unknown in a train station is my guest. But, If I were as young as you and possessed the same talent, I'd reconsider. I won't wait for a yes because I know you will follow me now so let's go. "And he was right, I wasn't about to give up and wait for help, I followed him as he busted out the door, helping the dust fly all over the place. "This doesn't look right. "His long arm was like a metal bar blocking my path just as I merely exited the room. He could, at least, try not changing his mind every second. . "Oh, I see. . . "Half of the train laid wrecked in the station and the other part was scattered around. The station was in flames and there was no human life in sight. "Look, this place could burst in flames in any second, forget everything and let's just get out. "I told the kid, I could see from his shaking trumpet that he wasn't happy about the situation either. "Do you think that they're still alive?I mean what if there are still survivors, we can't abandon them can we?""Did you not hear that I said?We have to go now, let me think about that later. Now, come on and follow me. ""But. . . "He didn't look like he was going to listen and the place was getting too hot for me to say in any longer. "Fine, you're right. At least, we can go and ask for help on our way. ""I'm glad that's settled, now come one. "I took the lead and set a path for both of us, from the looks of it, some of the cogs and machine parts were spread around, ready to explode at any moment. A chain reaction could crush the ceiling and crush us under. "The gate where the train came isn't an option anymore since it looks like that's out of commission too. "Crushed too. "And by the way, someone most likely called for help since they've heard the sound of explosives going on. ""Can we please focus on that later? I don't want to die in here. ""Fine. "That looks like a good way. "This doesn't look like it's going to make a safe jump. "My dress won't handle any more explosions and jumps if I keep this up. And it was a collector's edition too if only I haven't made the bad choice of staying in here. No time for mourning, I'm not dead yet. A foot on another after a straight line of action and I managed to jump across the greatest ledge on the other side. "Ah, that was close. But what is this?" A nail on the metal ramp almost impaled my boot. Almost. "It would seem like not even the gravity can be the best of me. "There was still a long way to go and luckily for me, it wasn't headed down there. The explosion managed to crush a part of the ramp, I should be thankful that It didn't fall down with me on it. It would have blown even more getting impaled on those metal shards while burning alive. Now, the ramp should lead towards a way to the roof top or at least to a window leading outside so, my campaign continues. It's hard to believe that only a short time ago this place was whole, full of life and happily working to its intent. At least, I hope the tickets I bought could be refundable, they were supposed to be for this train but in its current state. Well, it didn't manage to get me too far ahead. The platform shook a little under me. This wasn't a good sign, it couldn't last enough tremors with me on it, I had to be faster, a lot more than before. I ran and held on the small metal fence it had on it. I knew I should focus ahead of myself so I could be able to dodge any falling rocks or objects if it came to it. But, I thought I saw someone down there. I went down and started sliding. Mine hoped laid low, hoping that they didn't notice, those agents haven't managed to catch me last time but they looked pretty annoyed. I doubt that they'd chase me around a second time without using brute force. "Hey you, over there!" "What happened? Have you seen someone or what?" He stared at something above both of us for a while but I couldn't see the specific point his stare was pointed towards. We even stopped abruptly, open flames not so far from us, spreading at an alarming rate. "So? Umm. I wish I asked you sooner what was your name because I can't really keep calling you sir. Quite funny actually. ""I don't want to hear it. I thought I saw someone familiar there but I can't be sure about it. ""Wait, so there's another survivor? Great, like I said before, we can, perhaps help them. . ""No, the ramp above us is too high for us to climb to, the fire is spreading and not to mention that I might be wrong. ""Are you sure about it? We can at least. . "The mutter kept on going down there. Distracted it would seem, that's it! A ladder not so far away but it could lead in the same way the voices might be headed towards. A risk I had to take since the place wasn't safe anymore. Also, not one of my best plans, crawling on a metal ramp that might fall at any moment right into the frying pan. Well, I won't get the second shot so I just have to hold onto the impression that they won't shoot me in the back. I got up and made a run for it, space was tight between my sides and I didn't care about what was about to happen anymore. Not so far and I was "about to make it. "And then it happened. I felt something come on my back, a projectile of some kind. I was stunned by what happened. They say that if you get shot, some people don't feel it until much later. Was there a bullet wound in my back?" Hey you, again, I knew I saw you there. "I turned around and saw a small rock laying not far from where I was, on the platform. "Did you seriously just chuck a rock at me? What's wrong with you?" I yelled at him, the same rude old man that I've met earlier this day. Somewhat not surprised that I got in this dire situation, trapped with him and oh. "Is that the flute player that sang on the station?" "It's a trumpet!" I made him a sign to stop, the young man still had to learn patience. The two of them were close to me and ready to make our way towards the exit. The remaining task was to convince her to jump here to safety. "Look, the platform won't last for long, just jump now, we'll catch you. Won't we?" I waited for a response from him but delayed he said. "Yes, we. We will. "A little help from my elbow was needed but it hurt me more than him. "You can't expect me to just jump across such a huge distance, do you?" Another tremor came, even faster than the last one, I wasn't entirely sure that it would last any longer. She had to "Jump as quickly as you can or else you will fall""No, I can make it to the ladder. . "The quake made its presence felt between us, making the ladder fall right under my nose. "This can't be happening right now. . ""I told you to jump, you've got no choice now, it can collapse at any moment. ""Well, of course, I've got no chance now because of your dang distraction"The platform broke in half, I thought I'd fall right into the flames but the bar stopped me. I held it, trying my best not to slip and fall. "You can still make it, stop being so stubborn!""I'm not being stubborn, I'm just having a hard. . "Another tremor was about to come, the vibration came through the bar I was holding. This couldn't be good, right in front of me laid the furnace, with its wide open mouth gasping for me to come inside. I placed my feet on the hard edge of the bar, almost lost in the darkness. My body was in a soft spot, laying on the other part of the platform that wasn't entirely broken. Waiting wasn't an option any longer so I jumped. I was scared, thinking that I would end up in the flames, unscathed and abandoned. But when the chances were slight, they did it. I landed on top of them, slowing my fall with the help of the impact. "Bah, get off me this moment"I knew we'd be able to catch her but not this way. She almost managed to break my back with the fall, luckily for me that I was still able to walk after. We got up and there was no time to wonder as the metal platform she was on fell into the fire.

"Come on, the exit is almost in our reach. "We ran, avoiding fire and falling metallic shards that would have seemingly cut us in half if they had the chance. Even if the situation was dire, I wasn't scared, there was still hope, I knew that we wouldn't just die out here. "Hey, there's the exit, you were right""Don't count your horses yet, we're not there as of yet"The tree of us made it so far just fine and it would seem like the safe spot would be achieved by mere seconds. "I wouldn't do that if I were you"We were stopped and in front of us a hooded man blocked the exit way, with an alarming device in his hand. "What are you doing man?Can't you see that this place is going to fall any moment now?"Oh, I know that but it ain't going to stop me. You see, the world is already ending, enslaved and devoured by its own insides. But that will last no longer, they can't survive without us and I would rather see everything destroy that becoming its stock"This was bad, he's most likely the one who caused the explosion and he might also have an idea about what's really happening in this world. They both looked scared, ready to break any minute now and I wasn't standing very well either. To top it all, he looked as if he had another trick up his sleeve, if he really had another explosive laying around, we had no chance but to act. I had no chance but to act, it was and is in our best of interests. "So, don't worry as we are many in number, ready to take the war they started on their own ground. Do not worry about it, I promise that, in the grand scheme, none of it will ever. . "I charged and managed to hit him as hard as I could with my shoulder, cracking my joint inside. I didn't scream as I had to be focused, grabbing whatever he had in his hand while knocking him out. We still had to get out, I waved at them with my hand and they followed. The hit must've been quite hard since it managed to knock him out unconscious. The door as of yet wasn't locked and I managed to open it just in time as the place looked like it was ready to fall at any moment.

That fool!"Stop there kid, leave him be. Have you not heard anything I've said before, it's going to go down any second now. ""We can't just. . . leave him to die in here. Even if he's done something wrong""Don't you dare give me a lesson in morality, I know much more about it than you think. He deserves it, especially after what he said and done. "She stopped too and grabbed the other half of the body. "No, he's actually right, we can't just abandon another human being to die. It's not the right thing to do. ""You're even madder than he is. Fine, do what you want but be fast, I won't wait for you any longer. "I held the door open as they did to the best of their strength to pull him over. The moment they took him out, I closed the door and pulled them as far away as I could. "What are you doing?""Stop!" A final strike came, an earthquake strong enough to almost make us fall on our feet. I barely managed to pull them as far as I could, not far enough from the place as the whole station got crushed and fell under its own weight. I. I saved them just in time, even with another second, they wouldn't have made it. We all watched as the remaining rubble started slowly turning into ash and begin being blown away by the wind. They didn't backlash at me, still shocked by what happened. I didn't have time to check it but I reached down my pocket and pulled it, the same device that was used by that anarchist, or so I thought. A clam? That must've been the most peculiar thing I've ever seen in my entire life. Why did he hold it so menacingly? Some sand rubbed off it, it looked as if someone just freshly took it out of the beach. Taken into consideration, with the events that happened beforehand, it wouldn't surprise me. It was time for me to leave. I did my part and took them away from getting crushed into the inferno. This complicated everything way too much, as more agents of enforcement and the press, were on their way to the place I was in. I had to escape as quickly as I could, there was no time for me to be interrogated. With some looks, I merely managed to see a couple of burning bushes, an abandoned building and the two of them still shattered in front of it. Wait, the road the agents and the other people were on got slowed down by a lot, I could hide myself and snick out of the abandoned building after they're done questioning them. My move was now and. "How could you do that? There. . . There was still time""Look, I've got no time to deal with you or your problems. Now, get out of my way or. . . ""Or else what? You'll leave me to burn too just like you did to him? You. . . . you killed that man He's dead because of you" This was the last straw, getting convicted and accused by someone whose life I just saved? Has she gone mad? "Wait, there was no time. . I think. . I don't know if we would've made it that far if we kept dragging him. ""Don't take his side. Someone died and you can't just ignore. We can't ignore that" She said while turning her gaze to me, shaking. I could see it in her eyes that she felt uneasy, shaken, unsure about everything that happened so far. It was not the place" Nor the time for doing this. Do you see that? More agents are coming and trust me, they're nothing like your average officer of the law. They won't listen to any reason and they will most likely find a way to pin it down on us for the agents and the property damage""That's insane, we had nothing to do with it. Do you really think that I'm. . Well, they did. . No, surely you can't be right. ""Then tell me, how many encounter did you have with them and from those ones, how many of them ended up well?" She didn't come up with anything right away and I had no time to wait. "I don't care, you won't be able to stop me, I'm going away. If you want to follow me again and know this, I managed to get you out once when you were hiding and another time when you were ready to fall over the furnace. There are a lot more chances for you to make it with me than with them. "No time to ponder, the road the agents were on got narrower, I didn't know if they were able to see us and even if they did, it didn't matter to me. I was headed towards the building, in hopes that I could hide until the fuss was over. My only hope as I didn't look back was that if they decided to stay after all, that they wouldn't tell them where I was hiding. That's the least they could do about the situation we were in, informing those informers about my whereabouts. "Don't walk so fast, we're right behind you. ""I still believe that it's a bad idea, ya know. Running away from the law. ""Both of you be quiet and try calming down. We can't afford to attract them to where we're going" Avoiding the fire wasn't very hard as I was sure that they were both able to control themselves from just going and standing in it. I told them right away as we entered the broken district, "Stand next to the wall there and wait. "I stood next to it too, closer to the corner and saw the agents almost in front of the fireplace. What in the world got into me that I took that clam, from all that I noticed, it could be an incriminating evidence leading them straight to me. "So, I feel like I should say something. . . You know, just to break the silence. . . Even more than that. ""Yeah, it's been pretty rough so far. And I still remain convinced that. We might have to rethink about going out there and telling them what happened" I turned around and noticed that they were both looking in the different direction, doubting themselves and everything that happened so far. "I think it's safe to sniff around while they're checking that wreckage. We still need to be fast about it since it's more than likely that they'll check the surroundings. Are you even listening to me? Is anything I've said now gone through your thick heads?" My expectation of them dropped with each second, I was fearful that I was going to regret taking them with me. "Can you please be more sensitive about it? I've never been through this, I've never seen another human being die, right before my eyes too. You can't expect me or us to ignore that and move on"" And what do you want to do? Sit here and mourn all day until the agents come to take us away? First of all, you didn't even know that man and second of all, he deserved it. "I didn't know what to say but I had to, at least, add something. Even whilst feeling left out, I still managed to pour out of my mouth some words. "Even if he deserved it, it doesn't make it right. I. . "I coughed for a second from all the dust around, I haven't refreshed my mouth in a while, ever since I sang through my trumpet some time ago. "I think we should go now. Before that, my name is Paul. I just thought I should let you know since it would seem like we're going to spend some time together. "He had some skills but he did lack the timing. "Boy, we don't have time for introductions, we're technically fugitives and possibly accomplices. ""Ehm, we've already met but I haven't seen you before hand Paul. My name is Genevie. I'm glad that at least I could meet someone who could act normal in such a distressful situation. ""Yeah, it's been quite rough so far hasn't it?" I didn't wait for the banter to end, with each word coming out of their mouths I could feel the agents' footsteps array. Far too long have I waited for this that I started looking around while they were still going through the code of conduct. There was no visible exit except the one we came through. If we went back they would have, more than likely seen us. If only there was a way for us to sneak past them right under their nose. "So, are you going to ponder or tell us who you are? Our introduction was prolonged for far too long. ""There, the stairs, let's go. "I told her while making my way there, since there was no other way out, I had to make one for the sake of all of us. "Wait, but what about your. . "Her words passed down in the wind and I lost focus on what she said. The stairs looked rusty enough but they could, at least, keep us until we got upstairs. The moment I got closer to it, I noticed that its screws were slightly loose. With some luck, they could be easily rigged even with the lack of my screwdriver. "Are you going to tell us what you're up to? You can't be wandering around like that and keep us in the dust. Literally and figuratively. Well, I can see why this building got abandoned in the first place. ""Can we hurry? I'm not feeling too well anymore and. . I don't know if it's the place or not but it started giving me the eeriest feeling. ""Quiet down you two, I can't babysit you for the entire duration of our runaway"" Funny that you're the one saying that. Especially since I deal with old people on a typical daily basis. I'm a caretaker you see. ""That's really amazing I guess. Having a job that is. . ""Well, you know, it's doing something that I like and. . "That screw right there, I pried it open with my bare hand and left the others on, at least until they followed me upstairs. "Come on you two, let's move. ""Again, it would be easier for us if you actually trusted us for once. ""I can't trust you as of yet, at least, not until I'll feel more comfortable with. . "I didn't finish my sentence as I looked past her. The agents were right across where we stood, talking to each other. "Move upstairs!Now!"I almost shouted which wasn't a good idea since it would alarm them. They noted my seriousness and started walking upstairs, no word said. As they both passed me and the agents were still distracted, I was the last one to climb further away. I took the last screw which made a gagging noise, shaking the whole platform and leaving it unstable, enough to collapse at any weight. After that, I rolled soon after I saw one of them turning away to face me. I laid there and didn't make a move so I wouldn't give away my position. My body was huge and I was faced towards the second pair of stairs that lead towards the second floor of the abandoned building. Muffled I faced both of them and tried mimicking with my eyes what was happening. "Are you okay?Did you fall down?Let me come down there""No"I said it and bit my tongue soon after, forcing my mouth to collapse on itself. My eyes were fully opened and staring at her. I started moving them towards the left and back to their original position after, soon to become a full motion. "Why is he sitting on the ground and how come he asked us to move so quickly?"I asked Genny with a pleasant tone. The man still hasn't made a move and kept his strange behaviour at bay. "I don't know but he's not talking anymore. ""Maybe he's trying to tell us something?"He wasn't doing anything except standing there, maybe he lost his mind,"It isn't out of the common for people of his age to. . . you know. .

""No, I really think he's trying to tell us something, why else would he stand there and oh. I see, he's doing something with his eyes. "I stopped moving them and fury came running through me, I could hear the agents' voices coming closer. If we weren't fast enough, we were going to be all caught and I doubt I could get to them in time without getting shot. "Wait, is someone downstairs?"I covered his mouth as fast as I could, in hopes that whoever was down there didn't hear us. This could be the reason why he hasn't spoken at all. I signaled Paul not to say a word, he probably knew by now that we were. I whispered in his year "Trouble. "After releasing his mouth, he understood that we had to come up with a plan to help the old man too. "So what now? ""I don't know, let me see"I turned around and checked the floor we were in, there, whoever built the building hasn't finished it yet and left big holes where the windows would normally be. "Do you see that?"I said while pointing it out. "Yeah, I think I know what you're planning. How do we get there?""Well. . . "They were talking to each other, both pairs, one in sight and the other one not so far from me. Luckily for me that they still haven't noticed me, yet they were about to. No, no, no. Both Paul and Gen left me alone, disappearing from my sight. If they abandoned me after what we've been through and right now, I swear I will rat every single one of them. This situation laid in my hands and in my hands alone to deal with. But how?The voices got louder and if by the slightest chance, they got to hear the sounds of their steps and get attracted towards me, it would be my end. I could hear them so there's no doubt they could hear them too. A moment of silence came and I waited, doing nothing but breathing and blowing dust out of my nose. What next?Something just hit the ground and there was something big too. I didn't wait for another opportunity to come, just as I knew and listened to the voices to start walking away, I got up and started running. They heard that too and I've heard a yell. "Stop right there!"I got up and didn't stop, seeing both of them standing near the second pair of stairs, placed right near the other part of the room. "Run now, they're onto us!"I shouted while running and saw them nod. I haven't run like this in a long while and I managed to catch with them in a shorter than expected. We didn't wait and we did not check any room for anything, knowing that there was no way out and that we could,"Check the roof, perhaps there's something there""What happened? Were you seen by them?""I don't know but I didn't wait to find out, I think I managed to slow them down"The building could barely sustain itself, unfinished and broken. I didn't know what to expect, I couldn't break up to those kids but I didn't know if there was a chance for us to escape. "I don't know why we're going up, there's nothing there waiting for us. Perhaps we should just give up and. ""No, we're not going to get caught, right?You could tell us what your name is, I mean, why is it so hard for you to trust us with your name?"I had a good reason to hide my name and I wasn't going to reveal it to them, so I had to lie to conceal my identity. "My name is Eruphaer, now can you leave me alone and concentrate on the matter at hand?""Thank you, was it so hard now?"She said whilst misstepping on the stairs and almost tripping. "To be fair, I can understand why he hasn't told us. I mean, If I were called that way, I wouldn't have said it either. ""I don't really dislike it. "Though I had to admit, it wasn't especially pleasant on the tongue, unless. "Wait, is that your family or second name?""We got one more floor to go and we're at the top of it, can't it wait after that?I can't stand it to fulfill your meaningless banter any longer""I'm sorry"She said. "I didn't want to intrude, I was just curious"Paul didn't wait any second for it and told her "You know what they said about curiosity and the feline""Enough of it"I laid it forth just as we climbed the final floor, but got stopped by a tight, big door blocking the way towards the rooftop. Echoes bounced on the walls that were still intact, desperately climbing up towards us, alerting us to the impending presence of upcoming agents. "Wait, is that?""Yes, they're coming. It would seem like my rigged attempt to slow them down came to an end, let's hurry now. I'm still not ready to give up. We need to break through somehow"I started inspecting the door for anything that could unlock it by itself but the only thing I could manage to see from it was a strange mechanism attached to it. "Fine, I'll look around for anything useful. ""Don't go lower than this floor, you couldn't make it in time even if you tried. ""Understood"I left Phaer to work on brute forcing the door whilst I started checking everything out. "Paul, you could make yourself useful too, go on the other side of the room and look down. You could announce us in case the agents are about to charge us. ""Are you sure that's the safe thing to do for me, because. . ""Just do it. "It felt like the man that once appreciated me quickly turned around, getting colder and colder. Even the way he addressed me changed, so demanding and. "Go already, I need to work in peace, or else I can't open the lock and we can't escape. ""I'm on it, just don't mention it"Thank you, that is. I passed Genevie who was sweeping the floor for clues and didn't say a word so I wouldn't disturb her. He entrusted me with this task, directly in the line of danger and I was sure not to disappoint him in no possible way. Before arriving there, I saw a small screwdriver laying on the ground untouched. I looked behind and saw that neither of them was looking in my direction. Reassured of what I was doing would go unnoticed, I grabbed the screwdriver and placed it safely in my pocket. I'm sure they wouldn't mind if I took it, it could surely come in handy later on. On the way there, I decided not to tell them about what I've found, it surely wouldn't help them more than it can help me. And, it was their fault in the first place that they didn't see it. Finders keeper. "Can you see anyone?"I heard Genevie's slightly audible voice, she probably didn't want them to hear her and give us away. I understood that and just nodded my head instead. Like a hawk I stood above the stairs and with both my ears and eyes, I watched over them, guarding them like a guard dog, unshaken by anything. "Damn this lock, blast it away""What happened?Could you also please stop shouting so we can try getting away in one piece?""I can't do anything without my tools, have you found anything so far? "What could I say to him? I tried my best to find something but the dust mostly took it away by now. He, we had to face the facts already, there was no way out. "No. . . I'm sorry. "Useless, I couldn't do anything to open it and we were just sitting here waiting to get caught. But. . . There was another option. "Go and call Paul here, there might be something else we could do. . . ""Give me a second" I didn't know what he had in mind but I hope he's going to make the best of it. If what he told us so far is true, we might be going on thin ice. There was no hurry but I was fast, even with my doubts, I still believed that he could do something to help us and perhaps we could even enjoy the little time we have together. "Hey, Paul. ""Yeah, still on duty if you're asking. No one so far just sounds from downstairs, yet nothing alarming or worth mentioning. So what can I do for you?" I asked her whilst taking my sight away from the post I was on. "Follow me, please. Man, that sure felt great to say, I now understand why he enjoyed bossing us around. ""Right. . . But how could I leave the post? Oh, did he manage to open the lock? Took him a while but I'm glad that it's, at least, open""Yeah about that. . . "She said, mostly from the excitement of getting to the safe place. "I passed her again and got ready for our embarkment to the next level of the building. "Genevie, last one getting there is a rotten stink. ""Hold on a minute. . . "As the race began, it would seem like I was going to be the winner. "Hah, you're so slow, perhaps you want to get caught since you're not even trying""That's not the reason, I just had something in mind, something that you might not like" She said while getting ready to catch up to me. What could that be "I wonder""You might not like it" She continued, next to me this time. "Ok, I'm glad that you both came, now. "Phae was waiting for us, next to the stairs leading to the roof. A mean look at his face, exciting even, staring at me for some reason. "So, what are we waiting? Haven't you opened it yet or what? The cavalry is here and ready to go" Genevie held me by the shoulder and told me the truth, "There's no way to break the lock, well. . . ""I don't have the tools necessary and desperate times call for desperate needs" He said while we felt something rough making the entire building tremble. "Another ground tremor? You don't think that we might have to. . . ""No, unless we brute force through the lock. "I told her before looking back at Paul. I think he knew by now what I was implying and he might not get to like it. "Why are you looking at me like that?" "I need your trumpet to break the lock with" He was dismayed by my words. "Wait, how are you intending to use my trumpet for that? You can't just break through like that, you're crazy. ""Now now, we ran out of options now and since there isn't anything else we can use, this is our last option. Genevie hold him down!" I told her as she already made her way behind and appealed my call, apprehending him from behind. "Wait, stop, not my trumpet. You said it yourself, you like it. You can't just destroy it!" I jiggled but couldn't escape her tight grip on my arms. "Please let me go, I haven't done anything wrong""Now now, it's going to be fast, just stop resisting, we wouldn't have done this if we didn't run out of options""I'm sorry Paul but he's right, weren't you the one that said that before?" "Yes, but. . . That was different. "I got closer to them, ready to take the trumpet before I stopped. "Wait, I have something else we can use. There's a screwdriver in my pocket""What?" Genevie said as she unhanded me soon after. "I thought I could. . . ""It doesn't matter now. . . "This place was ready to collapse, the explosions from the station before might have caused the tremors to come. "Did you feel that?" Paul asked. "Yes, that could explain why no agents got here so far, this place could fall too at any moment. ""Wait, then why are we still here?" She asked whilst being alarmed. "We can't go down any longer, judging on how much it took between the tremor to come, the plan remains the same, we're going up. ""Then, here it is. You might find this useful. "Said, Paul, before he finally gave me the screwdriver and left me to my work. They both left me to my work, not so far from me, ready to blitz in just as I was ready to open the door. I inserted the screwdriver inside the hole and started turning the cogs that laid inside it. With my ear on the door I started taking notes of the different sounds they made as each rotation I made with the screwdriver made. From what I could hear, there were, at least, eight cogs wheels that made different combinations of sounds in unison. Two turns on the right and one on the left made a drone sound before suddenly stopping. Another turn towards the left and just one to the right got closer to a high pitched sound. Who was responsible for making such sophisticated machine and why was it placed here?

"Are you done yet? It's freezing in here. "

"Please, be silent. I need to work in peace. "

"Sorry. "

Three turns on the right, one semi-turn on the left, I needed to check them more to figure out how the mechanism worked, two sounds came out of it. I could feel that I was getting close to something, hopefully, It won't be misheard because of another inevitable shake. Turning this way around made me feel like I was making progress, that I was getting to somewhere. If I kept it this way, I could finally break through with more ease. "Umm Phaer?" "I said I need silence, I'm trying to work here" "Phaer!" Genevie yelled with him, both disturbing and redirecting me from my work. I took my ear back and managed to understand what they were talking about. "The building is moving" "But this can't be possible, another quake maybe?" I asked her as she laid her case before me. At first, I thought a giant earthquake was going to swallow this entire building. And, to be fair I wasn't entirely wrong. "Why is everything shaking like that? Are we going down?" Paul should whilst becoming, closely to being desperate. I couldn't lie but I wasn't sure what to think about this situation either. I was afraid too. The moment I looked outside where another hole laid, I could see the growth of the forest getting farther and farther away. And at the same time, it started lifting itself up. "There's even less time, with the speed we're going now, we could get crushed if we try jumping outside" "What are you talking about? We're going to die and there's no way out for us. What have I gotten myself into?" "Calm down Paul, I know there's something we could do to escape. Right Phaery?" The ground was moving fast under us, both of them remained alarmed and startled. "I have even less time, with the vibrations I won't be able to open the device by listening to it" "What now?" "We break it" "You mean with the screwdriver?" Said Genevie whilst being barely able to hold herself on her feet. My balance wasn't great either, especially with these old bones and from what I knew, this place could collapse over us just like in the station before. "Then do it, fast. I don't know how much more can I take. "Paul was right, he wasn't able to keep it together ever since we met, his brilliant future soon to be turned into dust. "I will" I held it tightly in my arm and started thrusting it in and out, making sparks and turning cogs like never before. The building and the ground started shaking even more and we could even hear the sounds of the ground being smashed as we descended into the abode. "Hurry up. Here, I'll help. "Genevie said as she got closer and helped me push it deeper inside it. No more thrusts, we tried our best together to puncture the machine and break the mechanism once and for ever. "Paul, please come We need your help now, more than ever" She said whilst still pushing inside. The sky was getting darker and I could see that the light was passing away, we were about to go even deeper underground. The hard solid ground scuffled and made its way closer to us. "No, we're getting buried alive, we're going to die now. I was afraid that might happen. No. . " "Paul, there's still time, just come and help us. It's our only shot. "She said, trying her best to convince him to aid us. "Listen to her Paul, we can get out of this alive, I know we can. Don't let your talents go to waste here where no one can hear you any longer. "The ground shook under us, both the hard cement and the soil and I could see that he had a hard time , despite trying to reach us. We were both held together by the screwdriver that was firmly lodged inside the machine. "Give me your hand Paul, I'll pull you in""I don't know. I'm afraid, I don't want to die. . ""Then give me your damn hand you damnable fool!"Almost shouting I reached my hand and grabbed his as he managed to extend it closer to me. "Pull me faster, the ground is rising up. "We weren't outside anymore, giant roots almost started tearing through the building, strong enough to decimate the stone that once formed the place we were in. The ground, it would seem that it almost got thick and enough of it to start covering us, getting closer to our toes. I pulled him away and held his back as he joined us and started pushed with us. The three of us pushed as hard as we could, even helped by the shaking metal and stone in the last attempt to enter. One cling came out of it and the machine spat out the screwdriver from out hands. Far way from the soil it got lost and in the meantime, as that happened, the machine never stopped its melody. Turning its cogs and playing its tune to an end, luckily that it didn't manage to throw us under with the small tool we now lost. The soil was rising up at an alarming rate. "If it keeps it this way we might not get to the end of the tune. ""We can't get the screwdriver any longer can we?So. . "A silence came soon after a the tune left out nothing but the soil alone. "This is it. Isn't it? "Paul said with tears in his eyes, he couldn't take it any longer and neither could we. The land reached the stairs and started getting closer to us. "There's nothing left for us to try but push it. ""You don't think it's actually open, do you? ""Any other alternatives you could think of? "I asked Genevie whilst hoping she understood that it was a rhetorical question that I laid upon her. Small chunks coiled around, bouncing between the ground and our bodies. These stairs strangely weren't affected by the whole pandemonium happening around us. It would seem like, not only them but possibly the next floor wasn't going to be the roof but another level on its own. "What's that sound?"Rock was being smashed, even worse than before, if what I thought was real. . . Every floor being smashed in a consecutive order, that would explain the reason behind all the sudden shakes. "Let's try it then. "I said whilst pushing the door. We were neck by neck, pushing hard, helped by that dirt itself as it reached our backs and almost crushed on in the big metal door right in front of us. Almost crushes but not yet, we were thrown inside with the door opening. The vault was broken, releasing a gust of the wind as we got inside. Thrown inside, the three of us before the wind blew the gate back to its place and crushed the remaining dirt that was behind us. I was the first to open my mind and be astonished. "Wow. . . "Paul said just as he finished pulling his lungs back from the floor. "This is. . . "Genevie continued, on the floor just like he once was. "Amazing, I know. . . "Said by me, the last one of the group as we admired the flashy and colorful room we were in. But it was more than a room, it was no roof either, what laid in front of us were two giant plated windows with coated metal bars sealing them away. So many buttons, levers, cogs and fuzzs located in front of us, such an interface I haven't seen in a long while, not since the great machine war. "What's it for?"Paul asked as he got up and came closer towards it. The red room with soft rugs and with a classy style brought some strange ideas to mind. I looked around and saw furniture covered win wolf pelts, a small bar with bottled drinks, a big lamp incorporated inside and powered by the most of the unknown source. We didn't feel any tremors as if it had a gravity of its own, nor could we see through the windows since they were too dirty to be seen through. "So who do you think lives here? Or used to live here?" Genevie asked me, as she started inspecting the soft sofa, even being growled by the fur on her attempt. While they were busy chatting, I had the chance to look around. I wasn't going to forget the whole previous incident so soon, even if we're safe now. My trumpet was still with me, the only instrument that could bring me joy in this critical situation. I cherished my mother's gift more now than ever before. And now that I was done defending it, the time has come for me to take the reins and perhaps even take control of this machine. Two golden plated seats with soft red pillows held together by conveyor belts. Luckily for me, it paid off listening to my father's speeches during my visit at the industry. Hmm, this could mean that the machine needed two people to handle. Huh, If I figured it out so fast, there's no doubt that Phaer already knows it. "Well, it's not about who lived here but why did it lay at the top of an abandoned building?" "A miracle I say! Wouldn't be the first one that occurred today, right?" "Don't be silly about it girl. And lay off the sofa, we don't want to break and pay for it later.

"Seriously?" She asked, this time, a lot calmer. How could she throw herself on that settee? Perhaps she forgot where we were, but I didn't, not yet. I had to look for more, the ceiling, rusty, the layers of the paint almost started falling down, collapsing on their own, this time, more screws and sealed even more shut than I could handle. Even with my tools at hand. The lamp above us was held by a metal tube with its wires going through inside the machine. There was no space nor any indication of the existence of another way out through above. Except the many useless pleasure machines installed inside, there wasn't anything with much use. A fridge installed but it wouldn't do much to help, even the handles were too tight to be opened by hand, not to mention visibly cold. The only other element that got my attention was Paul, checking the main controls and taking his eye at me from time to time. He must have thought about it being used by two people, I can't really blame him for mistrusting me now, I've done some terrible things and he doesn't even know half of them. "So what are you doing Paul? Stop checking out the machine and see the sofa? It feels like I'm standing on real, breathing sleeping wolves. Some quality stuff right in here." Genevie started twisting her hand in order to call him towards her. "Just a second, I really have to see what's going on in here. Perhaps it would be easier if you weren't sitting down there and got up to help me Phaer. "I'll come in a moment, someone has to think about the next course of action after all. "Next course of action? Next course of action!" The machine had a small room, not being enough for the three of us and certainly not with a furious young man like himself. "Perhaps you were thinking about asking her to tie me to that big valve over there. Maybe even covering my mouth with something. Is that the next course of action you were thinking?" I didn't expect him to blow so soon but it happened. "Wait a minute. Don't be so harsh on him, it's not entirely his fault." Said Genevie as she finally decided to bust in the conversation. "Thank you for reminding me and once again taking his side. You know, just because he's old you don't have to do everything he tells you, especially when it comes to forcing someone to sacrifice something he owns and likes" He pulled away from the controls and directly addressed her this time, ignoring me on his way to her. "Is this what's it all about? Well, if we've decided to open the subject, perhaps we wouldn't have gone to that point if you gave us the screwdriver in the first time to begin with. "Don't put the blame on me, I did what I thought was right. But, it was not fair for you, for both of you to do that, even with no other choice. "I decisively got on my feet and confronted both of them on my decision. "It's all my fault if you want to be angry at someone, be angry at me and me alone. Say what you want but after we're out of here safely, you might have noticed by now that we're still trapped and who knows where. "And? It's not my fault we're here, I'm not the one who came to the right idea of climbing up to some strange room at the top of a falling house. ""Might not be your idea but it's not the time to pass blames from here and there. "They weren't going to make things easier for me it would seem, so caught in their small affair that they didn't notice a flashing button on the stand in from of the chair. "Phaer?"I asked him as he was being distracted by his own explanation of the gravity surrounding us. "What's that?Spill it out already since Paul here can't wait for us to get out before we start talking. ""Is that supposed to flash like that?"I said whilst pointing it out. "What are you talking about?"He turned towards it and started approaching it.

I got up my sweet soft sofa and joined both of them who were staring at something from afar. A small map with numbers and boxes all over next to that flashing button. But "What does it mean Phaer?This seems old enough and you seem. Well, you must have some old knowledge about a lot of stuff. "Genevie got close to insulting Phaer. I was glad that I wasn't the only one charmed by him, despite his previous attempts. "A map of, apparently where we're headed towards. ""What is that red blob over there?"She asked as she pointed towards it. Moving too across the map and at a strange speed. "Is that falling down or what?It looks like it if those are edges anyway. "Surprisingly, he was willing to cooperate with us, even with my accusation in sight. He was calm the entire time and didn't do much to fight back. "Good observation there. That's the representation of us, which would mean that we're still free falling. ""What?"Genevie said, almost shouting her lungs outside her body. "What do you mean by we're still falling?Not only that we can't feel a thing but. . . What will happen if we get to the ground?"Well, it's not a matter about if but when. I don't think it will be much of a problem, such a machine was built to withstand worse than great distances, and from the looks of it, we might hit the rough dirt at best. "Paul came quickly at that. "And that is no concern to you at all?I mean we are going too deep underground, the way up might have collapsed over us too from what we know. I was right about us being buried underground, it just got delayed now. ""Don't lose hope yet, there's still something we can do. Right Phaer?You got us through worse, even if our state of being acquainted was short in the time spent together, I know I can trust you at least. ""Perhaps there might be a way out. This was just a small detour but I'm still headed towards my original destination"He said while turning some valves and pulling two rounded levers covered in copper. I turned around from them and looked at the only way we had out, the small gate from where we came from. Perhaps. . . "I don't know where you want to go but could you, at least, tell us?If it's a way out, then we're in too, even though we don't have any other chances. "My sight was directed towards the animated map, at this point, I even noticed that what might have remained out of the broken building we were on got smashed right under us. Yet we felt nothing and we're still far from feeling anything. This machine was not simple, even from its interior, it might have cost a small fortune, too much anyway to be abandoned like that. "Like I said, there is a way out towards where I'm going. But it might be dangerous. It's too dangerous, even for me to be going there. Yet, from what I can read on this map. . . We're being lead right towards it. ""Towards where?"Genevie asked before going over the map with her slim fingers. The distance wasn't that far now, the blob was getting a formation that would help it arrive even closer than I planned to go. Though it wasn't in my original course of action to get caught with two other unwanted passengers, especially without someone that hates me. "Well, you see now. Since we have more than enough time for it and there's nothing else we can do in here"I said it whilst looking towards Paul's possible intentions. "And that hatch won't even open anymore, not until we're out of this conundrum. You can both sit down and hear me out. "I left just enough room for both of them to sit on the two chairs, before that I even adjusted them towards the short gap that faces me. Towards me they stood after, laid onto the plated chairs, unmoved by the lack of strong wind and current even though we were underground. He stood above the hatch, then moved around, measuring it back and forth. Was he preparing to lay something huge upon us? Perhaps he was stalling since he couldn't fully explain what he meant by that. I knew ever since we met that he hid something from us but now. Now, he was there, maneuvering in silence and all this time, just like I thought about it before, he was calm, too calm to be in a situation like the one we're in. "Listen, we're. . ." An audible explosion came from somewhere, making waves and finally shaking our cabin. The hatch got smashed and pulled under, taking Phaer with it. The wind blew inside with strength, creating a vacuum that went back and forth, pulling and blowing objects inside, sometimes followed by chunks. We were barely holding by the edges of our seats as it wasn't strong enough to pull us there. For a fraction of a second, I thought I heard Phaer scream but it was gone too far for me to notice. "We need to seal it off somehow" I yelled at her, the wind made it hard for me to speak and breath without swallowing too much of the dust. "How?" She asked whilst holding her seat unable to move. "We need to see. . ." "I couldn't say it but I got up and slowly moved, my feet were pushing down but my body felt like it was going to be thrown around. "Help me" A shout came from somewhere down there, it was him and he was still alive but how could it be? It was clear that we were still falling and somehow he didn't get crushed. Slowly moving towards the hole left in the middle of the room, I slid down and held it by the edges, afraid that If I kept my altitude I'd end up getting pulled down there too. "Wait. For me" She said as she was soon to join me. My head was still away but I managed to pull it closer so I could see. . . "Paul, I need your help" I said to him, just as I was holding by the cables. Just my luck to be trapped between this and the war machine. "Are you. Okay Pher?" He asked, from the position he was in, all the dust avoided by me would get to puncture his skin and do even more damage than before. "Yes, I'm fine, but I will need your help and Genevie" She arrived in time, both of them were holding as tightly as they could by the broken hole "What's that?" "Don't be alarmed by it, but do you see these big cables connected to this huge sphere and our machine? Nod your head if you heard me" "Yes" Paul said, followed by almost gagging as a small rock flew into his mouth. "Take care, like I said, just nod. "He spits it out, almost managing to hit me, at least, he was fine. "Now, this giant sphere. And you may get alarmed by it. "I stuttered and hard rock met the metal sphere, making cracks and sparks, throwing shards at me. "We don't have much time. We're about to fall on a megaton bomb" "What?" They both shouted in unison, ignoring my advice. The cables I was holding the balance on were flickering, as it was still active. "Don't panic too much as I'd like to remember you that you're not the ones sitting on the actual bomb!" How did this happen? Not able to speak, I watched below how we were falling on a bomb and on him. Those green, dark cables were too thick and seemingly long to be running by themselves, they could be wrapped around us, which was too bad to even describe. The stone walls that we fell between were getting crushed by that sphere and those cables, too tight and covering the way we came through with chunks. "I need you two to focus now since I don't think there's much time until we reach the bottom of this place and when we do it. . ." A small break came to be, I could see that he needed some time to catch his breath. The air was going to leave us too but not fast enough to miss the huge bang at the end. "I can't disarm this by my own, I need you to. . ." I stopped again when I saw something that made sparkles between the machine and the cord. Dodging out of the way almost made me slide down, catching and grabbing hold of another cable right in time so I wouldn't get crushed. "Phaer!" "Phaer!" "I'm fine, but the sphere?" I was afraid as a metal object got thrown directly at me, which would have ended up killing me or worse. The "Screwdriver" Paul lost almost killed me but it wasn't far from it, in the process, it might have done more worse than the good of returning to us. It managed to impale a part of the bomb, not deep enough to trigger it but enough to give us a good scare. "What. . Now?" Genevie asked while doing her best to cover her eyes from it. "I'm all right in case you were wondering, now, if you would please draw your attention the panel over there" I pointed and so did her eyes follow towards the metal panel, so distinct over the bomb. We had the screwdriver now, ready to unscrew the pins holding it in place, the last part of my plan remained. "I need both of you to jump down here with me. ""Are you insane?" Paul said whilst still busy spitting the sand out of his mouth. "Don't worry. "I tried comforting both of them as their doubtful looks fell upon me from above. "Look, we might die anyway but, at least, this way we have yet another chance to make it out. Plus, the only other way you'll get injured or die is if you slide and get crushed between the rocks. "The look on their faces when I said that, it was plain. Terrified, I felt as I heard Phaer tell us we could die if we didn't do it right. "Look, I need you both to take deep breaths and go for it. "The speed we were in, the force it had and those crushed rocks would tear our bodies apart in less than a second if it came to it. I backed away from the hole for a moment so I could think more clearly and Genevie followed. We both knew that there wasn't enough time till we would hit rock bottom. "What now Paul?" "It doesn't seem like we got much of an option anymore. Does it?" "I guess so. Look, Paul, about what I did before. ""I know Genevie, I know. Don't worry about it now, I've already forgiven you. "The place sure did look welcoming, even with the cold wind coming from outside. And warm too, such a warm I wouldn't get to feel anymore. "Look, I want you to have this, truth be told, I haven't been able to take good care of it. "He gave me the small instrument he held in his hand not so long ago, it was warm from being held inside his jacket all this time. Took me some time but I finally did, I finally realised that it had some value with it, important to him. "Listen Paul. . ""Just take it, after all, I can't jump that well with extra luggage""Wait a minute Paul. ""It's going to be fine, I'll jump first and grab onto one of the cables and ride it down to Phaer. I promise I'll catch you after I'm next to him" Unconvinced, I remained afraid of what might happen to him, or me. He was going to catch me, there was no doubt about it. On both of his feet, holding his hands on the ceiling so he wouldn't fall too soon, he went closer. The winds kept blowing filth all this time but he remained undisturbed by it for the duration of this time. He looked at me from above before redirecting himself to Phaer. "Take care, you need to catch one of the cables on your way down. "He said while dragging himself higher. "If anything goes wrong, I will catch you, just jump when you're ready. But hurry up, I don't know how much time is left. ""I will. . . "He turned around to stare at me again before telling me. "See you down there Genny" I was afraid of heights and certainly this didn't help the case. Everything started shaking, even worse than before but the choice was already made. I jumped through and stretched my hand to catch the coil. "Paul!" Genevie yelled as Paul fell, the coil he was about to catch recoiled and missed his hand entirely. "No, Paul!" I was afraid too as he fell directly on the metal and started sliding. "Aghhh" The landing felt like it broke something. "Paul, catch my hand" I heard him say but I couldn't see where he was, sliding away, I managed to stop myself and hold on the screwdriver. ""Are you okay Paul?" Phaer said, trying to make his way towards me but not fast enough. Some of my teeth with my nose were chipped, my tongue impaled and I couldn't spit a word. So tired of it, my hand could barely hold onto it. "Paul" I thought she screamed again. "Paul""No" I didn't reach him in time just as he stopped holding on. Violent sounds and rattling noises, he was nowhere to be found. I looked everywhere around, I couldn't take the dust anymore, my eyes were being hurt. Where did he go?"Phaer"I coughed whilst saying it. "Where is Paul?Where is he?I can't see him"Not caring on how much of the dust I inhaled and how much of it got into me"I felt like I could break the cable I was holding. "Genevie, look away, you mustn't see this. "I didn't know what to tell her anymore. "Genevie. ""Where is he?Please tell me he's down there with you. He must be. "With a cloth on her face, she spoke well but didn't want to accept the truth. "Tell me, why can't I see him?I'm looking everywhere, where is he?""Genevie, please, I need your help. This is going to explode. We're going to die if we don't disarm it""I can't do this alone, not without knowing where Paul is. ""He's dead Genevie. . . "It felt colder and sharper than the tipped sand. My eyes got wider and. . . "I will catch you, please. It won't do him any good if we both follow him to the grave. "Without thinking it twice I jumped from where I stood, even if I was on the ground, I didn't think about it much. The time she took to jump, I managed to get myself into position, on my feet and successfully catch her. "Hold on, we're not done yet""I know. . "Genevie had her hand embroiled with one of the coils and her two feet stabilising her position on the bomb. "Phaer, Paul is. . ""Yes, I know. Please, it can wait until after we're done with it. ""What now?""We need to rip its framework open before we could put an end to it. "She started moving closer to it, ready to start the procedure, with the coil in her hand and gripped tightly so she wouldn't fall off. "I'll grab the screwdriver and we can pry it open, just stay there. "It was stuck and quite so that I was afraid it would set it off if I were to pull it out too rough. With a spindle reflex, I took it out and almost lost my balance that I held against the thick surface I was on. Almost about to fall on my back, she caught me by my hand and pulled me over. "Much appreciated. Now, let's being"I told her as I soon joined her and slammed the tool inside the edges the casing had. "Careful there. "She said as I kept stripping it apart, centimeter by centimeter, getting closer to the point of removing it to its entirety. After getting a large part of it above the sphere's level, I gave her the screwdriver and shoved both of my hands inside it. Pulling as hard as I could I started hearing squishy noises coming and splashes on my hand coming from its inside. One part ahead and I lifted it up revealing the organic system it stored inside it. "I think I'm going to be sick"She was disgusted and so was I, as removing its metal shell left its veins and muscles uncovered, vulnerable. I can't say I wasn't expecting this but not this big and it was still thumping with its active bloody system. "Look Genevie, we need to shut down this organism or else it will explode""You want us to kill being?Have we not done enough already?That man. . . Paul. . . Now this?""Listen Genevie, I know it's hard but we can't avoid this, sacrificed had to be made in order for us to come this far ahead. ""What do you mean by us?"She said whilst in anguish, pointing the screwdriver at me. "I can't believe how much of a monster you are, sacrificing people left and right without giving a thought about it. ""Don't act like you're better than me, you didn't seem to care that much about them either. Drop the act and let's get on to it, or, perhaps you'd prefer death instead. "She was cold about it, almost blank inside as she stared at me. One second after she lowered her weapon and complied to it. The situation demanded both of us to work together for the time being even if she might not have liked it. "How many have to die?""This is the last one that has to die, I promise you. "A fake promise if it would come to the point where I would have to abandon her. I scanned its appearance and looked for a softer spot. "There, a quick stab should be enough to remove some of its sinews, go for it and don't stop until I tell you to. ""Are you. . . Sure about it?""Yes, do it now. "I grabbed the coil with both of my hands, the stone that was being crushed between the bomb and my machine was getting rougher too, less of it cracked on our way down. She started with a swing then came to repetitively showing and removing it without taking any break or showing signs of being tired. "Stop" I said as she removed enough of it to reveal something. She felt it too, finding something hard beneath all that delicate muscle, the blood almost drowned it but no main artery was hit. "There's our prize. "With both of my hands, I stepped in, the coil wrapped around my shoulder just as I pushed the meat in two way to reveal a metal panel. "It has some screws keeping it shut, open them" Four of them were getting unscrewed by her whilst I was making sure that. . Almost having my arm broken and her body strained too, both the sphere and the machine stopped with us being propelled and close to getting crushed on the ceiling. "Phaer" She screamed the second her leg got into contact with a metallic side of the machine. I managed to land fine on my own, whilst still hanging on the coil, sliding on it safely. "Genevie!" She went through worse after getting her left mauled, falling down on a hard spot and possibly suffering a concussion. "Genevie, speak to me" Closer to her, I immediately checked her pulse and made sure that she was still breathing. Not dead yet but this was another problem that could get even worse. It would seem I had to finish this "Alone. If you're not going to help me, I have to finish this alone" The whole spot we were on was shaking too, slowly moving with us on it. Hopefully, we won't get crushed by the time I'm done. I grabbed the tool and resumed the work she failed to succeed on. Her unconsciousness and broken leg would seem that they'd slow me down later on but for now, I had to finish what I started. Just two of them remained unscrewed, I opened them to find out a huge channel leading inside it, full of blood frozen in strings. It looked like its nervous system, being a couple of feet deep, possibly holding over thousands of strings that kept streaming information and flowing with its blood and cells. Perhaps, if she was awake, she wouldn't have had the guts for it but I would do this act to save us both, even if I wasn't able to save the three of us, It would seem like I would make up for it. If there was something that could do the most possible damage whilst falling inside, what could it be? This tool served me well but it wouldn't manage to perfectly fall and break every last one of the strings, the rocks here were too rough for me to break and use them as a resource. Luckily for me, not only that we had enough air for the time being coming from the machine but we were close enough to stop the bomb from going off, just one step before it would all end for it. "Are. . we dead yet?" Genevie asked as she woke up. The walls started shaking between us and the machine fell down, getting closer to us. I ducked down, fast enough to avoid getting my head being crushed. "Ugh. Not yet. "I told her whilst avoiding the falling object that came through the hole. None of them were big enough to hit everything and space left me barely enough to crawl inside. "Phaer, what's going on?" "We're almost done, but we're holding on our last straw now. Listen, do you have something big enough, a rock, a bag or anything?" "I don't. I'm confused and I can't really feel my leg. What's going on?" "There wasn't much now, a glass fell but didn't break, too small but I grabbed and threw it inside. She was too far from me to see what I was doing, but I saw as some of the strings got smashed in its fall, leaving some small streams flow before disappearing in the shadows. Not enough of them, as I was running out of option, I threw the pens that fell off, then the melted wax and when things seemed desperate, I threw the screwdriver. There was no way for me to know if I managed to break enough strings to prevent its explosion but I wasn't going to stand there and find out. It was time to force the machine to release itself from it and travel further down. "Are we done yet?" "No Genevie, we're still on the frying pan I think but for now, we can only put or hope in this last effort I did" I couldn't hear nor see down there if enough blood got spilled but it was time to go. She was trying to get up but the injury was worse than I thought, I would need to pull her up from above. "Wait here a second till I come back" On my way, I was stopped as she held my leg in place whilst still on the ground. "Don't leave me. I know. . . You're trying to leave me here" "Let go of me this moment, I will get you up once I'm there. The machine could fall at any moment and squish both of us. Is that what you wish?" "No. But I don't know if I can trust you anymore. . . Paul was right about when he acted the way he did. "She was holding quite tight with both of her arms on my leg, practically shoving her fingers inside it. "Look, that was an unfortunate mistake but you can't live in the past now. "The machine started shaking above us, indicating its unfortunate but eventually decline. "You need to trust me, what I did before was always in my interest. "With tears in her eyes and afraid she let go of me, doing her best not to let any sound come out of her mouth. Perhaps, the falling machine wasn't that bad, it got the exit closer and made her understand where we stood with one another. I watched him as he reached above and climbed up. Such silence laid after as I kept watching in fear of the trembling machine, with the dirty air I was spilling out of my lungs. The way I inhaled the air made a lot of audible noise and each of the shake brought the scenario of what would happen if it would fall on me. He lied to me and left me alone to die alone. So close, it moved so close, I was so afraid of what pain it would bring. I didn't want to scream or say any word as it moved again, closer and closer to me. No, stop, I don't want to, I wanted to scream but It would be of no point and I would only drown in my tears as they ran over my cheeks. A cling noise could be heard, one of the metal coils was being rubbed against the machine and the stone, adding even more dread than I needed. So close to me that I could touch it with my arms. And when it got to a desperate point, a hand came from above me, standing between the light and what was left of the place where I stood. I grabbed it and got up on one of my legs whilst the other was still barely being pulled aside. There was no way for me to get up with just one and as I got up on the other, halfway into the entrance to the machine I released a scream, my leg being broken and worse inside. "Almost there, come on" He held me by the waist and pulled me above right as I grabbed the sharp edges and managed to cut a fragment of my skin upon it. With one leg above it and dragging the other on the side, I was finally brought back, right as the machine finally slammed on the sphere, crushing everything. Even the opened hatch and the skin released a fleshy sound before me. I fell on my back and curled into a ball soon after. I wanted to do nothing but to be safe. With my eyes closed and tears still falling down from my eyes, I didn't even want to speak to him anymore. Not even my broken leg mattered anymore as I was afraid that I was still there waiting to be crushed. "Genevie, I'm sorry it took me so long. I had to be sure I would be in range to do so, even if it ended up being so dangerous. Excuse me for a second now. "I turned around to push the fridge over the hole, covering it in its entirety. Took me a while to pull it out of its place and drag it over there but at least, It leads to a perfect match, a good combination that would prevent any of the remaining air to be wasted over nothing. All the costs were included in the trip, even the minor inconveniences, which lead me back to. "We need to take care of your leg before you get an infection and to the point where I would be forced to amputate it" "No, anything but that" Just jumped out of my mouth and my original position and his insane statement almost pierced my skin. "Don't do that. I'm tired of feeling so much pain. "I know Genevie, but think about it in a different way. You're safe now with someone overqualified in fixing problems" "Just like you fixed Paul? Or how you fixed me?" She started yelling, growing away from her dormant state. "First of all, I haven't fixed you yet and with Paul. That could've been avoided if he waited. Don't you dare think for a second that I don't regret or think about that for a second. "Dismissed by her in an instant, she said that

"You've done a poor job showing that. Do you even care about me?" "We'll finish the conversation after I'm done nurturing your leg. "I let her know as I took a medical kit that was hidden under the control panel of the main core, the right to the main panel. "You can't just ignore me for the rest of the duration, it's propostorous. ""I'm not going to plainly ignore you, I'm just delaying our conversation until we're done. Now, I need to tend to your leg before it gets worse, can't you understand that?" Whilst lifting myself up, I noticed his small box and the bandages he had in his hand, ready to scroll them around my leg. "So, how are you intending to. . "He got closer and grabbed by two sides of it. "This might hurt for a while after I'm done""What are you talking about? I can't feel anything. . "Or so I thought, at least before he forced the joints back together, slamming both sides back in. "Aghhh, my damn leg" The pain ran through it and didn't stop there as I bit my tongue, all because of the unexpected technique he used on me. He lifted a part of my pants up and started bandaging the inflated area but not before rubbing something on it. I didn't question what was in the substance as I was afraid it would spark another conflict, but it did baffle me. "What was that?" "Not specific so I wouldn't appear too alarmed of what he did. "A mere ointment to ease your pain, followed by those bandages that are on you. Have I been clear enough with my explanation or shall I repeat myself in case you missed that too?" "Don't patronise me after what you've done. You could've been more gentle, especially for your age. Could you please give me a notice that you're listening to me?" Back at the controls, he didn't seem to notice me anymore. "I didn't, I just have more important tasks to take care off. Especially since it would seem that we're moving once again""Thankfully we can still. . ""Yes, we can still escape this, or, at least, you as a matter of fact since I'll have to take care of something. ""And what might that be? What is it so important that you would sacrifice someone else? It's not a coincidence that any of this happened, is it? The crash, the explosions, the bomb?" Not a single look back at me, whilst still at the controls, checking and fixing something that was beyond me for the entire time. "Whatever you're expecting the answer to be, it's probably worse than you think. You don't need to know any of it. If all goes well, we'll be able to part ways safely and never see each other ever again. ""And what about those crimes? Those deaths? You think I'm just going to forget about them?" Not even when I tried provoking him, not even then did he pay any attention to me. For I was busy, making sure that there wouldn't be any other unwanted delays. "And we should reach bottom in less than ten minutes by my calculations. "And the indications laid by the map. "Bottom of what?" Deep enough, as the giant tunnel, we were going through lead to a chasm, large enough to host a thousand machines, perhaps even more. Protected inside and having something to fall over, we didn't feel anything as we landed to its bottom. A smaller light indicated to me that the pipes outside of the machine weren't buried, perfect as none of the rubble travelled with us. Both of us were still alive, meaning that the bomb hasn't gone off. "Alas, we're here. Can you stand on both of your legs?" "Could you give me a hand at least?" With his help, I managed to get up to a few laps, whatever he gave me had a strange effect as it healed my wound almost instantly, even better than before. "So, how are getting out? Did we even reach the bottom yet?" "Patience Genevie. "He said whilst pulling one of the levers on the side. Steam started coming out of the barred window's sides as it started lifting itself up, having some of the mud accumulated before fall off of it. "I can't really see anything. Where are we? Wait, do we even have air here?" "Calm down, we're safe here, we got enough air coming through the various tunnels linked to the chasm, we shouldn't suffocate anytime soon" He kept searching for something in the various small cabinets laid all around. "How do you know that? Is it too dark to see anything?" I started getting closer towards the edge that separated us from the rest of the place we got to. "Stop" He said as he revealed a pipe with some engravings on it. "What's that in your hand?" I asked before covering my eyes to protect my eyes from the rays of light it shut to my eyes. Almost blinded by it, I lost my balance and fell on my back, almost falling off the edge. With my head almost away from it, I saw the lighted place that I almost fell in, a giant twenty feet drop that would seriously injure me on the way down. "Not again" He said before pulling me back up. "You almost killed me with that thing, put it down before you blind me with it. ""I'm sorry, I didn't intend to do that. "Getting closer, I could see why she was so annoyed, another inconvenience as we were far from the ground, sitting on the giant bomb itself. Moans could be heard coming from down there, we were not alone anymore. "What was that?" "I heard it too but you needn't worry, as it's just a harmless side effect that came after I've done what had to be done in order to save both of us. ""What are you talking about?" "I'll tell you once we're down there" With that pipe in his mouth, he started climbing down, the coils were in his reach too, acting as vines he could swing on. The ground appeared and disappeared under with the swinging flashes of light revealing it before he eventually got there. A rough landing and not much to see but him flashing the light back at me. "Come down here, the weather is fine" He said whilst waiting for me to come. "I don't know if I can make it that far, I've never climbed anything in my life except my mother's womb. ""It will be fine, I promise, just think of the coils as the umbilical cord and you'll be down here in no time. "He mustered, seemingly getting ready to lose his patience. "Will you catch me if I fall then?" "We'll see. Now come on already, or else I'll leave you there. ""All right then. "Shouldn't be that dangerous, he made it without being able to see anything. With one foot down, followed by the other, I turned around and grabbed the edge, lowering myself down. I grabbed the same coil and felt some sweat left by him on the way down, almost slipping away, I embraced the entire coil with my whole body and slide down. Slowed down only by my two legs that were constantly pushing on the sphere so I wouldn't go too fast. Another moan came in front of me but it didn't make sense as it came directly from the bomb. "Finally, you're here. "He said when I reached him. Not long until I would get back to civilisation I hoped, but I didn't turn up immediately. The bomb kept moaning, unexpected and out of the ordinary, I asked him about it. "Why is it wailing?" "I only did what had to be done. "He pardoned himself before going ahead, leaving a trail of light for me to follow. "Wait a second, it's alive. We can't live it like this, it's in pain" Right behind him, I plead for him to stop and check it out, what he said before I must've missed. "It should be dead soon enough, not that it was any of my responsibility to begin with. ""How can you act so indifferent to everything that's been happening so far?" I asked Phaer, hoping that at least now he would be truthful to me, instead, I received something else. "Well Genevie, how can you?" "I'm not indifferent. "I told him as the flying dust and the chunked rocks floated in front of the light. Nothing could be seen in the deserted place but what could I expect from a limited vision. "I'm really not. "I wasn't indifferent and the lack of replies he left me made me even more unsettled. "I can't be indifferent. Would you, at least, stop teasing me with the silence?" Whilst rubbing my forearm and breathing on his back, I tried distracting myself from it by watching the desolated plain land we walked on. Safe to say that it didn't last long, not long enough. What did I do wrong?" Look, If I indeed do something wrong, I'm sorry about it. "He stopped right there. Pointing his light to a tunnel we arrived at. "Is that. . . ?" I asked before he interrupted me to finish my sentence. "A mine tunnel. Or at least, it used to be. Would you be so kind to turn that lever over there?" The light was now pointed at it but I failed to see the point of it. "Why would I do that?" I asked before going on. "And why is there a mine tunnel so deep under the ground?" "The reason behind it is unimportant, could you just oblige for once without questioning it?" "You will owe me an explanation after I'm done with it. "The lever was rusted, even wet despite the lack of any visible source of water. And even with its strange appearance, I managed to pull it downwards with much ease. A light appeared in the tunnel, then another one. They kept popping out, leaving the appearance of a mighty depth that laid forth in front of us. I didn't want to manipulate her, just like I did with Sam but it's been so long since I've had an assistant. "I'm confused Phaer. "I told him as we made our way in. The mine didn't seem like it had any type of ore anymore, just the wind that passed through the various passages, sounding like suppressed screams. "What troubles you this time? " "Well, except that I was practically forced to come here with you, to see people die and. Not feel anything about it. "I looked in a different direction so he wouldn't be able to stare through my eyes. "How come you said you could lead me out but instead we're going into a mine?" "Patience girl, this isn't a mine anymore, it's been shaped to lead us closer to something. Everything you'll encounter down here was shaped at one point of their lifetime. " "By who? " "By what. "The ceiling had a few particles of salt drop down on my hair. It was white enough even without, not to mention that the water that came with it wasn't drinkable. So much more to cover and so much more to walk. "Alas" I said after seeing a railroad, which meant I was on the right track. "What are you so happy about?" "Oh you'll see when we get there, don't you worry. "This didn't seem safe anymore but I had no other choice, he seemed to know where we're going and I doubt I could make it to the surface on my own. "Ah. "I said whilst pretending to fall down from a small accident. Just as I thought he didn't seem to care at first. Luckily for me as I grabbed the rock I saw before and shoved it down my pants. Under the belt, right before he turned to see me pretending to dangle with my shoe laces. He must've gone too far without noticing my breath that he decided to turn around to face me. "I'm fine, just making a minor adjustment. "He didn't look at me but somewhere else, did he notice what I've done then? I couldn't betray my look and reveal what I did, if he hasn't said anything, I wouldn't spoil it so soon. "Do you mind getting up then? There's no time to spare now, the fumes could harm us if we keep slowing down. "I got up as fast as possible, without being entertained by the idea of what might he be talking about. "What fumes?" Alarmed, I got closer so we could hurry up and get out of the mine. "This isn't a normal mine anymore, you see those formations there?" First time I got to see them in person too, pulsating parasites, even uglier than described in the old lexicon. They almost blended with the wood and with the stones yet they were still too predictable in their nature. "Why is it dripping water out of it?" "They feed on the salt and in exchange they spit out desalinated water. People of the old used to use them to get clean water before benefiting of the machinery we have today. " "So what happened to them?" "Let's just say that those parasites aren't the most evolved species. You see, they don't really notice the difference between normal fluid and water that has salt in it. "As we just passed one of them, sprinkling its numerous eyes at me, and vibrating its feelers at me, the same ones that were shoved inside the stone. "You mean. . . " "Yes Genevie, that's right. They sucked them dry leaving nothing but dehydrated dry organs on their bones. If they were that lucky for such thing. "The way he told me gave me a general uneasiness of what laid even farther in the dark. "Wait. "I said whilst wondering. "Does that mean that they spat out the blood the same way they did with the water?" "You're really getting the hang of it. "Not scared but uneasy, I kept looking everywhere, afraid that they would jump at me if I wasn't safe enough. He must've noticed it too as he said it out loud. "Don't worry, they only attach themselves to wicked people" As he left out a giggle soon after, the first one that I've heard since we met. It left a bitter taste in my mouth. "I wasn't serious by the way. I doubt they have the cognitive ability to feel such a thing. I'm also sure they'd attach themselves to any source of water. ""You're not making it better Phaer. Ouch. "My lips got bitten and my nose closer to his shoulder, almost broken too. "Why did you stop so abruptly?" He turned around and gave me only a menacingly look. Past him, there was nothing but a formation of rocks that stood as the foundation of the next tunnel that seemed to lead to a system of rails. I was able to see so many of them, not so far from us, too bad for us that we didn't have a mine cart to ride on, though. "So. "I looked back at him without understanding why did we stop in the first place, surely he didn't like about the fumes. "Why aren't we moving?" "We have a minor problem we have to take care off" He said whilst placing his hands over my shoulders. "What are you talking about? And why are you grabbing my shoulders?" "Genevie, I'm holding you because of the way you reacted before when I pointed at that parasite. ""I still don't get it. ""You stared long enough past me, what did you see?" Genevie pondered at my question without moving a muscle. "Some rocks, rails, and the path that probably leads us out of the mine. . "I coughed after. The air must've gotten thicker. "Those aren't rocks Genevie. ""Then what are they. Phaer? Oh. . "Her eyes doubled and I could see that she wanted to scream. "Not now, we need to get rid of them. "One of my hands got taken back as I had to use it to block any of them vital substances I lost whilst coughing myself after her. "But. . They are so many of them""Don't breath that fast girl, it will do you more harm than them. ""What's your plan them?" I asked him as he trusted me enough not to explode whilst away from his sight. He seemed to be good at doing that. "Wait. ""What was that?" He asked me, surprised too as it came out of nowhere. "Nothing, it's nothing, just get back to dealing with this. And hurry, my lungs can't handle much more of it. "I tried hiding it away but thought about it behind his back. Did he bring me here to use me as a scapegoat to get past those things? He used Paul before for an occasion like this one. Slowly backing down so he wouldn't notice, I knew that I was able to outrun him, I remembered how slow he was back in the station. With a helpful distraction, I knew I could make it back, but which one? Ugh, I looked around to see other parasites that weren't so active like the ones before. This place must be crawling with them. Nothing I could use, except the light bulb above us, the last one being miles away from us. Nothing to break it with. Well, nothing but. "Genevie, I might have something in mind but It, they're too many to get rid off" He coughed it out, still without a clue what to do, or, at least, that's what he let me know. "It's okay, we could go back at any time. ""No. "There was no way for us to go back, not the way we came from anyway. So I let her know about it, or at least, I was about to. A crack, a spark and a clink. The light was out. "What the. . . ? "I let it go out of my mouth whilst unable to see anything. I took out my flashing stick and turned around to see her run. "Wait, Genevie. "Another cough left my mouth, followed by some blood, almost flooding my mouth on its way out. Some of the drops reached the stick and left a red tint on the light. I had to get out and find another way to go on, perhaps even catch up to her. The hunt was on and I started following in her path, knowing that she wouldn't take the various passages and risk suffocating inside here. Hopefully, she didn't act rashly, too many people died for the lack of a better judgement. Speaking of which. "You shouldn't have ran away, I'm not your enemy. "Genevie laid there, crying on the floor with a parasite right over her shin, judging by its size it was big, even for its species. "Get it of me, I don't want to. . ""Stop sobbing, it's not even alive. "I said it before brushing it off her leg. The air that came from outside wasn't cleaner but it wasn't toxic either, not for my lungs anyway. "We both need each other in order to get out of this. Can we trust each other from now on? Please?" With a hand, she started wiping her tears but not before kicking the remains of that parasite away from his body. With the other hand, she accepted my trust and helped herself up. "Wait. "She said, as I almost made my way out of the mine, stopping at her call. "But where are we going now?" "Don't worry about it, there are other ways to go, hopefully, we will find one that isn't as inhabited as this one. "She nodded and came. Before that, I got closer and shut down the lever with all of the lights that were in the mine. She didn't question my decision and, somehow I knew that she saw some of the skeletons that were dug, not so deep inside where we were. Genevieve saw her fair share, more than she let me know, perhaps my decision to not share everything with her wasn't unfounded. "Is that?" "Unfortunately for us, it might take a while for it to take its last breath. ""You said it won't live too far off but from the sounds I'm hearing it's clearly suffering" If she only knew how much farther from the truth she was. "There, it seems like we have another way in. ""We can't go and leave it like that""We did it before and we're going to do it again Genevieve, now. The path towards our freedom lays forth that way, but if I were you I'd follow. After all, my absence might bring darkness with it and you don't want to be alone when that happens. "A threat in disguise and I knew that she didn't know better. Time after time I showed her what would happen if she didn't listen, perhaps, this time, she finally understood. "How can I know that you didn't pick yet another tunnel that would lead towards a dead end just to silence me?" She asked whilst flabbergasted, a strange look on her face too, quite bizarre even for her at this point judging by the moods she went through. "You can't be certain about it and I presume you didn't even need a response for that. ""No, I did not. I quite changed my mind about you, a blank new start if you will. "She was unpredictable at this point, I didn't face her but kept in mind the fact that she was plotting something again. Her intentions unsure, her true meaning hidden and I didn't think it would evolve into a problem. "No light system here?" She asked after not finding anything to switch over. "I can't see one either. It would seem like we would only come to rely on this little fellow for now. ""What was that?" "I said that our only light source is this little device I'm holding. "And it did manage to make a part of the path we were on readable. A lot tighter than the last mine but no signs of any toxic gas or parasites. "That's what I thought I've heard too. . ""Careful there. . "I said whilst holding one of the planks above us. "You should move under my arm before it's too late. I'm not sure how much longer I can keep this up. ""What happened?" Behind me, she was clueless that I was standing between our way further into the tunnel and a cave in. "The moment I let go of this, it will fall. Come, this might be our last way in" He almost left a grunt before yielding the sentence, leaving enough space for me to pass to the other side. "Wait, but what if it's a dead end?" "We can't spend more time going to wild chases, we have to risk it and fast!" "You need to rethink it, I don't know if. . . "Interrupted by another grunt of his, the pain he left was made even more obvious. What laid above, now his shoulder, must be incredibly heavy to be able to push itself down onto him like that. "You said we could trust each other. . . Well, now it's your chance. "This might not be the best call made but it won't be the last one either, I was sure of that. Dashing right under my arm, she went beyond me. Finally, I released it, just in time to get out of the way and see how the way we went through got stuck by rocks and the broken plank that once held its foundation. The flash stick laid next to me on the ground, producing just the right amount of light to be reflected by the rocks back to me. "Can we go now? I'm really getting tired of all of this. ""Sure, just give me an ounce. "Strange, I've never seen rocks like the ones before me, such a distinct surface, such a reflexion. "You know, I might not be able to wait for you, we didn't come here to look at shiny rocks. ""Just a minute, I only need to take one. "A small one should make a fine sample, too much would be a waste, not that I could take any other from the well-cemented stack. My bag still onto me, almost empty too, it was the perfect place for it to be placed in. "You don't mind this do you?" "Playing with your rocks I presume?" Whilst nodding her head, the valiant breath she exhaled was visible in the light I pointed towards her as I got ready to resume our journey.

"Do you think there will be other cave-ins?" She asked whilst sliding her way through the passage that got even tighter than before. At this point, we weren't in a crafted mine but a naturally formed cave. But why would someone stop here with the mine? "I doubt there will be any more of them, there ain't enough space. "With my flash stick in my mouth, I lead the way, in front of her and in full force I kept moving. It wouldn't be too far in that we'd get to barely be able to crawl between. "It's getting hard to breathe again. Phaer, I don't like where this is going" "Buckle up, we're almost there, any minute now. ""You've been saying that for minutes, yet so far, nothing but your rear and darkness ahead. ""There!" I told her after seeing the same system of rails that I saw before. I knew we would end up getting here one way or another. "I don't know what you're talking about. ""Just be careful and stay close. That's all you need to know" But again, one of the long rails, structured and supported on timber pylons, leading to a crack in the cave. With no purpose whatsoever, it was built by someone with the intent to get here and at the same time, it wasn't. I was the first one to get out of the crack, the light left behind me, just as I closed my flash stick. The way was illuminated by a dim light. "Stay close, like I said before. . . "She followed, shaking on her feet. "Such a long way down there. . . At least, the light is nice. "Illuminated by glowing teal rocks, somehow it didn't warm me with the long drop that would certainly get to ruin us, perhaps even deeper than the fall from where we started. So many rails, and even with the constant drops the metal didn't get any rust on it. I was a bit afraid of the height we were on but at least I was sure that if we were to fall, we'd land onto one of the many other railroads that were stacked under us. Speaking of which. "Why are there so many of them in here?" "They must've done a lot of digging. ""Not really what I had in mind. "This place must've taken a lot to be constructed. "Such a waste isn't it?" I told Phaer whilst looking around at the gorgeous formations of rock, after all, there weren't enough opportunities for me to check such wonders out. "Indeed, it is, but that's life Genevie, we move on once they're no longer useful to us. Everything will be abandoned at one point, it's inevitable. ""Then, how come you haven't moved on from that light tube that you've held before? It looks quite old to me, by your standards anyway. ""It reminds me of my brother. "He tucked it deeper and made sure it laid safer in his pocket, right as he said that. "I'm sorry to hear that. "The echoes, despite being slightly audible at first, kicked it later, as we ventured deeper, closer to another tunnel in the vast system. "What was that?" Knowing it but doing otherwise, I looked down and saw something huge, dashing through one of the rails.

Like nothing I've seen before and so fast that I was surprised that I noticed it soon after. "Phaer, what was that? Please tell me I wasn't the only one who saw it. ""You weren't. I don't know but. . . "There's no way that anything would survive in a place like this after so many years, not without sustenance anyway. Both of us started moving faster but there was still a long way to go until we arrive at the next part. And the holes where the tunnels lead were quite enormous. "There it is. "Again it went, on the rails. I wasn't sure how much she was able to see but I thought I saw its metallic armour and an almost cylindrical form. "Wait. "I said and stopped with her. This wasn't the time to rush, especially since we didn't know what laid ahead of us. "I don't know why but it might come directly in front of us. We need to track its movement and see what we can do after. ""Are you sure it's a good idea to stop in the middle of the road?" "If new options come, you'll be the first I'll let know. Until then, let me come with a plan of action. "How could he be so chatty, now at all times but not when we met. He has the strangest moments to decide to interact with me. "You know, it's quiet around here when nothing's moving" "There it is again. Let's follow it" He said with a glimpse and a spark in his eyes. "Let's what now?" She asked in return, just as the giant flew through the trails, sparking all around with static electricity. As he bent over, ready to fall over another set of rails that wasn't too high from us. "Come on, it will be exciting. " "Okay, now I'm sure you've lost it old man. Not that before it wasn't so obvious but you know. . "And, after holding two bars in my hands, ready to flow through the air, I landed on the next track successfully. "You're next, from what I've seen it shouldn't come from here anymore. " "Are you sure about it?" "I wouldn't stay where you're at now if I were you Genevie. "Before having to decide that, I chose to look forward at the end of the tunnel. Going alone didn't end up well the last time and perhaps we had more chances if we worked together, at least, that's what I thought. "Fine, but If I'm breaking something again, it's on you. "She joined me soon after and we were still scouting the place. "Again, it went there" I pointed at it, another side track that leads further down into the catacombs. "I didn't sign up for spelunking, have I? " "No, you didn't but, this is far more intriguing than that. "Whilst saying that she noticed it too, again with a dash, its third time going through the same track, breaking and chunking some wood in its lead. "I think I know where this is going" "Come on Genevie, I think it's trying to lead us somewhere, why else would it wait for us like that? Can't you see that's going in circles?" "Must've been ten or more dashes and I still couldn't see anything but the dust left behind. "I'm not sure you're interpreting it correctly. " "Just keep at it" With each jump, a surge of adrenaline followed. I was so scared each time, just as my boots made contact with the iron, that one of those times I would end up slipping. "Not many of them are left and we'll be there" "Are you sure about it? It could still be trying to trap us. Plus, you're letting your excitement get the best of you. " "I'm not doing any of such thing. But it's been too long since I've been on an adventure. So forgive me if I'm not giving these old bones a rest. "Another track soon fell under our bottoms, right next to the charges of the metallic fiend guiding us through the maze we were in. I doubt that any of the other tunnels actually lead to somewhere, they'd serve as mere pathways for it to guide us through. "Is that the last one?" "Just three others ahead but we could see far below, one last track that laid there, above the spiked bottom. "No sign of it anymore, so that must be it. "We jumped from railroad to railroad, no complaint and with enough care that we wouldn't fall as of yet. We were standing on the road before the last one, just moments before we would get to the path leading it forward into the formation we were in. Before doing so we didn't move and watched as beyond us, in the hole that was made inside the great mountain, a set of features could be seen covered in the darkness. It was waiting for us to move forward but no closer than a few miles. Something was blowing steam from there, getting visibly hotter with each second we waited. "Let's not push our luck, okay Genevie?" "I'm not doing anything, it's not like I'm the one who wants to go there and have dinner with it. " "Shall we continue then? I doubt this will be the last time we'll meet anyway. " "Aren't you going to say ladies first? After all, it's our last jump" She asked with a grin on her face, quite macabre with the gigantic cylinder that could run us over if we didn't hurry. "Let's just go at the same time. "I said whilst making my way down there with her. "That should be the path, there doesn't seem to be another way on the other side. "I told her as we both got there. We kept moving towards it, looking at how much we missed. The metal rails became crystal like as we went on and no reflection on them. "Listen Phaer?" She asked me as we advanced, not slipping even once, despite how the rails now looked like. "Spit it out. "Close to me and no more shaking, we entered the tunnel towards where we got lead to. "Am I the only one who noticed how well those rails were placed, almost as if someone wanted us to jump from one another?And not only that but. . . "She was reluctant but I knew what she was trying to say. "Yes, these rails would actually be placed directly under the ones from the surface world. ""So I'm really not the only one who noticed that. Well, more or less of what you said"With my created light I shine through the hole and saw a gate standing there. And in front of it. "Stop"A rough voice came to be and the need for my light was no longer feasible. Another source laminated it all, a lamp of some sort revealed the vast room before us, still blocked by the gate that was guarded by the shielded guard. Such a costume he held, almost like a thick armor around it. And I could only find out that he was human after he spoke, everything that I judged before that made me think it was some kind of underground shelled fish. Those holes in the costume and the small mountains behind his back must be for air. "I said stop!"He spoke again after she only moved her hands. Both of us were slightly intimidated that we didn't say anything at first. It wasn't as much of his voice but of his enormous spear with dulled spiked teeth attached to it. They must've been melted into the spear since they seemed to be made out of a metal, nothing that I've ever seen anywhere in my journeys. "What do you seek strangers?""I think it's talking to you"She whispered in my ear, luckily for her that she was behind me and he didn't notice her, nor did he hear that well. I didn't want to venture into something I didn't know and at the moment, whatever that thing was, it was fixed onto him. He won't mind, I was sure of it, that only a single push would help him. "Go get him"I whispered again to him before pushing him forth. Being pushed made the guard switch to its vigilance, raising its spear at any sign of thread, which I made obvious with the unwanted stance I was pushed into. "Wait. I mean no harm. "He noted my words but didn't back down. "Strange, your mouth says a thing but your body betrays that. "How could I explain to him that I felt nervous from being pushed into this awkward situation?"Look, I'm only trying to advance. I'm just an old man. With his daughter, trying to get to safety"So this was his plan?I had to act up too so he wouldn't appear even more suspicious. "Yes, please sir. I and my dear, old, poor old father are seeking refuge. You surely can't deny our request can you?"There was no way for us to read his face expression from that thick mask so we had to wait for its response. At this point, Genevie was closer than ever to me, assimilating my plot and hoping too that we'd get our chance to get over it. "I will let you pass. "Simple words that made her smile and gave me hope that we wouldn't be forced to go back, not that we'd have a chance even if we chose to do it. "But there's a toll that must be paid in order for you to get through the city""City?""City?!"We both said surprised, surely I wasn't the only one who didn't know about the existence of a city. "I want to see the city!"Genevie told the guard with no ponder. Though, the sight of such a place would intrigue me in any case. "Hold on Genevie, we still don't know what's the toll we have to pay for him to let us in. And keep in mind that our choices are limited. ""Don't worry, I'm sure that it can't be that big, can it? "The guard simmered down , hiding his spear inside his cloak, quite spacious as it disappeared inside. "Well it's quite simple now, the fee I inquire from you isn't something you can directly give. ""What does that even mean?"She asked, brushing me aside and getting closer to the unarmed guard. "It's an old tradition that must be kept before you enter our town you see. A verdict must be passed down onto the two of you. Both of your souls will stay here at the gates while your bodies gain access to the side soon to lay before you if you make that choice. ""We can't give you our souls, that's not how it works. "He didn't have the power to do that, I was sure. More important is what did Phaer think about it, though I was sure that he also shared the same thought as I did. "So you'll let us pass after you do your thing?" Quite confident the old one, not like the other visitors that passed the great hall. "Very well. If you decided to pay the fee, you do better remember later. If you even decide to come back to take it back, it will wait for you here among the others. But not many decide to come back once they get past the gate. "And the other souls buried for generations laid guarded by me and my ancestors, as their guardianship doesn't end, not even after death. "Sounds fine to me, we're already late as it is. ""Wait a minute Phaer" Grabbed aside, she didn't agree with what I said, meaning that she held her belief quite staggeringly high. "What are you thinking? We can't just give our souls and. . . He said that people who go through there never come back, which means that they don't even get their souls back. ""Listen Genevie, there's no such thing as souls. It's just some spewed nonsense to cover up the hard truth. ""Oh like you would know. "Quite stubborn in the way she said it too. "As I was saying. Even if there is such a thing as a soul, I doubt this man can take it. I mean, just look at him, he's wearing some sort of tribal armor. We'll be fine. ""But what if we aren't? What's the alternative to not going through with it?" I turned around and watched through the silent cove that we left behind, before turning back to her. "I think you know the answer to that question. "Obliged to do such a heinous act, I surrendered and. "I accept. "She said it loud and decisive despite thinking about it contrary. "Quite anxious are we?" "Yes, we are Phaer, now could you let us go through?" The guard approached us and made a motion with his hands, something as if he grabbed the air in front of us. One second in and it was already over. "Done, the fee has been paid. ""Wait? "Genevie asked confused. "Was that all? I mean no fancy moves, no incantations of some sort, not even a praise to your underground fallen lord or something?" "Genevie, I wasn't aware you dealt so much into the occult that you've become an expert on it. ""Ehm" He cleared his throat, most likely from all the dust acquired in the confined suit. "It's done now, your entry has been paid for. And remember, you may come back at any time to claim your souls if you decide to do so. The gates are now open for you. "A small ray of light, brighter than the one we had in the room came through the slightly opened door. It screamed for us to come in. "I didn't feel anything, have you?" "No, I didn't. Though, I really hope he won't charge our souls for rent whilst we're gone. ""Really not feeling up to it now. "He said whilst trying to hide the smirk under his thick beard. "Don't worry, I saw that. "The gate was soon opened entirely and the light was almost blinding. Nothing could be seen so far but we were pushed to the other side. And as the brightness finally toned down. "Am I dreaming?" She asked exactly what I was thinking after coming into contact with it. Such structure and architecture I have not seen before. And people lived in it. "Is that a house made out of a damn locomotive?" A steam one too, covered in bricks to make out for the missing parts. Everything around the town looked like that, houses bricked out, held together with rails and wood, pillars from above. Another one had a furnace connected to it, enough to warm it up, looking quite familiar too. The one Genevie was particularly looking at had a giant clock that wound up on it. "It doesn't work anymore, does it?" She asked right before looking at the people who lived inside the town. "They look just like us, but how can it be?" "I'm not sure either, judging from their looks and the vestments they're wearing, scrapped out from what they could most likely find from above, they've must have gotten a few generations in here. ""But how did they survive?" Curious too on that. "Look, a farm right there. It would seem that our questions could be answered just by looking at them from above. "And quite high we were, a few blocks away from them, unnoticed so far. "Umm Phaer?" "Wait a minute

now, I'm still trying to see how much did they scavenge from our resources""Phaer, I think that kid noticed us.

""What are you talking about?"I looked all around, trying to find out the point of interest but didn't manage to find anyone directly looking for us. She grabbed my head and turned it around and there I saw her. "Oh not, they've noticed me, lower me down, now!"I yelled at both of them and got dropped down the house.

"Augh""Bah""Gahhh"We all fell down on the floor, getting hurt even more. "Next time, I'm the one standing on top.

""So what did you see Lore?""Well. . "I fiddle my fingers in emotion. "You guys won't believe this""Is it about the Harstmen?Because I've already told you they're not real. ""They are real, I've seen them walk around that town"Such a liar. Not even once. "No, you didn't. "Said Sher while fiddling her hair. "Yes, I did it. Well, perhaps I shouldn't tell you any more. "Little Tom remained silent the whole time we were talking, I wonder if at least he believed me. "No, you did not see them. If you don't stop lying I'll. I'll tell our mother what you said. ""No, don't do it. "Whilst holding our smaller brother by the hand and with her blue teddy bear in the other, she started walking downstairs. "Wait, Sher please don't do it. Just hold on a minute"Right behind her, I couldn't reach her. If she got to mom, who knows what could happen, I didn't want to get grounded again. "Okay, this is your last warning"She had the distance but not yet, I managed to grab hold of some placed after I ripped them out of a vase. And she came back to her senses when she saw me with it in my hand. "Lore, what are you planning to do with that in your hand?""Guess what""Listen, Lore, as your bigger sister, I'm in charge to take care of. Well, both of you as a matter of fact. So, as your bigger sister, I'm telling you to put that dirty plant down. ""Or else what?""Or else, I will have some more things to tell mother about. ""No one likes a tattletale. "She places her hands on her forehead and rubbed it. "Are you fine?Did something happen to your head?""No, nevermind it, it's nothing. "She said as she started making her way down the stairs. I quickly followed her right before I released the flowers on the ground since they were no longer of good use. "Sher, come on. Are you still going to tell mommy about it?""No, I'm not, it's her day off after all. I don't like disturbing it on days like these. "As she reached the first floor, they both stopped to wait for me. "Well, do you still want to know what I saw out there?""Spit it out, I think junior is hungry. ""I saw new people coming to join us. ""Aham. "Quite the nuisance she was, my little sister, but she always had the most sincere faces in some situations. "Well, that's nice. Having a nice imagination just like your sister had at your age, right?""What?"I scaffolded, almost managing to pinch an ear in the process. "I meant that you remind me of myself when I was at your age. ""Oh. Wait, did you also see new people and harstmen when you were at my age?"She asked with a smile on her face that was trifled only by the highlight in her eyes. "No, I wasn't. . "The doorknob flinched, someone at the door. "Who is it?"I asked from afar, questioning who was there at this hour. No answer. "I asked, who is it"Again, not answer, right as it flinched again. "I don't like this. "Lore said whilst grabbing me from behind, holding my hand and the teddy bear. Neither was Tom too happy as he shook and tried covering his eyes with my thick dress. "Where is mother when you need her?"I asked myself, in the right, the living room, where she would usually sleep on the soft spot, she wasn't there. She must've left momentarily, leaving me alone to take care of my siblings whilst gone. Not a good decision. Knock knock from behind the door, no windows to see the floor. "Are you. Are you going to answer?"She asked from behind me, blowing cold air directly on my skin. "Mom, is that you?"I asked again but no answer. "Lore, take Tom and get him to your room and don't open the door until I tell you, okay?""I don't want to do that. I'm afraid. "She said, gripping tighter to my dress. Tom started crying too. "Hush there Tom, it's going to be okay. "I said while shards of cold air kept coming from under the door. She came closer to him and handed over the bear before going closer to their rooms. "Are you sure about this Sher?" Lore asked with a tear in her eye, the worst sign you could get, but my family's safety came first before all. "I'll be fine, I'll join both of you after, okay? Just keep our little brother safe. ""Okay. Big sister. "I waited for them to be long gone, away from my sight, directly above me before turning back to the possible threat. Nothing like this happened before. The knob quickly twitched, even worse than before, someone was trying to desperately get in and I didn't know who. "I've got no quarrel with you, please just leave us alone. "The door started being slammed and pushed inside. I had no idea what I could do, never been thought what to do. Approaching it helped me hear better. No longer was it bashed and something clicked inside the keyhole. "It should be open right. . . "What was that? A voice from behind came and said that. "Now" The door opened and almost set me aside when two people came inside. I was speechless as they closed the door and blocked it. Both strangely dressed and didn't even notice that this was no house of their belonging. Too afraid to speak, I tried backing away hoping that they wouldn't notice or hurt me. "Oh hello there little girl" The strange woman approached me, smiling despite breaking inside the house. "Don't be scared, we're not here to harm you. "I stopped, trying to find the courage to talk to her. Even the way she spoke was in a funny way, it extended so much from what she held. "Hi. . . "With crumbs in my throat I spoke at loud, trying to not give it away what I feared. Bent over to reach my height, she stared at me, face to face. I could feel her air holders releasing all that air on me, that's how close she stood. "I told you there's nothing to be afraid of. "She continued with a smirk on her face. "Drop the act, she's dead scared of you. "The older man spoke too, with a rawboned voice, cracking right before ending what he was trying to muffle. Huh. I didn't notice it but both of them sure didn't speak too loud. "What makes you think that? This little cupcake with her hand sewed dress looks too cute to be scared. "I was too distracted by what she said that I didn't get to see her lay a hand on my shoulder, uncomfortably so. Her nails were coloured too, with a bright red, not at all like any of the ones I've seen before. Everything about her was different from the other people from around. Who was she? My fear became curiosity as she didn't appear to want to hurt me. "Who. Ehm. Who are you?" I finally managed to ask her. "Well, my name is Genevie Levy the third. Though I'd say I'm one of a kind if you ask me. And who might you be young lady?" A blush quickly filled me and I looked away before introducing myself. "My name is. "Before I could finish, something could be heard from outside. "That can wait, we need to hide Genevie. "The man approached me and fend her off for a second before getting closer to me. "Listen, girl, if people come here to ask anything, you're going to tell them you haven't seen anyone, okay?" "I. . . umm" "I've already blocked the front door so I'm sure that they won't just barge in uncalled. After they settle down, we'll leave and it will feel like nothing even happened. ""But why are you here?" I asked them surprised as I was so highly approached by them. "Well, we're kind of outsiders, and not in a good way. I still can't adjust to the fact that our souls got taken. ""Genevie, focus. Girl, we only need a few moments to stay until they settle down, we'll leave soon after. ""And don't worry about him, I'll keep an eye on him so he doesn't break anything. Though he proved himself to be quite good at it. "The fuming and the craving could be heard much more from outside. The townsfolk were approaching. "I think you could stay. Just don't touch anything and. Don't tell my mother. Actually don't meet my mother. Wait. ""We won't tell a soul. Mostly because ours got take and probably others got taken too but that's questionable from what Phaer told me. " "Wait, where are you going?" He fled past me, heading towards the spot where my sister was.

"We're heading up missy, up to the roof, from where I saw you the first time. "

Genevie explained it to me as she made her way up too, which meant she confused me with my sister. "Hold on a second, I didn't say you could freely roam around the house!"

I tried stopping them but they were too fast. Another knock came from the door and at the same time, I could hear my sister from upstairs. Both were alone with them unattended by me, but I could hear a crowd of people ready to run through the door and the house. "What next?" I thought. Why weren't our parents here to deal with this? I heard so many shouts coming from outside that I wanted to stop them from opening the door. Closed beyond the lock. What now? The cold wind wasn't there anymore, the handle almost burned my hand as I held it in my hand. I backed away and started blowing on it but it left some scars on it. Is that. Is that? Is that smoke? Coming from below, it made me cough, right as the bright yellow curtains from around the door changed their colour to a brighter one. Flames burst right after, replacing them to amber, starting to spread. I couldn't focus on what was outside as the smoke was intoxicating, blurring my vision and banging through my ears. Sweat started running through my body and the only thing I could think about was. "Thomas, Lore" They were in danger too, I climbed my way to them, unable to walk on the stairs. Mother was nowhere to be seen, nowhere to help us. "Sher" She yelled at the top of the stairs whilst holding a wet cloth on little Tom's mouth. "Good Thinking. " I muttered, sweating and barely breathing through the clouded air between us. She left him and got close to hold me up. "What are you doing? Don't leave him alone" He was unwatched and ready to fall at any moment, what was she thinking? "He's fine, see?" She muttered too, I could see that it was affecting her even more than it did on me. How much could her lungs take? "Tom, I can't believe you're fine. " As we reached I said it, before hugging him and holding the cloth even closer to his nose. "Keep it this way, or you'll fall asleep. " The fire reached the bottom of the stairs, a bright red and yellow ate through our house, making faces and threatening to eat us with it. "I'm afraid Sher, what do we do?" "I. . " "There was no way out of there, everything was locked except the exit through the roof. "Come on, we can get up through the roof. "The smoke almost got through every crack inside the house and it wouldn't be too much until the foundation got set on fire too. I could barely move, holding both my sister and my brother by hand. No, I might've "broken my leg on the way here. ""Wait, can we fix it?" "Not here, later. "It got heavier for me to walk and see, burning through my chest and feet. The hand I held Lore with brought so much pain for me to handle. "Sher, I can't breath. ""Hold on, we're almost there" I said while going through the passageway, closer to it too. The cloth under his mouth was raggy by now, the water was no longer in it. And those two strangers that entered our house were nowhere to be seen. "Tede" Tom spoke, dropping both the rag and the teddy bear he held in his hand before we got closer to the roof. "We can't get it now, we're almost out. "Neither could I do it, the flames almost reached us, smiles and dimes came out of them, wanting us to join them even more. Coughing its disgusting smoke under us. After they were in, I closed the door and threw mother's mannequin in front of it. She was here after all. "Mommy. "Lore yelled but I stopped her from trying to grab it. "We can't take her with us, we have to get out before it's too late. Bam and pokes from below, cracks and thunders as the flames and the fumes got closer to where we were. I tried explaining to her that after we were done, I would come back and grab mother. She believed me. "Now, hold Tom and don't let go whilst I open the door above us. "The box under it was heavy, I was afraid that it would fall and the whole area under with it.

"What?" I stuttered at the sight. Just as I got up, I punched and punched, trying to get it open. "Sher, what's happening?" With a sad voice, she said, watching with Tom at my feeble attempts to open it. But it was stuck, we were stuck here. "This cannot be. It worked before, hasn't it?" "Sher, the funny lady and the musky man went through" "What?" I asked, enraged at what she said. My fists were almost red, extending the pain to the scar I had. "Why didn't you stop them?" Almost yelling at her, just as the smoke started coming through the planks we stood on. "Sher, you're scaring me" "Don't you understand what's going on? If we can't go through, we're going to die. "The closed space didn't leave me enough room to breathe so I started spitting air out of my mouth. She started crying, making him follow her intent. "Your tears won't put off the fire, you little. . . "My tongue was frozen, something behind the door kept trying to eat through it. "Not now" I got back at trying to bash my way in. "Genevie, come on, we need to jump now. ""Hold on a second, is the house on fire?" We still waited atop of it, just for the right moment that we wouldn't get seen and followed again. "Yes, the smoke just reached us, why?" He wanted to go but I heard something that helped me remember something that happened a while ago. It hit me then. "Wait, Phaer, the children. ""What? "He placed a rock atop of the way we came through, blocking the only exit they would've had. "What's wrong with you?" I confronted him again, this time, there was no way for him to avoid it. "We should go now before they turn back. ""No, not until I help those children get out. "The rock was heavy but I managed to push it away from the slab. "Fine, I guess this is where our paths split Genevie. ""You'll come to regret this Phaer" But he already jumped and made his way atop of the houses aligned to one another, not even hearing what I've said. Not even thinking another second about their and my safety. I opened the slab, pulling it out in its entirety. The first thing I noticed is that she was bleeding out of her hands and crying on them. "Give me your hand, I'll pull you up. ""No, please get my sister and brother first" She muffled as smoke came through the hole. Moments passed as she made a sign for them to come and she handed me over her smaller brother, lighter on the waist. After getting him and placing him on my side, she pushed her sister too, screaming as her wounds caught up with her. Both of them near me, crying and waiting for their sister to come. The fire was not only advancing but soon to burn whatever was left of the house we stood on. "It's your turn" I told her as she looked at me from below, shaking with her arms. "I can't, it hurts too much" "So what?" I asked with utmost sincerity on my face. "If you don't give me your hands, you're going to burn alive. Not to mention that we might too if we wait too long" The fire got closer, it wouldn't be too far until it would get to run through her feet. "Don't let go. "She said whilst handing them to me. A shout of pain came right after I lifted her up, bleeding even more out of her broken knuckles. I almost threw her in the air, enough to stop holding her where the pain came through and to reach and grab a hold of her waist. "That's that, it's okay now. "With her in my arms and her smaller brothers holding onto me, we were set to go. "Wait, what about our mother?" Alarmed by what she said, I left their bigger sister down and looked at the holed from where they came from. I held myself back as a giant gust of smoke and fire came out of it. "I'm sorry but there's nothing we can do anymore. ""That wasn't our Mother" "Don't talk, you must've inhaled a lot of smoke on your way here. "With her on my shoulder, I grabbed her brother and told her younger sister to come. "We have to jump" She said without looking back but I was. The flames reached the roof, laughing at us as if we were nothing but their meal, toying with us before dinner. My brothers are safe for now and the sweet lady was carrying me. The long needed rest came. "At my mark, jump" The next house had a balcony, away from the flame's reach but beyond a mere jump. Some sheets were laid there and from the looks of it, not too long ago. Someone was waiting for us there. I threw the bigger sister first to get rid of the extra luggage, hitting the sheets as it was intended. "Me next" She said excitedly to join her sister, thinking of it as a game. First, I made sure that her brother didn't just wander off whilst I grabbed her, then I threw her on her sister. Safe to say that, it didn't hurt her that much. "Get away from here, we're next on the line. "And it got thinner as the flames expanded on a slab by slab. "But Sher just fell asleep. ""Move her away, we're coming" With the magic words spoken she muttered and moved her away, making just enough space for both of us to land there, on time before the flames engulfed the entire house. I landed with him in my arms, holding him from harm's way as he fell asleep in my lap. Reunited with her siblings, both of the sisters smiled, one tired and the other one almost busted. The door was open and I was afraid that staying out too much would hurt them more than physically. "Umm, does any of you know why lives here?" I asked them but they didn't look too stiff about that, the ones that were awake anyway. We entered it in a line, the duty old house looking uninhabited by anyone, yet I knew that someone was here and made a place for our escape route. The little sister held her older one by the arm, as I was unable to since I was taking care of the little guy. "So. Sorry about the house I guess?" Despite being tired, the older one could and wanted to speak to me, showing so much interest in it. "Don't worry, that happens often""Wait, does it happen often to get your house set on fire with you in it?" Both of the giggled at my question but I was being serious about it, the place made me feel alienated, so much different than what I was used to before. "No, of course, it doesn't. You're really not from around here, are you?" "Told you I saw new people coming through""Hush now Lore, don't talk as if she isn't here. Speaking off" She detached herself off her sister and stopped in front of me. "Now that we're no longer in danger of being eaten by the flames, why was the roof top locked and how come you were there when it suddenly got opened?" Quick of her feet and angrily looking at me she said it. "Don't look at me like that, I didn't even know why he did it. But, I came back for you, for all of you so don't put the blame on me. ""Sister?" The little one said but I didn't do much to pay attention to her as long as I had it busy. "Then where is he now? My sister is still too young to know, not to mention my brother. We almost died and now. Now we don't have a house. So sorry if I'm placing the blame on the two people responsible for what happened before. "The confusion and pain went away, leaving nothing but a clear thought. "I'm sorry I caused this, I'll somehow make it up to you but that old man that was with me, Phaer. We went on separate ways because I chose to go back and save you. ""And what a great job you did, perhaps you could have saved all of us by not coming in our house in the first place. ""Sister" She said again, pulling me by what was left of my black rags. "Not now Lore. ""We didn't have much of a choice with you people coming and trying to hunt us. ""Yeah, I can see why's that. ""Sher!" Again she spoke, this time, she became too much of a distraction to simply ignore. "What Lore? What is it? Can't you see that I'm busy?" "Am I interrupting?" A grim voice came from a dark spot where a set of eyes sprouted. The figure didn't reveal itself but it surely managed to get our captivation. The girls were silent now and the little boy pulled harder on my chest, having a nightmare. Before saying something, I managed to see the little girl whisper in the other one's ear. "No. I suppose you're the one who placed those bed sheets on the balcony, am I correct?" "So you noticed. "An irregular smile forced the perfect pair for those odd off-centered eyes. "Yes, I did. What of it?" They noticed too, scared of it, backing off behind me, one touching my legs and the other supporting herself on the other. "Are you going to reveal yourself or will you keep creeping like that in the dark?" The frame where he stood was covered in musk and judging from where his eyes were, quite the tall person he was. "You wouldn't like that. "His teeth were playing like a morgue whilst talking , playing in order and sounding different with each word. "And. . Why might that be?"Curious about it, I completely forgot where I was and what I was doing in here. My pair of pants were almost down from how much they were being dragged by her. "Shh now. "I could understand why she was scared, and why did the other one pass down but if we were in danger, I had to know. "Are you going to hurt us?"Came out of my mouth before we started the game of waiting. A brim light came from behind for enough time while the fire was burning.

No longer did that happen as the fire was put down by now, leaving only the artificial light they've stolen from above. Silence stood between us and the sleeping wonders next to me. I did not know if it was still a day or the night came but my stomach started grumbling. "Damn that woman"I wish I left her there rather than have her slow me down, it's her fault they found us. Another leap leads me on another metal top where I stop. "What now?"I asked myself quite loudly, seeing how a pale and tall man with three fingers on each hand stopped me. His appearance was peculiar and managed to make me question what was he doing here with me. "Your arrival waited"He said with a grim voice with his throat carrying something to his upper part of his head. "Is that so?Who are you and how much do you know?"My hand was on my back, ready for any sudden move made by the man. So much more different than the people who lived in the town below. "We were instructed to find and escort you professor. ""Wait.

"Surprised I lowered my hand and dismissed any harmful situation that might have arisen in any other circumstance. "So you aren't alone?Quite a strange stance you're imposing onto me, though. How am I supposed to trust you?"That horrid smile and wooden teeth made me look away for a second before he was gone. "Wait, where are you?"He couldn't have disappeared that fast, no way, even with his size I doubt he could find any place to hide in less than a second. Though, if they found me once, they might find me again, probably just as fast as he disappeared. Just in case, something else happened, my weapon was steadily hidden under my belt if it came to it anyway. For now, this small delay cost me dearly as I still face hunger and thirst from the exhausting journey I was forced on. "Well, I'm afraid you might now like the answer. "His hands extended beyond the shade he was in, revealing his long and flat fingers, almost puppet-like. So long and rough looking, with a broken hand keeping them together, making his smile even duller. The girl passed down too and It would seem like I was about to have a bad time defending all of them from whatever he was. The hand he pushed into the light seemed like there was no end to it. His eyes got bigger and the hand stopped, no longer watching me or my general direction. "Oh. I see"He said with a change of tone that could be read from both his voice and actions. "What now?"I asked him, hoping that he'd explain his reason but the hand was already pulled back. "Our meeting is over. For now. "His teeth disappeared and the small globes that were in the places of his eyes followed. Behind me, there was no one either, but I knew something caused him to back away. "I guess I should be glad that we're at least safe"Though we were in someone else's relatively clean house. A bed wasn't far from me, with some level of effort, I managed to place all three of them on it, just the right size too. If I chose to be fair about it, I was tired myself, especially after that run and messy confrontation from before. A little nap near them won't do me any harm, and I could just as easily get up before them in order to make my escape. No one would notice. One bed sheet was left, different from the others and something told me that they weren't brought from here to the spot where we landed. With the cover on, all that was left, for me to tell them. "Good night"Quite a long day, though this place, aided by those children's presence, it made me feel like home. Despite being so far from

it. A safe spot appeared, just in my reach, I managed to get down unnoticed. No sign of the strange creature I've encountered before, that, judging from the way it appeared and moved. With the system of buildings they've made, it relieved the stress of having to worry about being caught. Such a narrow road behind all of them with no other way in. If it wasn't because of the mistake I made, I wouldn't have gotten here. Perhaps I wouldn't have been able to walk freely and unnoticed either. Practically covered by the height itself, I doubt that Genevie would be able to walk in my footsteps and get to me. Not that she was any of my concerns anymore. Speaking of the devil. "Took you long enough" At the end of one route and where another sprouted, I saw one of them standing right over it. With his friend of course, not so far from him, accommodating his deeply creeping smile and sharp teeth. One of them at least. "So you're both here to escort me?" As I got closer, I got to see them better, at least the height of the figure but never their bodies. They kept themselves hidden and revealed only what was needed. So did their slick tongue walk around, trying to hinge when I wasn't paying attention, whispering to one another what they were planning to do next. I could see that I was just one mere interest in their vast web of plans, ignoring me at first, bicker at their others. "When you're done, could we please go on? It's been a long trip and there have been too many delays. ""Very well, just follow us. ""Follow the lights inside our eyes"" And try keeping up"" And if you fail, try some more" Hard for me to make the difference, of course, they were twins, that much was obvious. Now, what was left for me to find out is how did they manage to get to the state they're currently in, without trying to anger them. Their speed and large stature made me feel quite restless. They didn't run but instead I could see their feet slightly lifting themselves up from the ground, hovering dismay. "Do follow us now. ""And don't worry"" For us only smile to strangers"" And bark at nay. ""Cut it off with the nonsense, I didn't come here to deal with childish riddles. "Not that the blankness of the hidden roads we were going and the sudden turns gave me any form of entertainment. "Then why did you come here?" The first one asked, or perhaps the second. "Why did you leave from above, above?" "It's none of your business" I said whilst trying to follow the trail of light that was left out of their eyes. Like owls their head were turned, always looking at me, or could it be that they were flying on their backs? "And how come you've received the ability to fly?" "The one wonders. ""He'll find soon enough. ""Who even are you two?" As the words slipped out of my mouth, they slow, looking at me from below. "We are called by many"" Names and lots of headings"" But one remains the most"" Harstmen of the coast"" And why might that be that way?" I asked curiously, waiting for a gracious answer but they didn't. Just kept the smiles in complete silence. But it wasn't long as we reached something it would seem. And four fingerless arms stopped me from my tracks telling me to wait. But "Wait for what?" And they respond. "Beyond us is what you must take"" Beyond that, we can't shake. ""Shake what? Actually, what are you two even talking about?" "Shake of good as it's done. ""You wouldn't want our good host to die, right?" They got more confusing at this point, refusing to give me any sort of explanation, only more confusion. I took their hands away from my shoulders and chest and threw them away. Something that they didn't like. "We warned you we warned"" Now and beyond, alone you are"" The escort is done" And in a blink they left and stopped blocking the path in front of me. Such peculiar creatures, they got turned into. Sickening what they've hidden from me for so long, out of place even for this place. Someone might've constructed it since there was no way for it to fall deeper into the under cove, or did it? A sewer pipe, bigger than us, hid inside the bowels of the town we were in. And somehow it was never found, from what I was aware of, or there might've been signs. Yet none was, no steps, no dirt, clean and proud that even those brothers chose to fly above it. Which lead me back to having to go inside the sewers. The smell intoxicating, hopefully, the natural fumes that almost infected my every surrounding killed any trace of the rat species, if not evolved it into something else. Quite the funny thought I said as I entered inside. My flash stick wasn't needed as the huge pipe was actually lighted by glowing rocks. I've seen them before but I didn't know they were so strong, managing to penetrate the thickly layered metal over the course of what I could only assume to be years. Some time passed between them, I could see it clearly with the rust and the places where any trace of water might've vanished. Even the smell died after a while, serving only at the entrance as a distraction. Someone took notes on the walls but I couldn't decipher what it was inside. Others looked like plain gibberish but there were some of them that interested me. Yes, quite splendid they appeared and as I took a copy of the lexicon out, I started to write them down on another page, thinking that they could come in handy. "Like the people of the town" "We walked at night and in total silence as they slept. "The girl saw us but it doesn't matter. ""So did the woman, do not forget. "My brother was right but we've done our jobs, the strings were loosened and we could resume our duty. "And play later perhaps. ""Unfinished business brother?""So it would seem. "Such thin bodies we had, hiding behind poles and other objects, pretending to be only in the mind of the many. Inhibitors of the town did not know of us, just like him. "Should we mess with him, brother?""A poor excuse to walk out this late""But is it really?""We'll find out. "And the poor poor man walked around for no reason, his golden beads and hair of many colours. His walk of sunder and strange cahoots. We were almost begged to torture the poor soul. He chose a strange path near broken windows, abandoned and burnt homes. Such an occurrence these days. "Is he?""The one and only. "An accomplice to the fire, he burnt and pillaged our dearest only. A killer of children and sinner of many. Crimes unpunished soon to be redeemed. My brother vanished, he went beyond, trying to make him run. His eyes were blue and I could see them clear and they ran straight at me. He fell to the ground as he saw he had no way out. The clothes now dirty of mud and other trash. "Well well, how clumsy of you" "My brother said with a grin. "Do you need some help""Maybe a hand?""Or perhaps two?" "The man was scared, running dry, looking at us like ghosts gone by. "Ah, don't hurt me" "The little man said. But not him neither his legs did understand. We both grabbed a side and tossed him aside. Breaking a few bones as time went by. "Don't do this. I'm sorry" "He pleads and bargains for his life, with no one around to hear his cry. "Oh you little man""So petty, petty. ""Trading your life. . ""What's it, brother?" "The horn sounded three times as the time for the day aray. "It would seem like his life is not ours to take" "He still looked scared, despite our change. "Shall we return then?""Later when his bones will run dry. "We didn't get to play enough so we left, marking our next target. "That much is safe""Assured. Of that, I concur. "That my next meeting with her, the horn will not die alone. The sound was deafening, a word I haven't thought about in a long time, yet it managed to wake me in time. "I don't suppose you toddlers are awake, right? "Sleeping like logs before the fire. "Inappropriate but hopefully, they haven't heard me. Strangely, when I got to the balcony I haven't seen any sun rising. Oh, right. Trapped in here and a fugitive too with no way out nor a place to stay. Relax Genevie, it could've been much worse. By now the ashes settled down, merely floating in the air, closer and closer to me. Was I a bad person for enjoying it? "The distraction at least. All of them so far, kept distracting me away from thinking about. Paul. Perhaps it would've been much more different if he were still with us. Or even without me. "Looking for something?""Agh" "He jumped at the roof, grabbing it with his hands, a hole in his nose and his face all blue. "You again?" "I asked but he seemed surprised, even more than me after seeing his strange appearance. The mask he was wearing didn't make a ring but the height and hands matched. "I saw you before but you did not. Or not? May I see your behind?" "I'm not sure what you're asking me to do here. " "It's simple he said" And I heard that a lot before, making me think of the contrary at once. "I've only seen your back. Perhaps if you could be so kind and turn around, I could get to have a better idea of you. "Was he hitting on me or being serious? Either way, I couldn't trust him, not after threatening me the last time. "No, I'm fine this way. " "Just in time. Perhaps you'd really be inclined to turn around. Right about now. "His voice changed as he started getting closer to me, getting further only with the help of me backing away from him. "Don't be scared now, your meeting with fate just came by. " "And there will be no escape this time" Another voice came from somewhere in the dark but I couldn't take my eyes from him. "Oh no. "One of the girls woke up too, stopping both, perhaps even the three of us closely to the middle of the room. My stomach was hurting really bad and I knew this wouldn't end up well. I knew that something could come in handy and I had to act fast. He was distracted and the other one unseen, I reached behind my back and grabbed the trumpet. "Silent little lamb, your time shall come after. Now, where were we?" Before he fully turned, I slammed it in his hand, fracturing it and breaking both my instrument and his in a moment. "You wretch!" He yelled surprised of my action and slammed me to the ground with one of his long hands, wrapped around my body. My arm made contact with the rugged side of the bed and my neck almost got broken from the suddenness of the whole act. Before he managed to fully do it, he also took a gold of my trumpet. "Agh" "You. . . You will pay for this I promised" He broke and threw it as far as possible from him.

"Brother , the horn" The voice from beyond said whilst hearing the hum from outside. The day might be coming closer and I wasn't feeling better from it with all the blood coming through my head. "She damaged me, brother. She must pay dearly for the transgression. "The horn sounded again and I had nothing in sight to defend myself with. Nor could I move from the spot I was on. "The horn again, we can't hurt her now. You know the rules brother, we both paid dearly for it. " "I don't care about them anymore, she must pay. " "Brother stop!" Coming from the darkest corner, with his long legs, he looked like him but acted differently. He managed to stop him in time from grabbing me and injuring me some more. Entangled with one another, they both wrestled, with hands as if they were meant to be connected, pushing themselves beyond limits. Their legs firmly stuck inside the carpet, moving only when needed. "You can't stop me now. "I knew that he was real but my brother and sister were still sleeping. It wasn't a dream as I believed, no. There was a simple way to beat one if it was true, I took the vase and held it through their match. They scared me before but no anymore, I threw the vase and broke it into one of them when the moment was right. "Aha, I got you!" The little girl said as she broke the vase. The shards flew everywhere in the air, leaving no reaction of him being affected by it. But then it hit it. I don't know what or why but the one that defended me started violently twitching its body and shaking uncontrollably despite showing no pain before. One of his legs almost fell on the floor, being limped and unmoved, just like this following hand. "Brother no!" The other one yelled whilst holding him in his arms. Whatever she did managed to do an incredible amount of harm to him, enough to make him drag and retreat with his brother. I heard no other words but. His sobs as he made his way out of the house with him. My back was hurt and my hand wasn't getting better, what he did to me would require help beyond anything else.

"Bastard!" I said but he was long gone, leaving me helpless for the rest of the night. I felt like thanking her but I didn't, my strength had to be conserved in case I'd have to attempt to escape. "Are you okay miss?" She asked, right next to me too, looking through my wound. "I'm. Fine. Just go back to bed, okay?" "But you're really hurt. And there's tomato juice coming out of your arm. Mom always used to say that when it happens, you need help. "Her naivety made me chuckle and I was certainly not in any position to decline her help. "Wake up you lazy bastards!" The town crier yelled, shaking his bells like no one else would at this hour. Right as I thought I could get some last moments of sleep, he slammed it on my vault door, ringing through the house. "Shut up already!" I yelled after opening my window and threw my shoe at him too, managing to cramp his walk. "Did I hear that right? Is it just me now? But, are you looking for trouble Alfons? You know I can bring your house to the ground if I wanted to, right? After all, the mayor fancy's me. "He was such an insect, abusing the power he had from kissing the mayor's behind. One of these days, I was going to make him pay for everything he said. "No, I didn't say anything, it must've been the wind I presume. Keep doing your job and send my regards to the mayor" "That's what I thought I heard before but I wasn't sure of it. But good lap dog you are. "Degrading man and a damnable "Bloke" too, but he didn't hear that from me. People like him pissed me off, doing nothing and getting more rewarded than us working folk around here in the mines. My hands were still black from the black rocks they've made us dig into last night. "Revolutionary discovery my arse" And no one heard me since I've been living alone. I got done and placed the kettle on the fire, making the coffee that I so longly awaited. Surprised that they machine worked, luckily for me, I managed to find one working and get it here without telling anyone about it. The good old days where you could get off with claiming what you found and taking them away are long gone now. I swear, if they came into my house and forced me to register my every fairly taken object, I would plainly stick it in them. "Someone's at the door? "I thought, but it was too early unless that bloke actually reported me to the mayor's guards. "Well you won't take me without a close encounter, I tell ya. "I took a pint and got ready to smash it into the first person who got into my house to arrest me. Those insistent fools trying to chuck the door at me. "Please open up Alfie" That voice? Could it be? "Wait a second" I said before placing the pint down and opening the door. "What's going on in here? Who is she?" "Please Alfie, we need your help" I got closer and helped her walk inside. When they entered, as usual, they closed the door and locked it good. The tall one had her hands wrapped and the woman they brought with them had her arm bandaged with the bloody sheets. "Just. Agh. " "Sorry. "I said as I accidentally touched a bad spot. "Just place me there" On the chair, where I left her to rest undistressed. "Your arm. What happened?" "A small accident, don't worry" But it didn't look just like an accident, more like an infection by now. I wasn't one to judge but she was way too pale to be found around here. The kids were distracted and she was in need of help. "Wait here a second. Just don't move a muscle. " "Are you serious?" "Yes, I am. Hey, Sh. Actually, Lore, do you mind stopping the coffee from being burnt? Thanks. "She nodded and went there, hopefully with the lesson learnt and not try drinking out of it whilst being hot again. I think I had, there. Near the stairs, my helping box with all the tools needed to be laid. Yet another prime example of a good job from me not going to register it. I brought it immediately to her and opened it forth. "Is that what I think it is?" "I don't know if you've ever seen a helping box but sure. " "That's not a. Well, close enough" At the sight of freshly not used bandaged, my face brightened, my arm feeling bad brought me such indescribable discomfort. "We might have to remove what you've got on you. "He said, with the kids now behind him, looking above as a point to admire. "Wait, what did say?" "I said that. . " "No, I heard that part, I was just shocked. What do you mean by removing all?" "Well, we need to wrap a bigger amount to cover your wound after we're spilling the blue liquid on you. "They all looked at me like a patient yet none of them had any clue on what a doctor was. I still needed to avoid a future infection and get some rest but the problem still was that. "I'm not wearing anything under this dress, well, except my underwear. ""I don't see how that's a problem, we still need to prevent you from getting more hurt than you look. ""No, you don't seem to understand, unless. Unless you have no class at all. "My voice started deteriorating as I said it, which wasn't a good sign. The pain that I felt somehow circulated through my body towards my leg, the same spot where I was previously hurt. Somehow they were connected and. "I don't have another choice do I?Wait. "I thought of an immediate solution. "Let them do it, the two of them. I'm sure they'll be able to handle it. They did it before. ""Well, I won't protest but hurry, my morning coup is getting cold. "He took Tom and went upstairs, leaving me alone with them. "Are you sure you want to do this?I mean, Alfie has some experience in it. ""Yes, I don't want him to handle me again. "Hopefully he didn't hear that, I didn't want to get kicked out from being a guest in his house. "Fine, let's start I guess. "She said, whilst getting the box closer with her smaller assistant. I managed to undo my tightings by myself with a luck of such woe. And with only one hand too, revealing the inflated purple area that formed around the bloody wound. I didn't know then but I wasn't bleeding from the impact with the wound but his touch managed to enter and penetrate my skin through the fabric without even harming it in any way. "Agh. Please try being more gentle. "I told her, as all of the sudden she poured more medicinal alcohol in my wound. So much without measure, dripping onto my body too. The small dress I was wearing, stuck inside my belt and pants got all soaked. "Could you both turn around please?""But how are we supposed to patch you up if we can't see where we're touching? ""You don't, I can handle myself very well, thanks for asking. I only needed you to pour that alcohol onto me, the rest I can handle on my own. "With their backs turned, I lifted and set my dress aside before I started bandaging my arm with my only good hand. Not too long passed and it was all ready. And never in my life did I feel so awkward being naked near two girls and a man who stood upstairs. "Are you done down there?"I asked her whilst doing my best to stop little Tom from playing with dangerous objects throw around the house. "No, don't come yet"Her yell could be heard throughout the house, hopefully, she didn't end up attracting the people from there. Strangely it didn't happen very often for me to encounter such a situation like this one, being visited by someone like her. And a thought crossed my mind, surely she wouldn't mind if she didn't know I tried peeping on her, would she?But what would she do to me if I'd get caught?Such a tantrum could demolish my house and I worked quite a lot on finding it and customizing it to my likings. Just one little peak, though, it wouldn't kill anyone, would it?Right near the stairs, I bent down a little to look through the bars. Seeing how the kids were both turned around the couch, it figures that she's most likely naked behind them. And the right angle too, they wouldn't even catch me if I was fast enough. A glimpse would be enough I'm sure, just a little lower. Close enough that I managed to see her leg stretching far away from the chair she was in but I stopped. Little Tom held my shirt and pulled me back. I almost jumped with ice in my belly, being afraid that I was actually caught in my action, soon to vanish after realising who it was. "All patched now, you can both turn around now. "All dressed and fully covered, despite speaking so quietly, my voice was caught by them too. "We're coming down in a moment now"With a suspicious voice, he said that before coming to join us. At least I managed to relieve some of the pain from my body until it fully healed. "Thanks for your help, though. I couldn't have done it if you weren't so kind to bring the first aid kit with you. ""Don't worry about it. We lower folk around here help each other as much as possible. "She must be from the upper class, most likely a noble, hidden away from the light and us. That would explain why she had such a silken light skin. "So, now that we take care of you. ""Fairly pointed Lore, I'm glad that I know you for once. "Said the dirty man to the younger girl. Yet I didn't know as of yet how truly dirty he was. "And to add to that, you're one of the reason for our house burning down? ""Yeah, that's a good point too. Wait. What did you just say, Sher?""Oh, nothing , but they burned down our house and my hands got kind of burned too. "He went all the way to untie her hands whilst hearing the painful sounds she made in the process. "Ah, that's okay. It's almost healed now. ""No, we need to apply some liquid there too before properly covering it up. Hey. What was your name again?""My name is Genevie. "I told him right before getting up and trying to give a hand. No more numbness but I couldn't move it as freely as I wanted. Despite being restrained, I wanted to help them, somehow feeling responsible for what happened. "Here, let me put some in there, a little should suffice. Better stay on that wooden stool before we're done. ""Fine" She said but I felt like it wasn't. The awkwardness of the situation and her not having a house anymore to take care of her two siblings put me in a devilish spot. "So. You burnt down their house huh?"He asked like a brute without even thinking that it might've not been my fault. But it. . . Really was my fault. Wasn't it?"No, I mean yes. It's complicated. ""Well, everything is complicated around here. But to be fair, I did expect them to burn it down by themselves at one point. Never figured it would happen so soon. ""Ouch. "She left out a screech from the pain, before going on. "Hey, we were just fine before they came along. And for your information, it only happened once and we managed to prevent a fire. ""Don't look at me, I believe you. Though I'm not the one who started it. ""And neither was I. "I hoped he'd trust me on this one as once again I was getting away from his desire to help. "Then who was it?""I don't know. The only sound I heard was the one made by a crowd. Augh"Another screech, followed by a tear, a soft spot was hit whilst I held her down for the other set of bandaged to be rolled down. "Hey, can I drink the brown fee?""No, don't touch it yet, I'll give you some after I'm done. Maybe. ""Ehm""Sorry, bandages. ""Yeah. "I was quiet, trying to come up with a good explanation, but the one on how I got here wasn't so. Believable. Not that they cared about how I got here to ruin their lives, nor how none of this was even planned. "It must've been the chancellor!Ever since he's got elected by the mayor, he's been using him like a puppet. Because of him we have to suffer from poverty and bad working conditions. ""Aflie, calm down, you're scaring Tom. "He was done with mending her and lowered himself to assure Tom too. "Don't worry, I won't let them hurt you anymore. And they'll pay for what they did""Wait, Alfie. It's not their fault, it's. All mine. If I didn't decide to run away with. Well a certain someone, none of this would've happened. ""No, it's not. Stop deceiving yourself like that. It's not a closed case that happened recently. Sit down and let me tell you what you high folk don't get to hear about what's really happening. "I wasn't sure what he meant by that but getting more information about my surrounding could end up being helpful. Especially whilst having to deal with dangerous people. "We're treated like lower humans whilst you all live up above everyone on your towers and fancy homes made of precious substantial material. It wasn't enough for them to separate from us but they had to really rub it in our nose by creating those metal legs to hold them atop of us. ""Wait, how did they manage to build them like that?I didn't even manage to see it at first, nor did I realise what it was. ""I don't know what you're referring to, but it's still not fair. Atop of that, they own those royal thugs armored, raising those little obnoxious pets for their armour. With that much supply of it, we're defenseless against their enforcers. And they still manage to gain the support of some folk around here since they're afraid of revolting against them" What have I gotten myself into? He wasn't making any of that up, I could tell from his face, neither were those kinds shocked by any of what he said. "Momy used to tell us about them too. Before she stopped talking about it. ""Lore, not now, I've told you before that she abandoned us. ""No, she didn't. She's still home waiting for us to take her back, you left her there. ""Lore, that's not our mother, stop talking about her as if she was there for us! "I had to step in but he did it before I. "Okay, that's enough, my old man used to say that there's pointless kicking a legless horse. "She did like she always did, running away with Tom upstairs, him being too young to take any side. "Try being more understandable with her, she's too young to understand. ""Why would I, when she can't even take the truth. How do you think she'll react when she find out that the mannequin we used to have in the house burnt down?""Sher, that's enough. They're the only members of your family that you've got. It's been hard around here, you've seen, no, you've felt it yourself. It's only going to get worse now. ""I wish I could, but I can't, I just can't. And then she came along too and ruined our home. Not to mention my hands. "I looked away after hearing what she held for so long. She had every opportunity and every moment we spent together whilst I knew she had something to say to me. I only needed the confirmation now and no sorry would bring her house back, nor would it heal her wounds. "Sher. . ""But. . "And we both stopped, me and Alfie right as she continued. "If it wasn't for her, we wouldn't have been alive. So thanks, for that at least. "She held no resent towards me and I couldn't blame her for being mad. "Yeah, well. You could stay with me for as long as you want since you've got no place to go. That includes you as well, no attachments too. "Wait, was he talking about me?" Oh, I'm really flattered but I don't know if I can stay. I'd bring more harm than good. So often that I'm starting to feel like I'm a bad luck charm. ""Nonsense, I'm sure that. Wait, where did my coffee go? I should've known that they both had a reason to leave. "We both found it funny and chuckled at it. The girl had quite a cute one too. He chased them upstairs to get his spoils, leaving us both alone to reflect on it. I wasn't entirely sure if all three of them planned to leave the two of us alone but truth be told. I wasn't sure what else to expect from them. "Look, Sher is it, right?""Yes, that's the one. "She didn't look at her hands anymore and looked back at me. "I promise I'll make you to the three of you. ""Don't please. Listen, I may have been hard of you but it's not entirely your fault. Alfie didn't manage to tell you but he was going to. This isn't the first time they threatened to burn down our house unless we're paying the fee. ""What fee? And who would be so crucially insane to burn down a house with three children in it?""I don't know if I'd say insane but close enough. Though, they don't care about us or what we are. For them, we're just extra luggage that ain't paying up what we don't own. ""Which is?""Well, I don't know where you've been hiding in the last years but the main currency changed a lot. "Up from her dress, carefully so she wouldn't touch anything with her hurt hands, she took out some glowing rocks. "The same one I've seen before on the railroad. ""Oh, so you've seen it before. Perhaps you've been living under the right rock after all. But, they're demanding a lot of them and on a small pause too. ""And if you don't manage to pay it up?""Well, you saw what they did to our house. And from the looks of it, you've evaded quite a lot too. ""Refined currency with symbols engraved on them, I can't say they're much more different than the coins and bills we're using outside. ""Outside of the lower levels I presume" I smiled and got closer to her, with no one around. "Outside the underground, close to the sun. "She tried oscillating between a happy and a confused face, unable to respond. "There you are, what did we miss?" And just in time, they came back, all of them with no one left behind. "Right on the clock I see""Yeah, it seems like these little culprits are done after they've drunk all my coffee. And with such a soft light today, it would seem like it's going to be a good one. "They looked and acted like a normal family, it reminded me of. "What's this?" I asked but it was so gentle that no one heard me. This must've been on me since the last night, I'm surprised that I even got to see it land on me. Almost invisible, a string was attached to the bandaged spot. They were all too busy talking to see it, so I just placed it inside my pocket. What was the purpose of it?" Genevie, are you going to join us for the morning routine?" "Yeah, in a moment. "This reminded me of my ongoing problem, I was still separated from Phaer and I was also starting to suspect that it wasn't his real name either. Wherever he is, I hope he's crawling on his way there. The place was getting tighter too and it would seem like I would have to take my chances with the underground fungus that I collected from before. The light was dim and I was still going through the metal vent, or whatever was left of it. Someone was here before, I thought as I saw the rocks that once penetrated the following section I was in front of. Broken like a tunnel and cracked in the spots, someone came with a pickaxe and broke through the lots. I wasn't aware of how much time it passed, my hand clock stopped a long ago. The air remained the same but as I progressed, an eerie feeling came through as I thought about what laid at the end of the place I was heading into. Voices ran through my surroundings and I couldn't tell if they were outside or circulated with the wind. So much did I walk and for what? The end was near and I could barely see anything as the circled in from of me was lighted. A small puddle stood under me but it wasn't water, it was oil. I had to rub my finger on it and taste it just so I could confirm it and so did I. And in a pure state too. Unfortunately for me, I didn't have anyone to do it for me anymore, which brought me some discomfort. I had to keep going straight, hopefully, not being followed, this was the end of my destination. I place my hands on its edges and got closer to see. A big valley underground, it must've been formed through years, even more than that. Was I in the right place? Water ran through and on my right I could see a giant cascade with clear water running down but not for long. I managed to get in the right time to see all of it turn into oil, in the biggest concentration I've set my eyes onto. How? I asked myself as, even below it turned into it, a phenomenon that didn't last enough before reversing itself into water. The stream kept going, leading to a giant vortex that looked like it laid at a dead end to the valley. "This is insane" I yelled only to hear my echo repeat what I said, from far away. Disturbing whatever lived in here, the set of eyes blinked at me from atop of the ceiling and the holes that ran through the entire system. Strange how it remained so clean, usually all types of junk would fall from above. I've seen it happen everywhere except here. That warning I've seen before when I first entered here must've been a warning about this place, as I wouldn't be able to survive a jump from such height. Neither would I be able to hold my breath long enough to avoid drowning. Perhaps. . . Perhaps I was brought here for another reason, this can't be the right place to go. I took out a map and finally understood why. "And what I need to do. "In my pocket too, safely stored. And the phenomenon I witnessed before turned out to be regularly enough for me to try something irrational. I rubbed my chin and analyzed the pipe I was in and saw that it had a cover, just in my reach, reinforced too. This event was set before I came here. . . And I was about to become its trigger. Blood rushed through my head the more I thought about the gravity of the situation I was in. I didn't change my mind about it as something compelled me to go through anything, abandon anyone, care about no one in order to reach my goal. And this will await me if I fail. The last person who got here laid next to me, I was so blinded by what I saw that I didn't initially see it. He was all bones now, literally and he never got the chance to go back either.

Was this going to happen to me as well? No. His clothes aren't burned and show no sign of it, he didn't look like he had anything to do with this either. His bones were so small and fragile, it could've been a kid too. Damn place is getting to affect me more than it should. He's unimportant, they all are. The only important object I need to focus now is this. "And don't worry about it Genevie. Whilst dressed in these clothes and with your face murky, no one should recognise you. ""Are you sure about it Alphonse? I'm not sure what can I do if I get chased again, now that I'm alone. ""But you're not alone Gen. "Sher said, followed by her litter sister Lore. "Yeah, you've got us to take care of you. "I'm sure that little Tom would've joined them too if he was able to speak. "Well, I can't spend all my life inside this house, can I? And in the bad case, someone comes to you asking if you've seen me. "In a chorus, they responded. "We haven't seen you at all. Nor do we know what they're talking about. ""Do you really have to go now? What if you don't come back?" The little one asked, rubbing her face against my leg. "Don't worry, I won't be long gone, I just want to explore the town more. You know, to make myself more familiar with the place. "Not that I've had my fair share of it whilst running away for my life, though I haven't been able to see much of it. Neither did I realise until it was pointed out to me how above we laid another level where the high class lived. How bad could they possibly be, avoiding us at any point, not even daring to look down on us? We were ants as they acted like kings and queens. I've barely been here for a short duration and I feel nothing but spite towards them. How were they able to live like that or be born in such a place? "Don't go that fast Genevie. ""Wait?" Alphonse just joined me on the empty streets, still early for him to come alone and. "Leaving all those children alone in your house. Unattended? ""Don't worry, I'm sure they can handle themselves. ""Sure they can. If you want a new house that is. ""Oh, that's precious. You barely met them and it seems to me like you've known each other for years. "He was such a. "Bah. ""You know, they really look up to you, even if you came out of nowhere. ""I doubt it, especially if you're talking about Sher. She's standing between hating and wanting to ignore me. ""Wait a second. "We noticed a small vehicle going our way so we backed away to make room for it to pass. Not as fast or as. Lookalike as our normal ride up above. Packed with boxes and carrying stones, as it passed us with its tied driver I noticed that. "Is that a ride made out of parts?" Half of it looked normal but the other was welded together with parts from what remained from a clock tower. "Where did they even get that?" I kept asking a question that would most likely get no answer. "He was lucky enough to get some good parts, can't say the same for everyone here. ""You mean it's getting worse than this?" Come to think of, the houses that didn't fall on their entirety or got welded together must've been constructed from scratch from even more spare parts. Remnants of stations, cars, trains and even logs that probably found their way underground were less than few of the houses that were made and still on the progress. "Expanding much? ""Yes, we're still trying to build more for those who're still bringing more children in this world. And there're the one or two fools from time to time that. Well, they're thinking that, if they can build their house tall enough, they could reach and become members of the higher class. ""Hah, that, I'd like to see. "And even the people we passed by, coming out of their homes, clean and quite normal, nothing like the ones that followed us last night. "Listen, Al. Do you mind if I ask you a strange question?" The sides and the windmill we passed were still going, though they didn't know how to use it. A couple of wrenches on our side, dressed as if they were going to a masquerade ball. So stylish for the lower classes. Truth be told, I could get used to the life here, perhaps I could even fit with them. "So, are you going to ask now? Well, take your time, I know that this place can be overwhelming at times. Especially when you encounter those who have the special parts. If you catch my drift. ""I. Sure, whatever you say, buddy. "Who could resist such a beautiful place?It had such a nice feel to it and. "Oh, I want to see that. "A street vendor, selling his wares and miscellaneous objects. "What have we here, if it isn't Alphonse and. Coming with fresh meat too. ""Oh, am I fresh meat?Well, I guess I'm a lot fresher than you. "Stale old geezer with his furs and coats, hiding even more under his hide. Why was I always brought to old people alike?"Calm down before you start a fight. You know what happened last time. ""Sorry"I told Alphie without realising how much my tongue ran. "Yeah, you'd better listen to your hook there before you get bitten by the wrong fellows here. It tends to get quite dangerous here, especially in the evenings. "He pointed with his hand to the sky whilst telling me that. But I was confused by it.

"How can you know , there's no sun to indicate if it's day or not. "I asked him but he didn't seem to keen on explaining it to me. "Oh, Alphie dear, where have you found her?""Well, you could say she barged into my house. ""Happens quite often in these parts. ""Hah, it sure does. ""Look, dear girl, I've pointed you to it and I'll do it again. You see that orb of light above us?"A metal ball above us, glowing as bright as the sun. As much as I wanted to be interested in such a device they managed to create, it reminded me of something else. "I understand. ""What's with the sudden change of tune?Oh, come on, cheer up. We're just having a laugh here. "He noticed it, they both did. Regardless of what I thought before about the people born here, they weren't as slow as previously thought. "Here, perhaps this could cheer you up for once. "He took his hand out of his pocket and pulled out something shiny. "A clock?"And an old one still opened with a clap but the problem was another. "I've got nothing to offer and I'm not really in the mood. ""It's okay"He said. "I only need a smile. "And that I was able to offer. Forced and not my best, I did what I could and offered him the rest. "It's. Just take the clock and get out of here. ""Really?"I asked, with a second one no doubt. "Just go, you're scaring my clients. "Alphonse was quite and there was no one else in sight. "Is this town stranded?""No, it's just that. Well fresh meat, most people are working by now in the mines. And the ones that aren't, or taken an unneeded break. ""Hey don't look at me. "Was Al a miner?That would explain the dirt and those worked hands. "They're in front of you. ""But, the only ones are the. . "Kids, strange couple and the ones in the ride I saw before. "Indeed, they are. ""Fine, let's go, it's getting stale around here. ""Wait. "Before we went away and almost forgot, he gave us the clock and let us go. "Thank you. "To the kind man, wearing his glasses with no lens on. "Hey, check it out. "I tried getting his attention but he acted like he's seen clocks like these before. Roses on its back and glass on the front, a model with pipes covering its behinds. "Genevie, take a look on your right, please. "Why would I?I smiled for nothing, haven't I?"A smile pile of clocks lay near a well, the tinkerer who made them wouldn't be so happy. "Give me a moment then. ""Wait Genevie don't. "I tried to reach and stop her but I couldn't. She went there, near the downslide and started showing as many clocks as she could in her pockets. "You know, you're lucky that there's no one around to see you do that. ""You'd do the same Alph if you were in my place. "Such an embarrassing moment for both of us, we weren't even that far from Ottis and he noticed her too searching in the trash. Sniffing and laughing under his fake moustache and his dense beard. "Why didn't I go to work this day?""What was that?""Nothing"I told her after seeing her heading towards me, with more clocks than I could count, hanging in her many pockets. I had a huge blame for deciding to give her those cover ups. "The ticking will get annoying, really fast. That I can promise. ""Are you kidding?This is the best part of it, you don't know what's good. ""Are you sure you're not from this class like the rest of us?You seem to fit quite well. ""What can I say?I fit quite well in everything. "Her smile leads into an awkward break, with us looking into different directions. I shouldn't have said that to him and perhaps he was right, the ticking of the clocks didn't help me get rid of this awkwardness. There, a distraction. "Is that woman wearing a masquerade mask too?" I whispered in his ear trying to be inconspicuous but she noticed the woman with many clocks in her belly. "What's that?" "You know, that little white mask she's wearing, it has feathers and everything. "And not a moment passed without having her give us an inconspicuous look as she went over. "Hmm" She gaffed and didn't bother, I was being lead towards thinking that everyone is acting rudely towards me for some reason. "Ignore her, she's mostly unhappy with everything around here" "Wait, do you know her?" I asked as he just sparkled my interest. "I actually do if you're so kindly asking. I could even say that for a period of time we. . . " "What? You what?" He didn't specify but I understood what he tried saying. "Could we change the subject?" "Fine, then. How come there are so many people dressed like that girl or that couple we've seen before?" "Easy one, a giant room full of wears like those ones sunk in here, they must've collected them from there. " "Finders keepers, right?" "I guess you could say that. " "Alph, by the way, where are we heading now? We've been walking for a while and I'm still not sure where you're leading me towards. " "You wanted to explore the town, I'm not leading you towards anything. " "Oh, right. Sorry about that. Well, then, I want to go there!" I almost shouted in his ears, sensible by now from all the ticking from my clocks. Someone's house most likely, I'm sure we could use some of the local hospitality, which could prove my opinion about them wrong. "I don't think you want that. " "Don't tell me what I or don't want, just come. " I told him as I came closer and knocked on the door. He looked unsure too as if he knew who was behind it, even better for me. "Knock knock" I said it too whilst knocking again. Someone came, marching to the door, his heavy boots could be heard from behind. "What's the morning run?" He asked and I didn't know. "I. . . " "Not as of yet. " Alph said whilst shoving me out of the way. "Genevie, I need you to stay close to me and not say a word unless you're asked, okay?" "Fine, I presume. " We waited in front of the ivory bricked house. This was so suspicious and no word was spoken so far between us. He looked everywhere for any others that might see us and they all left to their business. I managed to see other people come and pass with their crannies and ledges with no one to sass. "Come in. Oh, a new member I see. I'm sure to let know about the deal you've made Elphie. " "Right, don't mention it to others too, except you know who. " "Fine" And the fancy man welcomes us, dressed in a suit with no stains, a mask of thorns on his face before he let us pass. The house's a mess and it's dark too but Alphonse assured me. "It's a cover, just stay close too. " The man behind locked the door and introduced himself. "Right on time miss. My name is Demis. Who do I owe the pleasure?" He asked and I followed my cue, telling him my name and what do I do. Leading us towards the room, still dark and dusty too. Too many of them were so unattended, I was starting to think that the lower class was in highly need of some cleaning assistance. "Where are we going?" I whispered in his ear, the only thing I could do now. "You wanted to explore, now you'll get to see where's everyone gone. " "So. More than I asked for I guess. " The interior got stranger, wood, reinforced with columns nailed, enough to face us a blast. "And don't worry, if you noticed it too. I took care of the kids before leaving, they're safer than you. " "What does that mean?" "There's no time to explain. " The clocks stopped and I had nothing else to gain. " "Here, let me open this for you. " "A tunnel?" I didn't wait to be asked, in reverse they weren't bothered by my spiked tongue. "A set of stairs? Towards what are we going?" "Towards where, that's the right question to ask. " He welcomed us in and I started suspecting, he acted surprised but slowly leading me towards this house. After a walk and it was quite a lot, the three of us went down, even lower than that. "How much deeper are we going?" "Genevie, I haven't told you this. But you're between the lucky few that get to experience this. " "What?" "The man that opened for us separated us instead, acting as a barrier and barely speaking too. More like a guide he was and for a good reason. "Indeed, she is and at an opportune time too. Tell me then, has she come with him, though?" "Who?" "I asked Demis but couldn't see his face, he was in front of me, scouting the way. "I saw you both get chased, the housed burnt was such a disgrace. " "Wait, you saw me and Phaer, but how, when?" "From a hidden window and when they thought you were both from the higher class. It was later revealed by my source that you weren't. By now, you've also figured that we're holding a grudge against them, not only that but, well, we're going to deal with them once and for all. " "This doesn't sound right" "I said to him but Alphonse reassured me. "You're safe with us Genevie. With all of us. "That came out his mouth as we got to the base, an even deeper level that took even more to get. "Another city? This is insane" "I told him as it was revealed, another level not as abandoned, right here. The entire town must've hidden here, which explain why the second one was mainly abandoned. "Hello and greetings to you my friends. To the newcomer too, ain't she the looker?" "What are you planning to do here Alphonse? Why is everyone in here armed. "They were an entire community of people living in that junkyard, the houses were more polished and taken care off but the people who lived were worse. Weapons but no firearms, sticks and pipes and other blunt objects, the place had a better structure and columns everywhere. "Why does it have so many of them?" "Please escort your dear friend to ours. Friendly facility. "The, what I thought, for now, to be the leader said. "Am I your prisoner then?" "You are now. "But it came from the wrong mouth, with a bitter taste too. "I'm sorry, but it's the procedure, especially if you're from above. "He took me by one hand and a woman came forth and took the other side. Train too just like most of them but I told them outright. "There's no need to grab me. I'll come on my own. "They instead kept on my sides, escorting me now, through what a normal city looked like. I knew that they weren't just scavengers, they had builders too, of bricks, stones, and wood, having pointy tall building forming homes for their needs. But what. "What are you planning to do? At least you could tell me that. "She silenced me right away, blocking him too from informing me for the day. "You're not allowed to know anything as of yet. You don't belong here so don't expect us to let yourself get involved in our lives. "She was right but that didn't justify having me as a prisoner. Though even Alphonse felt bad for betraying me, not even looking at me on our way. This place was so much more different than what I laid above, and what I thought above is if there was yet another level leading to that. Or how much did it take them to build it? Will I spend my life here? For what were they getting ready for? And none of them were going to be answered at all. "If you don't stop shaking like that, I'll be forced to constraint you on the way there. " "I'm sorry. "I told her before having my sight dropping. The road was hard paved too, how did they get the tools for that? It was pointless to ask myself as I won't have any of them answered. Passing near a workshop kind of took away some of the questions. A tinker laid there, open for business. "Hey, you. "I asked whilst getting closer. "Wait a minute Erica. "Alphonse stopped her and let me have my way, even if it didn't take long. "Are you a real tinkerer?" "I asked the man who built and played with his toys, walking and moving on their own. "I beg your pardon?" "His white moustache flew right over as one of the inventions he held in his hands popped. "I guess not. Well, did you make these little devices?" "And his workshop was full, his table sorted with too many to count, some stacked on each other and other under the table too. "I wish I had time to check everything out but I'm not entirely available as you may think. "Behind me, they waited but made no move, at least not him, as she kept pounding her underside with her foot. Their patience was running out and so did mine, that's why I asked it so quickly before he had the chance to recover from it. "So, could you please?" I didn't end that. My eyes crossed on something he had on the table, the broken trumpet from before, ready to get repaired. "What was that?" A screw in his ear didn't let him do much and luckily for me, I didn't need his help anymore. I had all the information I needed. "I have to go. "But they didn't wait for either, coming from behind to push me to beyond. "Just move it, make everything easier on yourself. I know that we won't. "She said but I didn't pay much attention to it. I thought he bluffed before but he didn't if the trumpet made its way down here, so did the children most likely. "Thanks, Alphonse" But he was ignoring me again, seemingly as he wasn't going to give me the time of the day. "So, not so chatty anymore. It's okay, I found out everything I needed. "Or at least that's what I thought until my eyes had a glimpse on what they were preparing. The road was crinkled and going in stray paths, big enough for people to pass and go around us, yet no way for me to lose myself and make a run for it. Everyone was doing something, from carrying planks to handing others weapons to use them for the coming usurper to the above. "Here, go ahead and enter this hall. "An open gate waited but to where?" Where will it lead? I'm getting tired of being forced to go into places I don't want to be headed towards. "It's the procedure, you go on your own or. We will go on your own. ""I don't think I like the sound of the latter. "And neither did I know what she meant by that but as long as they weren't there to watch me or what I did, I was fine with it. The door was slammed behind me, echoing and bouncing the sound between the walls that trapped me. "Are you serious?" I tried yelling at them after they locked me in the empty room, no windows and no light, no doors, and no sight. My voice was the only one I could hear and the noise was deaf. With nothing to do and my legs tired, I laid and did the last thing I could do, which was waiting. For something, anything to happen. Truth be told now, I really felt like. "A prisoner. "And quite bad too as I wanted to see what they were preparing for, and the situation evolved to the point of me being forced to wait in silence. "You too?" A voice came, making the heart in my chest explode. "Who's there?" I asked with a shrill, the voice came from a corner but I couldn't see from where. My eyes rolled, my tummy ached, the clocks in my pocket would beat my wait. "I can't see you either. But my name is Gerard. "I had no choice but to entertain him, despite feeling afraid of why was he hiding in the dark. The smaller part closer to the door was slightly lit so I had no doubt that he could see me. "Genevie, that's my name. "The bad feeling in my gut told me something ain't right. I tried distracting him releasing a fake laugh, though I had a feeling he knew I wasn't going to put much of a fight. "Why are you hiding?" I asked but no answer. "You wouldn't want to see me. "His voice wasn't normal, I noticed it now, was this my torture for not joining them in their conquest upside? He could be like those other two, big and dangerous too, with no one to help so. "Why is that?" I wanted to know, despite the warning my brain told me. "They took it before I came here?" "What did they take?" Closer to the gate, now more than before, I slightly scratched it, trying to get out from what hid in the core. "They took my guts. "And a figure started approaching, holding his hands on his chest. "Wait. Don't come any closer. "I said to him, with the hands in my pockets, ready to throw everything out. "I'm not afraid of you. "I told him in order to appear as if I actually had the guts to it. "I'm so lonely. "He said but I didn't mind that, being afraid of what might come of it when he reached my part. Still not in the light I was ready to scream, if he came any closer, a bloodshed would spring. The door suddenly opened, shoving me aside, when the hand pulled me out before I let out a sight. It closed just as fast and it crawled back in the dark, afraid of the light too and for a good reason. His guts must've been dragged on the floor behind tied to the wall behind him, though. I puked on the ground as soon as he released me, Alphonse locked the door that will haunt my dreams for who knows how long. "I'm sorry you had to see that. Whatever you saw. ""You're monsters, all of you. "Shaken, I got up and spit right through him, he was no longer a friend but. "I don't know what you've seen there but it wasn't real. "Confused, I confronted him, I wasn't sure what he thought and annoyed that he would make such a fool of myself. "Are you calling me a liar, or will you do such of thing?I know what I saw, in that second too. And who I saw, more importantly. "I looked away, still shaken, trying to forget something that tried forcing its way into my mind. "Turn around and read what it says. ""Why?"I asked before doing so, but only after he insisted again. The gate had an inscription that I didn't understand, at first at least. The words almost not entirely understandable but I did after a while, or at least after he explained. "This is the trial we all face when we come here. It's an old place, older than the one that lays above us and the latter one above that. Just like how the higher class raised themselves thinking they're superior, so did our ancestors before us. The inscription on the room is what we fear the most, what we're trying our best to forget. The truth, it's frightening and it might be different for everyone who encounters it. For most of us, it served as the reminder of what we are, how we feel and what did our ancestors did for us to get here. ""Truth?But what does it mean?"I asked whilst pondering, why did I see Paul again and why was I so afraid of it?"It's a cycle that reign for long, it must be stopped at all cost. How much do you think it will take until they'll try ascending even more?When do you think it will stop?They're not any more different than us, trust me. So, tell me now, what makes them more worthy than we are?Tell me!"He shook me again with no regards on my well being. I wasn't sure if he meant well or not, nor did I know what to make out of what I saw. "I don't know. "Sincerely told him but he didn't listen, he kept going on his dear whistling. "I think you do know, judging from what I believe you saw in there. It may be hard at first to understand the truth but don't worry now. Just now, our informers told us that everything is inset, the fuse got in contact and it's ready to go. ""What does that even mean?"I asked both him and myself, without adding much since he'd do most of the talking it would seem. But I really wanted to know, why they were getting so mobilised, everyone was packing and racking for who knows what reason. "All you need to know and you'd better do a good job remembering it. That your residency here just became permanent. "Just like that, another time the river changed, back and forth. I had no idea why did my calculations took so long to reach a verdict, not only would I need to time it tight but I also had to figure a way for it to not end my life in the process. The speed, the gas in the lighter, its volume too, with all in mind and even if the timing was right, I wasn't sure if I could go through with it. A hunch also managed to point something to me, that, if I tried, there would be consequences to my actions. But how many and how harsh?It seemed to me if the distance matched and the giant pipe I was in, the road I was taken by those two miscreeds might've been built as a drainage system to get rid of the excess water that flew here. The town could be destroyed, their lives ruined. "It's my only chance. ""And not only yours. "A voice said it wasn't just in my thoughts and recognisable indeed. "Alone I see, for what reason could I owe you the pleasure?""Don't worry, I'm not seeking to bring you any trouble. Just to assure and make sure that you're going to go through with the task given. ""But why the sad face?I presume you also know about it. "I said it to the distressed man, like a mutt he came, looking down and pitying himself for whatever reason. Unless he grew a conscious about what was about to happen.

"Or is that me?" "What was that?" He hasn't heard it and I wasn't going to explain myself either, especially since the answer he'd give me wouldn't make worth due time. "So, do you know about it or do you not?" "That it might cause a landslide or even worse right under the town we've been through? Yes, I am aware of it. "So it was true, their damnation was tied to my forgiveness, or at least to the path that leads to it. "I sacrificed a lot to get there, even more before I decided to take this path. Yet I'm having a difficult time throwing this there. Why do you think is that?" "You're having a chance of thought, it's normal but it cannot pass forever. You are going to go through with this, again, this is what I'm here for. "Is this really your reasoning in all of this? Since you're so sure on yourself that I'm going to damn those people, why did you decide to come? Why don't you throw the damn lighter and damn those people there? Tell me, why am I the one who's supposed to name myself as the executioner?" My purpose was clear and he wasn't helping at all, not myself, neither himself as he didn't seem like he was able to do anything but ponder at my founded accusations. With a hand turned behind his back and the other one on it, he decided to speak. He looked at me right, eye to eye and I understood why. "I came back from burying my brother. He was broken beyond repair and couldn't be fixed. I see you looking into my eyes and realising that I'm trying but can't feel anything about it anymore. Perhaps we weren't acting as humanly as they were but we tried doing the right thing, punishing only those who deserved it. We never overextended beyond them. If my brother was on my side right he would've stopped you if he knew that, from those hundreds of possible victims, if at least one of them was innocent. I'm not my brother but at the same time, I won't drag his name through the dirt. "I looked behind him as saw nothing, the same thing I saw when I was looking at him. He explained himself but I simply didn't understand. No, I did understand, my reason was another. "I don't believe you. You don't feel anything but you claim to have honour? Don't make me laugh with your cruel and dull reason to avoid pulling the trigger on them. You're just as afraid as I am to do it and regardless of what you're going to say or what you said. I can see it in your eyes. "And I managed to keep watch on them the entire time we spoke, they were as empty as he was. Whoever or whatever made it didn't. "What's with the sudden change I see on your face?" He asked after noticing than an idea, no, a plan just spawned out of me. "No, you're wrong, so, so, so wrong. I realised the real reason you were sent here, one that you're not even aware of as it is. "And he was perfect, the solution to my problem, in a way that I couldn't have figured out by myself. Just like a scapegoat. "To release me of all my sins, getting both of us on the road to redemption. "I never felt too spiritual but this was different, not in that way but also in one that would help me leave with my consciousness clean. "And how do you intend to do that?" He asked, louder in his voice as I approached, enough to get myself into position. Truly dull like I expected, he didn't even sense or think of me as a threat. I took his arm and felt his entire body weighing nothing but as a feather's equivalent. He gasped as I took my other hand and slammed him on the other side. My hand standing between him and the fall. "What are you doing you fool? I cannot float my way up. "He said, holding my hand, with his other one being disabled, rendering him unable from crawling back up. "You still don't understand, do you? It took me some minutes from being near you and hearing about your brother. That's how much it took me. You and your brother are nothing but tools for us to use, nothing more and nothing less. "You're wrong about us. I'm alive, despite my soul being taken, don't let go. Please, I can still be of use to you. "Not the same arrogance he showed to me before, that was most certain but he would do it right. With no mistake. "You're a puppet and so was your brother. Well, perhaps not as your brother as you're about to become an effigy. "Even he wasn't expecting this and for a good reason, with my right hand, I grabbed my lighter and was ready to do. "This is where your usefulness ends. "Closer to his hand and ready to burn, I didn't notice that he raised his head, enough to hit the lighter of my hand. "Augh" I yelled and saw him fall, holding my lighter, stuck in his jaw. "You bastard!" He kept falling and under him the sea was swelling. Furious and brimmed with fire, I took my gun out, ready to fire. Another surprise he wasn't expecting, with so much blood boiling, I saw how much he clung so he wouldn't be destroyed. No clear shot, what could I do? "What's this?" On my left, I saw it now, in contrast with the foreign ground. The set of strings just stopped, letting the rest of his body stop in mid-air. He looked at me and I looked back, his jaw stuck and unable to draw. "I'm sorry it had to come to this, but you're no human. "And I felt no sympathy for it. With no regard and the hatch that could protect me stuck, this was my last option. Just seconds stood between us and a run that could save my life. This is what my life has amounted to. I aimed and fired, hitting it in sight, merely seeing it, for fractions of a second and its mouth burst into flames that would come to engulf his body. The strings released, the river turning black, I ran and stopped for nothing in my path. Afraid of what might come behind me, the only thought that stuck with me, with my each passing step were how it looked at me. Before he stopped trying to open his job, how he watched me and realised too. As we both realised that there was no way for him to escape. And as the deafening sounds from below started roaming and echoing throughout the confined space I was in. I never felt acceptance's cold stare. And it never came from him. "What are you going to do now?" He had a rifle pointed at me but didn't shoot. I wasn't sure if he was either reluctant or didn't know how to shoot a gun. "You don't have to do this Alphonse!" "It must be done Genevieve, she's reluctant to join our cause, not to mention that, even after we've given her the chance after admitting to all of us that she's a spy. Isn't that right?" I wasn't going to humiliate myself further, nor will I join the sewer rats with their dirty concubine. "You hearing me you dirty rat? I ain't nothing to say to both of you, no matter if you're going to put one between me and the gutter. ""You don't have to shoot her Alph, we're better than this, a lot better. "We were neck in neck, with his rifle ready to take the poor girl's life. "I can't and you know it too well, everyone's watching, giving me no choice in the matter. "And he was right, some stopped and watched, especially others with their ranks raised, but none interfered. They knew who we were and tried our loyalty, or at least his. I wasn't going to touch him, afraid that he might accidentally shoot her from how tense he was. She wasn't tied, she wasn't trying to run, standing on the same level as we were, waiting for a reprise. One. No. A change of tune. Just one. And it came with a sudden bang and a trunk followed by a wave of dust coming from above, making some of us fall and Alphonse misfire in the air, completely missing her. I've never felt such a strong force before, oscillating from above and below, barely keeping itself together. In the commotion, everything started falling, weapons, clocks, other inhabitants falling from ledges. She profited out of the situation and started running away, crawling away more like it, whilst anyone who could've or should've stopped her were barely able to hold themselves. "Stop her!" He yelled, and others too but it was pointless as none of us were able to keep our composure. "We need to find some cover" I barely coughed it out before I grabbed him and pulled him over, it wasn't safe for any of us. "Follow me, we need to lock the safe. It's our sacred priority. "Some of the people who guarded the place shouted, distressed, none of them thought that this could've happened. The way the roof was shaking, it made me scared to think what was happening to the other people out there. Whilst crawling and seeing all of them distresses, running away, crawling for their lives, trying to save their children from the cracking concrete made me sick. "Keep going, we're not safe yet. "A scruffy old swain came closer to both of us to help us, he welcomed us and helped another refugee in his house. Just as we stepped inside and got welcomed by the others, we regained our composure and could stand on our feet. "How come. . ?"I tried asking but he quickly responded, knowing what to say. "It's specially built for this, don't worry, it should hold a fair number of people until it's safe to go. ""And what about the others?" "Well, they're. . ""No" I interrupted him, knowing that he didn't understand. "What about the others above us?" He looked away and so did Alphonse, none of the other refugees dared look me in the eye and tell me. I looked above through the window and felt the whole strength of the impact. "What's this grim feeling inside my chest?" I asked, not knowing why it was there. "It's the weight of our sin coming down on us. ""And what's happening?" Mother and father were crying and couldn't stop holding me tightly.

"Why is the ground shaking mama? Why can't I see it, papa?" The wood was fractured and there was nothing else solid enough to hold the house together. The mosaics and the glass cups were shattering, the door clattering and in that moment, I realised there was no other way for us to escape. I looked one last time at my family, at my wife and son, wondering what have we done to deserve this. Outside, people were yelling, trying their best to find a way out of it too. "We need to escort the mayor out at all cost" The guard ignored my plea for help, treating him more highly than the rest of us. "My family needs help, please. "I tried forcing him but he threw me aside, just like the rest of them, getting ready for the escort. "We cannot help you now, the support of our town fell, we need to evacuate the mayor first. That's our priority!" Another guard backed him up as the whole platform was clattering, ready to break in half and. "Swallow us whole if you don't help. "The animals were let loose, running around, others scared in their pins, no one to nurture them nor to save. "The inquisitor died sir. We're sorry to inform you but we need to go. "The mayor had his shoulder fractured, but he was still alive. "As your appointed chief of guards, I need you to follow me right away sir. ""And abandon the people to who I swore to protect?" My office was ruined, standing at the edge of the town, from below me, I so dishearteningly understood what has occurred. Everything was ruined and burning in flames and we were about to fall there to join them in the rubble. "Sir, we need to go. "The guard yelled but I didn't care, one of the construction bars fell and separated my office in half. "It's over now. "I so grimly told him the news as I sat down in my chair, looking at the destruction. "You're. . . No longer in my service. "Afraid to do it, I said it, as my legs felt tired and so did I, looking at what we've come to. "Sir, there's still time. ""Go, now, that's an order. My. . Last one. "Loyal to an end, I couldn't ask for more from them. "I'm afraid this is where we say goodbye, my friend. "Came out of my mouth and my straight view got closer, I could practically touch it, seemingly as I was going lower. "I'm sorry sir. Troops, you heard him, spread and evacuate as many people as you can. "I took out my helmet, being able to smell the ashes from this distance. "But I can't leave you alone. "A noble thought but misplaced, I tried helping but he was a fool, trying to jump over an unstable gap. Even as a guard he was hot headed,

I turned around to see him try but slip and fall down, holding himself, barely on the edge between us. "Nooooo!" I yelled, thinking that he already fell, yet it didn't happen yet. "Gah. "His hand was impaled by one of the metal rods that used to keep the building together. "Are you all right? What was in your mind to do such an insane action?" The place was barely keeping itself together before it started cutting itself from the other side. "This is it, sir. "He raised his other hand despite bleeding. We both knew that I couldn't lift him up. "We both know there is no way out anymore. ""I know. Sir. "He shook my hand, despite being a lower man than him. "But sir, you're not allowed to. If they find out. "His wrinkled face was almost as old as mine, not to mention how much we've been through. "I think. It's quite late for that. As it is. "His whole office got swallowed and was the first building to fall. The whole platform got to turn on its side, letting the various vehicles begin to slide with it. "Guards, use your spears as you've been thought. "I tried my best to catch her but she fell down, sliding whilst in her vehicle, with a broken door and unable to exist. I heard her voice as she screamed, almost falling myself after I desperately tried reaching for her, only to get hit back and lose balance. "Keep you balance, it's only going to get harder, we still have people to evacuate. "The new captain has spoken and we were moving upside, trying our best to dodge and save as many people who were unfortunate to fall with us. "Almost there, grab my hand. "One spoken, grabbing a woman with her child, holding them as tight as they were his own. And another man grabbed, with his foot broken, his jaw rocked and spirit crushed, the very least he was alive. "Hold on for as long as you can, our duty isn't over yet. ""Captain" One of them yelled, grabbing a foot on whatever he could, trying to not get buried in the rubble. "The mayor""I know" Sadly I told the other guard, informing the rest of them too, with their spirits being crushed even more. "Yet we cannot stop. Our sacred duty to our people never ends. "The sick air was reaching us from behind, rising with the heat that would soon come to devour us. A belief held by our people from ages. They all knew the horror it would bring as we reached what now became an even higher part of the town, one that wasn't bent with the platform, we managed to set foot straight. A guard pulled another, helping each other get up and get the saved people to safety. "Lord protector. The fires haven't gotten to the intersection but we don't know how long it would take for this section to start slipping too. "Some were still trapped, I saw them in their homes, getting broken. "Wait. I'm sorry ser but there isn't anything else we can do for them anymore. "Another one crying for their lost ones and it still hasn't ended. "Let's move, now. "The fire wasn't lifting itself up, we were being driven to it. They all started moving, breaking into houses and seeking any survivors to get out of the place. The masks we wore came in handy as the tubes from where the creature had its nostrils acted as air filters, saving us from the sick air. Everywhere around us, with the grim sky, we saw how they were spilling their lungs out but we couldn't hand them our apparel as it would do them more harm than good. "Lord protector. "Another guard came by, seemingly from afar, carrying even more grim news. "Stand down. You may give me the report of the situation. "Others were searching and I was left in charge of the situation, a burden that would exceed any other lesser being. "We are being invaded, the place is being pillaged. Half of the settlers are being taken as captives on the other side of the town""What?"Furiously, my armor couldn't even keep the steam from getting out of the weakened spots and air holes. Were we being invaded and at a time like this one?"That is preposterous, how?When?"As I asked that, I grabbed my spear from its sheath and commanded the troops to regroup. "Lord, they invaded at the same time as the lower level got terminated. We're being barraged on two fronts. ""This can't be good. Down and seek refuge"I said, just as a chunk of my helmet got blown away, a quick shot from afar but I couldn't pinpoint where. The rabid winds were beating between both us and the attackers. We broke down crates and barrels, chairs and doors at my command, using them to block the upcoming barrage of shots that rained over us. "Stay clear and keep the settlers in the back. Gah"Another shot managed to find its way in my shoulder, penetrating through one of the weak points. "Keep going, we need to. We need to keep going. "Behind there was no alternative and another part of the platform we were on was going to fall. "What now?"I asked myself, with the lord protector being pinned down, far from us, not linked with the city, something was making laps on the track, watching and observing us. The sounds it made disturbed me, far beyond what I thought about before. "Gah. "Another man yelled but it wasn't one of our, it wasn't too far either. "What is it Aghdus? We need to help the others, those damn armored fools aren't giving up yet. ""I'm coming. But this thing just fell on me from there. "I pointed above but not before showing him the fat dead blob that fell on my leg. Such sharp teeth I thought at first, but crumbled in the air as I got it off of me. "It must've been caused by the rising smoke. There's no time to examine it, let's go. "He helped me get up and we continued the assault. I wasn't sure I had enough of them. "But these weapon they've given us are magnificent. Who created such marvelous things?" This maniac was going to blow a fuse over it, he almost blew that thing too as it fell over him from above. Speaking of. "The entire ceiling must be crawling with them. ""I wonder why. ""There's no time to wonder, continue going over. There will be enough time after we've driven them out. "Alphonse came just in time to order us, acting as the officer in command. Those two were headed further into their settlement, the other troops were mobilizing over the building, capturing whoever was left inside. "Tell me, Alphonse. "A voice came back, bringing back a short recollection that I tried recently forgetting. "I told you not to come, it's dangerous here. You've made your choice before we started climbing. ""You mean abusing the system of tunnels to make them suffer even more, right? Is this the reason you've come here, to finish the job?" Genevieve came after all, but not for the right reason. Unarmed and with a wound in her chest. "What happened to you on your way here?" I asked, with a hand tied behind my back, searching for something. "It doesn't matter how I got here, or how I escaped. I'm here to stop you, Alphonse, you sick, disgusting man. "She held her wound, under her guise, holding something unknown in her hand. "You lied about those kids, they never found their way down to safety. Murderer. Criminal!" We were in the middle of the revolution and she still didn't understand. "We waited for far too long for our plans to be delayed by the kind of yours and theirs. You walk here thinking yourself high and mighty, I should've known you're not better than any of them. ""Is that the reason you let them die under there? And the others too?" I still couldn't find it, with my rifle jammed, I knew what she held inside and searched for too. "So you came to get your revenge, is that right Genevieve?" No one in sight either to help me, all of them kept pushing and fighting them off, just as ordered. "And no one to see me do this. "I finally found it and pulled out my gun, a working one before pointing it at Genevieve. "So it came to this?" She asked, holding her weapon hidden, still waiting for something, yet it was too late for her. "Too late, you've squandered your chance to join us after you've been given the opportunity so many times. You knew well enough that it would come to this so don't give me this innocent look, you're anything but that. "She held her stance and didn't move an inch, standing tall and waiting for none other than me to make mine. "I never claimed to be. "I suddenly stopped as I saw other people trying to get out of their hiding spot and run away. They both noticed us standing and there's no doubt he heard it too. His rifle jammed, I made sure of that but he surprised me with his gun. A single bullet old gun, the likes of which my grandfather used to wield when he was in the war. "Wait, don't turn. You wouldn't want that, especially since I doubt you've got more than only one bullet in there. "His attention came back to me, just as he was ready to turn and see them too. They could see me too and that I was in danger, ready to intervene at any point. I knew that there was no way out of it, I nodded my head slowly so he wouldn't notice. Hoping that they understood that I didn't want them to come. Both young and she were pregnant, I wasn't going to trade their lives for mine. "You're right about it. But, I'm sure too now. That you don't have a gun either under there. "I was holding tight to it. It must've been the smoke's fault from getting into my eyes or perhaps the higher air that was getting in me. My eyes were sore about him, them, Paul and that I was trying so hard to feel more about them. He could see my arm shaking, just like his with the gun. We were both nervous. "I think. "I took a quick break after to help with clearing my throat. "I think your guys are winning. Too bad you're going to miss all the action. "His face was filled with sadness despite mine being the same old, the same old. "We both know this won't work. ""So what are you waiting for?"Just some time, is all I needed for them to escape. "I admit. I walked here, despite. That I shouldn't have. ""Now you understood.

Perhaps you shouldn't have walked into a revolution. You don't belong here and now. Now we got to the point where I'm forced to do this. "It felt like a frying pan, either the metal or we were boiling on it. The sweat ran through my fingers and on the gun too, making it even harder to retract from it. "Do you think I'll meet them again?"I asked him, despite knowing the answer, having my soul waiting for me long before I came here. "You won't make me back down. You hear me?I can't anymore. ""Then. Pull the trigger. "I didn't know what happened before. "Where is Alphonse?""I don't know, I thought he was with you. Or did he say he was rallying whoever was left behind?""Well, he was in charge after all. Let's go on. "A bang ran. "Was that from behind or beyond?""I don't know but take cover, I think I can see them approaching. "Some spears were chucked, the place was a disaster, people were screaming, others were shooting. My hands were shaking and I couldn't hold my firearm"Keep it together, one of them is coming. "One guard was charging and I was still standing defenseless. With my rifle pointed at him but I was too afraid to pull the trigger. Despite so many attempts. "Get down now"He said but it was too late, like a lance, he impaled me with it in seconds, going under my rifle and sticking it in me. "Noo"He yelled right near me, holding me still not to fall. So scared and he stood there with a spear in his stomach, I shoved my hands into his and forced him to push the trigger point blank. "Gahhhh"He yelled the other one screamed, both of them ready to fall on their own. "Why didn't you seek cover?"I told him as we slowly lowered down, making it even harder for me to watch as he tried speaking, releasing some blood out. "No time to mourn soldier. ""Alphonse"He arrived, helping me get on my own, ready to leave him behind. "He's dying captain, and. It's all my fault. ""Get to your senses man, we got a revolution to end and I can't do it alone. "I couldn't do it anymore, it sickened me, watching them fight, it was nothing I was expecting. "Did we. Do this?"I asked him sincerely as I watched the rest of my friend's life spill through his mouth. "No, but we're here to end it. "Long awaited too, we pushed and pushed, ready to overthrow their disgusting loyalty to a damned cause. "Lay down your weapons"A man said, hoping they would surrender, yet he didn't know as well as I did. He didn't go through as much as I did. They all had to pay for everything, for every moment, we had to suffer and go through. "On your left, men. They've released the inceeds. "Flying on their wings and impaling the ground with their sharp and long members, the guards released their only source of protection. "The final solution"An act of desperation and those rabids came and attacked anything they had in sight. Such a rage that they would even attack each other, their own and the guards who have taken their appearance. "Fall back. "I said, trying to guide them, seeing how we wouldn't stand the ground with both them and those behemoths. "No, push them back, we got them pinned down. ""Commander, we won't make it, can't you see?""Listen to me Alphonse, we will take them down, it's not your call in the matter. Now, at starboard attack!"He was insane and those guards too, we stood side by side, others forgetting we were at war at them, fending ourselves against them. "Gah. "One of the first have fallen and it was one of our own, as that rabid thing opened its head in half and pulled him inside with its tubes and members. "No, Stanley. ""Wait, don't get close to them. "A guard stopped him, as an enraged soldier got ready to throw himself in the mouth of another. This was the perfect time to take them down as they were distracted. "Alphonse lay down your weapon. Now it's not the time to aim at them. "Our dear captain with a thought of betrayal as the other was busy trying to impale and shoot them down, he stood in from of what could've been a perfect shot on our enemy. "You dare betray us?Have you forgotten what they did to us?""Alphonse, what has happened to you?Have you gone completely mad?""I. . . "A shot just fly, right through one of its wings, making the rabid thing fall to its knees, the much more it had, breaking them all, unable to run. "Keep it away from the settlers, we must defend them at all cost. "The platform shook again, right at the wrong time, affecting all of us, including those rabid things that weren't flying. "It's going to break again, we need to move. "Yet another that pointed it our as if it wasn't obvious what she said before. "So, what's it going to be commander?""You wouldn't dare. "The ground was trembling under me and all around everyone was retreating, befoe or enemy. "Fine, our dispute can wait until we're out of here. "He nodded and joined them, with those things behind, dying with the help of the sick smoke too. Both of them were thinking of betraying us as soon as we got to safety but we still put our trust in the people. "Move on, come. "Some stopped and we waved for the settlers to come from their hidings, not much time was left and even with the coming conflict, they were a priority. "Down, edde edde"I yelled at them so sit down, obeying my command after many tries. "Gah Blew jin gabo. "This should've made them listen and not attack us, just in case those primitive attackers dared fight us after we were done. Half of the upper level got demolished and crashed down, throwing even more of the fire in the air. "So many homes destroyed. "Said one of the settlers as we ran away from the place, with tears from her eyes, having her home and that below ruined. We suddenly stopped and it was all of us. "All mixed sir. ""Soldier and guard. "Said one. "Settler and antler. "And another one continued. With their spears raised in defence. And the rifles ready pointed at one another. "What now Alphonse?You got what you wanted. "He whispered from behind, back to back with me as we were all surrounded. To top it too, those damn things were trying to sneak on us to take us from below. "You wouldn't like to hear the worst part from all of this, would you?"Hopefully, none of the guards heard what I was about to say, a shameful act that I did. "A false threat too, as you might've noticed that my firearm is. "An even softer whisper followed, informing him of my act. "Such a sad situation, even sadder that you made me laugh with it. ""We're not going to get out of this, are we?"I asked my commander, after realising how greedy we've become to be able to finish the job and take their places. "Never have I realised how strong they were. ""Neither have I. "I told him as sudden movements that stopped after too, as they advanced on us. "Thought about us lasting such few moments. ""Were we even sent here to finish the job?"One asked, with his hands shaking, his life threatened, hanging at a needle. The commander came to the same conclusion and proceeded as such. "Lay down your weapons. It's over. "With a bitter taste in his mouth, he threw it away and got on his knees, not even being afraid of those being, neither too prideful to do so. The guards had some honour not to strike him down after his surrender. "We can't do that now, can we?We swore it, we can't lower ourselves again. "Even with my whimpering pleas, other decided to follow, throwing those weapons that were quickly chewed down and swallowed fully by those rabids. "You're the last one that has to do it. "One of the guards said, whilst everyone had their heads bent down, along with what used to be their dignity. "No. "I held my rifle high and didn't let go. "We heard what the other said to you. It is not working so lower it down. "He didn't know about the other, I reached with my hand inside my chest and saw him raise his spear, his helmet almost broken too but the one who shot him wasn't lucky enough to end his life. "Don't do it. "He made me laugh at the exact situation I was forced upon, not so long before it would end. In the last moments, I wondered. Looking way past him, even with the imminent threat laughing in front of me. I this what she saw before. I grabbed it tighter and tried moving my hand as threatening as possible. "Gllagh. "No being able to speak anymore but I managed to do it after all. Pulling the clock she had hidden inside before. One last thick. Before it stopped. "And so did the sad attempt of a revolution ended. With those who thought they were rising against the usurpers were the real ones in the first place. ""What are you talking about?"He watched through his screened box, staring at it as if it was attached to his very soul. I asked him again, demanding a response. "What are you watching?" "Oh but the seeds of your retrieval and what a show it has been, I expected nothing less from someone of your stature. ""Don't patronize me, after all, I'm not the one walking in a metal suit, going into other people's business. ""Not at all" He said with a denying tone, notes leaving his mouth holes as if they came out of a cajón. "I was pleased by your performance, really, your other name, how you played all of them. Even with the conclusion. ""You're sick, everything I did wasn't a play for you to comment on. People lives were taken and not to mention how much I had to. . ""Let me rephrase you by saying, spare me the details. Everything I see on the box is a play to me, even my entire life. That's the reason I chose to do this in the first place. ""You mean the reason you chose to become an abomination, is that right?" Even though I ended up passes onto another escort, I wasn't expecting this one to be even more obnoxious than those two I've encountered before. "Hah, don't make me laugh. Don't act like you're anything else than a tender for your being of utmost divine. It just so happens that ours acts differently towards its disciples than yours I presume. ""You can say that again. "Yet I still didn't understand how it worked, he had metal ducts coming out his back, anchoring hundreds of wires, invisible at most of the time. It didn't make any sense how they would bend without breaking whilst going throughout the tightest places. "So, what are you watching now through your screens? What could be entertaining you from carefully treading through this insane palace built underground?" "If you're so bored of watching nothing but walls and dead ends, you could always come closer to me and see what I'm seeing. I can't promise I won't bite though the wide opening comes with the suit. "He couldn't smile, despite knowing that he'd do it if he had one. It pained me to think what lay in the suit of metal he was wearing, or the reason it was molded the way it was. Though, after offering me water and something to sustain myself, I knew I could trust him, at least until I found the reason I was called forth. I got closer, with my mind set on it; he refused to answer that question the first time we met, so it would seem like he wanted me to hear directly from it. "How far does it go?" I closed my mouth as I poorly worded it. Instead of standing up to it, I try changing it a little. "How far are you going to show me?" "Well done I must say. I like how you changed it there and now, a nice touch. Though you must've thought of me being sloppy if I didn't notice it sooner, is that right?" "Just answer that question and don't despair. "Something was bashing through the halls, in the maze, we were on." "As far as you want. Well except our final destination, the world outside, and any other place beyond my reach. Well, anything and anytime, for as long as you want. Except when we get there. Fine, I should've mentioned there are some. . ""Rules. "I sighed, just when it got more interesting. "No, instead there are limitations. ""Which are like rules. ""Do you want to watch it or not?" His grip almost punctured the glass screen, making the many wires and cogs retract back into it. "I'm sorry for that, let me rephrase too. It seems like we both fell into the same trap, though. "His face had no expressions and his hands were detached, probably not the only ones in his body. In fact, I wasn't sure what held his body together, not that I would want to find out if it turned out he was the same as that wooden man. "I'd have a harder time melting bronze than burning wood. ""What was that?"He misheard me, I knew it well, as he wasn't alarmed by what I said. "Nothing, now let us see. ""Finally, what do you wish to make our journey more pleasant?To shut you up and see us well. ""Show me. . "And I whispered the name, knowing that he'd easily go through with my plea. "But not now, I want to hear what happened before. ""Before what?"He asked, not knowing well what I meant. Neither did I know what I wanted, or how far to see. So I chose with a fuse, knowing her, how she'd blow a fuse. "Just show me what she saw and how she felt. ""And what emotion would you want to see?Everything is stored here, at the tip of my fingers just waiting to be touched. And seen by you, by me, by everyone else. "Something that I wondered, ever since I saw her earlier, after we've met. I said it out loud and set foot now. "Show me. Fear. "I said, afraid not for me but for her. Wanting to know too if she and when she felt it. "From when?"""Before, anyone of the moments since we met. I don't care which one but I only need to see if she was able to feel it. ""Are you sure of that decision?It's quite a strange demand you're asking me, especially right here and now. Since there are so many others you can see. Don't worry, I won't judge, especially since I've already done that. ""It's none of your damn business, I tell you. Just show me that moment, I need nothing more for now. "He didn't deny me of my desire. Nor did my questioning cease to be. I had to know if it happened at that exact moment if she hid it or didn't know what it felt like. Strange, how I looked through the blank set of screens, waiting for something to happen. And before he gave me the answer I waited for, I thought that was it. "Very well, stare right here and don't take your eyes from it, you may be getting more than you've bargained for. "Flashes and slicks before the image formed, I saw right in and didn't break not even a fraction of my concentration. "Who is that?"""Well, he's not important. ""Where's he leading her and why did you bring us here?"""You asked me for the moment she felt fear and I delivered it. "This confused me as I didn't expect it, not answering any of the question I had in mind. "You're witnessing for the same time as I am of course. ""But haven't you already seen it all?"He immediately let me know without making any attempt to spoil it for me or. Him. "Not this part, it's. Different. "She was shoved inside the open door and locked in. "It seems like Genevie had a rough time too. ""You don't even know the rest of it. "We watched through her eyes but as the light perished, so did her voiced. I got closer to the box and looked only through one of the glass screens, concentrating on the image. So dark and silent, no one there I thought. "Is that?"I asked but expected no answer. My heart stopped for a second after seeing her come out of it, unharmed , so young and full of life. "Why are you showing me this?"I asked, not knowing what I did to get punished like that. "Move on from this, I can't look anymore. "But my eyes were locked on it with no way out. Neither she nor I did anything but look at each other through glasses screens. No tears no explanations for what transpired in front of me. "Could it really be?"I asked but it moved soon after, a hand pulled us out but not before one last time. I saw her lips moving, almost forming a speech but it was too late. "Don't do this, turn back on it, what are you doing this for?"""I'm sorry but I cannot do that anymore. ""You must. There must be a way, I have to see her again. I have to. ""I can't do that, I've already told you. I know, that room can bring out the worst in all of us. "He said, unaffected from what we've seen, rolling along to the point of vivid. The sign was turned and we both saw it clear. "It says Grief on it. But what does it mean?"""No need to get so emotional. "He whistled away, getting the screen out of my face the first chance he got. "Wait now, there's no need to do it so soon, I'm not done with it nor you. ""Calm down or you'll get addicted to it. You wouldn't want to end like I did, would you? Or is this the reason, like so many asked, why you came here?" "No, that's not it. But one another that has nothing to do with that nor with you. I just wanted to know and see more of her. I mean it. I wanted to see more of it. "Another slip that left my mouth, It would seem like the trip left me in a sloppy state. "Just wait some time, that room tends to make people more emotional than they normally are. So don't go and beat yourself to it. Since it will surely but finally get to an end. ""Just like everything in here, is that right?" Though I wanted the maze to end and neither has he answered another question, tied to the existence of a maze such deeply farther where we went. "But at least could you explain to me why is the maze slightly tilted? From the likes of it, we might as well be headed towards the core of our very earthly confinement. "I asked him as the time passed, losing its meaning as he kept staring at his magic globe, even if magic had no tie to it. Such an advance he had in his hands, staring at it so intently, not sparing any moment from it ever since we came. It wouldn't surprise me to find out that he's spying on us right now. "I could tell you that but why should I? And spare you the excitement of finding out on your own. No such thing will come out of me or my mouth. Nor my box. ""Could you at least tell me how much we have left? This felt like a never ending trip, my body was pushed to its limits. ""Hah, don't make me laugh by saying that. You don't even know your limits. "The metal suit laughed, echoing inside and outside the box he was wearing too. "Trust me, I've seen a lot of you. Something that would disturb even the farthest from faint of heart. ""Wait" I said, trying to catch him in the act. If he was lying, my trust of it would be gone. "But didn't you say you cannot see from outside?" "Well well, you clever. Wait a minute. "He said and stopped, from both our banter and mid walk. "Are you having some difficulties of mechanical nature?" "No, just something you and I may need to see, right now too. ""Fine, but make it quick. I don't have. Much time. ""That's what I thought when I saw the reflection on my glass eyes. ""Is that?" "Yes, indeed it is. And it's coming right for us. Or more likely you. "Too dark to see but I knew right away. "We need to hurry, let's go as fast as we can. "I should've known, it would seek for revenge. "I can defend you, or at least try my best. Oh, this second act we're in is turning out to be such a delight. ""Keep your eyes on the screens and look for some clues. Everywhere around and where he might be. "The walls were cold hardened, shattering my hand at the touch, no rust no dents, nothing to last. "He can't fly around anymore, he's most likely on all four. ""I think I heard him before, quite far too. ""Don't worry about that, he cannot jump over there, he'll be trapped in a loop hopefully. ""But what if he doesn't?" I daringly asked, from the looks of it, my time here wasn't going to last. "He's stronger than the other and this time, you won't have the upper hand. ""I'll break him like his brother, again and again if I have to. "Such rage and discomfort he passed, as that wooden hound hunted him. "But. ""What Is it? What do you see or what did you see in there?" "Nothing. Just a thought. "The silver statue said without a pass. "And what is it?" To which he happily replied. "How did he know you scorched his bellowed? But more importantly, how did he react, buried like a bone, by someone just like him? Well, you must be native to that feeling, right?" Another turn that looked like the other, this maze never ended and his voice never stopped spewing the bad news. "Bah, there's the exit, we're almost done. Thankfully we won't have to deal with him, nor will I pleasure you by responding to your disrespectful pox. "Though he brought a good point, he followed me without knowing. "Wait, is that really the brother? Ehm, the harstmen I believe they were called. "A question that made him raise his eyebrow, as if we only watched through his eyes. "I may not know either as we can only see through the eyes of another but not from above. "Something else was following and it wasn't too long, from the looks of it, the mark I left whilst walking on the wall appeared again on the screen. "The door is here, quickly open it. "As we came into contact, locked too and this time. "There are no tools I could use and whatever that might be, its coming straight for us. ""You're right, stay behind me, force the lock, push through, whatever you may do. He's already there, waiting for you. "I nodded my head and understood. The real reason and which confirmed my suspicion. "But it's locked, I cannot. ""Shh. "He silenced me and gave me the box, with a blank screen and no way for me, know how would I access it. "It's open now. Don't worry, it came for me. "The metal suit said, vibrating with sounds. It seemed like the time had come for the instrument to stop playing. "But why?We. We barely met. ""You tried walking into other people's lives and what did you expect to see?Just take what you came for and go back to be. ""I have nothing to come back to. "I gushed forth. "I embarked on this journey knowing that it would end with me. ""I know. We were all called here for a reason and you did good not to impact them too much. Now go. "He stopped as a giant metallic hand, another one of his kind but bigger. I couldn't see much of it as only the hand came out of the darkness and wrapped itself onto him. "He won't harm you, none will. As long as you're holding that box and keeping it still. "His hip was almost crushed, just as his waist bent, clogging the vents, breaking his very being. "I. "But nothing came, just his blood, leaving his body, crushing his organs and letting out the last sounds of the organ. "This box left me dry of feelings. A side effect you haven't warned me about. Though it seemed to me like you were just another instrument that pushed me farther to the retrieval. For that I thank you but I must go. "His hands still moved but he was now crushed between my sincerity and the hard grapple that held him from falling in pieces. The door was now open for me and I knew well that the mess I left behind, the trail that leads me here will be safely cleaned by that mysterious. "Friend. "The door was slammed and the box was still shut down, right before having to serve its new master. No vivid image but so many encryptions and bars. I understood the real reason he gave it to me, not just to be safe but to know what I was dealing with. On a valley I was, going so far ahead. Going directly to it. "A miniature that is?"What I was holding in my hands, the real one was enormous, bigger than the city. As a matter of fact, bigger than any city I've ever seen before in my entire lifespan. It was far, it would take some time and this journey turned out to me more like a test to prove me worthy of my descent here. "What is that?"In that distance I could see, despite being of such a stature, it wouldn't be completely unprotected. The lines I saw on the box were. Of course, how could I forget, the one leading me here was one of the many. Circling as going on all its sides, hundreds of them going there forever, never stopping from their walk and charge and endeavour. "I see now, so clear"Words flew out of my mouth as surprisingly I managed to get more than a glimpse of them, even if there was a great distance between us. More features that I wasn't able to see before, their size, a larger part of their appearance. Strange how they kept going on the rails, some on top and others on sides but none of them lead below, even with the pillars holding their mighty citadel. Such pressure that must've been forced upon them and still they kept it still. No rails under I assumed, or they could be avoiding it for some reason. The dirt and the grass seemed fresh as I stepped on them, no insects and no imperfections. This land must've been untouched, with one small exception. I went to see and check the mark, footsteps and much more spread across the land, leading towards the same path that was set in front of me. "Only one huh?"I wondered as once again I fell victim to the harsh air that homed the strident environment I was forced into. Only one set of tracks, which meant that only one more, just as I did, decided to come here in a while, but why? Why was this place so forbidden, so safely guided with mazes, tunnels, guardians and secrecy? I managed to do it just fine with some help, without having all of this. And now, I need to push on. "And bring you back." The last needed man that could continue with my mission. The dust has settled before me, right before the wind stopped blowing. My arrival was being felt by everyone and everything as the air tunnels from above tightened around. The closer I approached, down the hill, avoiding any possible injury since I wouldn't want to slow myself even farther. Despite being dark but not entirely, the box in my hand started glowing from the screen, making the path ahead even clearer. "I can pinpoint any feeling or any moment at any given time, huh?" I asked the cube hoping that I could get an answer, yet none followed. A close reminder that it wasn't sentient. "Show me what happened to my past.

Companion if you may. "The journey, despite being all over and so close, it still laid a great distance safely, hopefully, but great nonetheless. Something was forming and started to change. "Wait. "It stopped as something else caught my eye. I didn't see it since I was too focus on the cube I was pointed towards but. A black pit, right ahead, having a reflection from afar, pointing towards me with its muddy paw. What was it?" "Show me what's inside that pool" I asked the box, immediately changing to my command and showing me the worst. Unimaginable, bones. Too many to count, all thrown and shoved to its deepest chasm there was. Skulls, ribs and many ulnas, as if a war was fought and they all lost. "Was this place built on the foundation of dead people? Show me what happened before.

"But the box refused, changing to blank screens, dismissing my ruse. "Show it to me again then. "I asked and it complied this time. Something was blocking my previous command and I still wasn't aware why. So many of them died, all forgotten in the depths of this great channel. "Fine, show me, who or what signed me to come.

"Dismissively and untrustful, I wasn't going to approach something that would present itself with such danger.

"There. "It showed itself in the box, watching the skulls, swimming beyond them inside the dirty water. So much time has passed and it didn't drown, something told me that it wasn't humane. Quite contrary, as it wouldn't surprise me, judging my everything I've seen. I could avoid by I saw myself from the box, waving again with its hand full of dirt. It quickly threw some of it outside, waiting for me to call it out. There was no possible way for me to acknowledge it, as a beast that swam through a sea of dead souls would only seek to harm me. And a rock too, in the middle of the basin, more like a formation, raising itself from the bottom, knocking bones out of its way as it started lifting itself up. The hands helped too, pushing it above, looking as if they were alive but I knew better. The current made it look that way, pushing and bouncing them from below, yet the purpose of it was still unknown. I had no time for it but if it came to attack me, I had to be prepared. Looking through its eyes so I wouldn't despair. This thing was so distracting yet I wasn't going to throw it away yet, as the insight given by it gave me more than needed.

And then the improbable chance of receiving a great idea came. Just from thought to thought I was lead towards it.

"Give me an insight on how I may end it before it even dares approach me. "And such a device of great magnitude did, embezzling feeling and giving me the sight that I missed before. The sight that I needed. I saw through my own eyes what I didn't before. Seeing how the light perished, everything around wasn't important and saw. The scene of what happened, near me a forgotten old spear, almost covered in moss. I took and held it, quite hard, still heavy in one hand. The cube lead me well, almost attached to the other, as the right hand held the spear like no other. I wasn't curious from where it came, or why was it used, instead I tried asking. "Show me how to. . "But stopped, as it knew right away, before even saying, showing me it moving out of the way. "I understand. "I told it, as I saw where it went, the only thing left was throwing it but. "When?"Whilst asking it showed me again, it stopped, got stuck, in something from below. Looking before at it, a fin and some tales, what was it then?A sea monster of more or less, I had to get rid of it before being too late. "I'm sorry but it must be done. None shall stop me from having my run. "I almost went mad, driven with strength, at the thought of the divine box I was blessed with to get all the answers I possibly needed. "I have to do this, don't act like that. "Whatever was down there, it struggled to get out, to get free. It knew we would start or shed of blood since one way or another, one of us wasn't going to make it out. But I didn't do it. "Can you hear me?"I asked it and saw the screen shaking as I watched through the eyes. "Wait. What am I holding?"Absorbed from it, I backed away. "What just happened?How much time did I spend here?"I was farther behind as if I didn't move, with nothing in my hands except the cube. "There's no pool. You tricked me. "And so it did, making it look so real and wasted so much time. "Don't do that again. "I said whilst looking away, avoiding eye contact with it and kept going my way. Having to jog and not abandon it, if he was right and this kept me safe, it would seem like I couldn't live without it anyway. But was it worth it for what I was on?"Why won't you look at me?Come on, just a glance. I promise I won't tell anyone. "The voice of Genevie rang through it, something that happened from before, but there was no way it could show us from there. I didn't look. "There's no way I'll look again, I know how to deal with your kind. "The worst type of memento tried dragging me away. It would seem like ignoring it would become the most certain source of action I had to take. "Why are you doing this?You know you want it. "It kept trying to lure me in but I wouldn't pass. "Focus on the road. "But strangely it gave me a pass, even for a second, it averted me from tripping on a bad turn of land, for its interest I suppose so it wouldn't fall and break. "Sensitive I presume. ""You wouldn't dare since you've got to remind yourself. "Switching the voice and trying to use me instead of it being the other way around. "He won't harm you, none will. As long as you're holding that box and keeping it still. "It repeated what it said, making itself sound alive and I was afraid that it might as well be. "You won't make me look, I'm better than that. I've gone through worse, despite the trouble and my failures I left behind on my path, I will not go down at the hands of a device such as you. You're not my master and I am not a slave of your bindings. "I said my share and I wasn't going to entertain it with even more. "You can't go without me, despite how many lies you're trying to feed yourself with. Don't make me laugh. "The voice of Paul came through and went to the other, the first and foremost, dying because of me. "It wasn't my fault"But he interrupted me, trying to show me what guilt feels like. I knew it too well, even without his help. "It was your fault that I died. Your fault that I was dragged into. ""This will not work on me, he knew well that he'd risk his life""But did he?"The voice changed back to the one that belongs to Genevie. "Did he knew that when you two first met. Have I known that?""I can't know what Genevie thought nor what she thinks about me. ""But that didn't stop you from dragging them here along to your desperate attempt to get him back. ""You know?"I asked and he responded, proving me, time after time that there was more to the box than I thought. If the place I was heading towards was the perfect image of what I honed in my hands, I was not prepared to face it. Not even a little, I wasn't sure I could make it there with it intact. "I do know, but do you know why I came here?"His voice changed to him. Sam was here. Yet I couldn't watch, not without risking to be enticed in it again. "His. The voice sounds so real. ""Indeed, it is, as clear as a mockingbird. So, tell me, are you not interested in finding out what I've done?How he got here?How I got here?""I know you're not Sam so stop trying to prove me otherwise. Don't you dare drag his name into the mud as you've done with others. I can still break you like any other piece of equipment I did before. "It was silent for a while, finally quenched after my bluff went through, hopefully, it would stay so I wouldn't be forced to break it into pieces. "It's so close, I can almost reach it. "Again it started talking but with my voice instead. "I can save him, this is the reason I came here for"Was it really me?My voice, my being my soul talking?Snap out of it before it's too late. "But what will happen to me after?"Ignore it, as long as you're doing so, he cannot reach to you. Not in a thousand tries. "Did I really come here for him or for a selfish reason?"Pointless likes and destructive implies, everything I did was. "But if that's so, how come I abandoned and used so many, sacrificed their good beings just to get here?Burning them alive, abandoning their lives. What have I become, what will I become from now on?"I couldn't let it get through my head. "Shut up!"I yelled at it, still trying my best not to look at it. A damp large cloth from behind, I took it whilst quickly looting from before. "Show me, show yourself your true nature. So you won't forget, so you won't ignore who you are. "This should do it, safety only whilst hold it, assumingly if I was lied to. Yet he hasn't said It couldn't be covered or muffled. "You can mask me as much as you want. But you can't hide from your true self. I will not be silenced. "But it would fall. "No, I've had enough of your lies, it's time to shut you up for good. "With my one hand, I was ready but not yet. "Would you even hush me?"I immediately covered it with no breaks and no remorse for my fellow human being. "No, you're not human, you're a damn machine, even less than one, a box full of lies. "So muffled that I couldn't see nor hear it, treating me as if should've done it from the start. Acting like it was once supposed to be, a tool for my arrival. "I will no longer be slowed or fooled into feeling empathy towards items that aren't even par on being close to my equal. "So many of them broken on my way here, what did it think it was to criticise me?To attempt on delaying me?Despite that and being silenced, the light, the glow, it still came from the sheet that covered. Cold in my hands too, same as before despite having a layer directly separating ourselves from one another. "Would you even hush me?"Tempting but I would not do it. "Would you even hush me?"Again it repeated itself trying to annoy me, to break me again. An instrument of my choosing that started out so well ended up being a tool that tries tormenting me. Once again it said it in her voice, the same one I wouldn't even dare think about her name. Not even after. "Enough of it or I will break you into pieces. "And a stone, the same one that I passed before, down the hill came to be near me once again. "How can you even know her voice and what she's done?Has he not had the decency to tell me the truth about your damned engine?Or perhaps you're so willingly joyful to join your master after he got crushed too. "I lifted it up in the air and knowingly looked on another side, avoiding even the smallest glance towards the bottom screen that would be so deeply exposed to me for seconds. "Wait, you still need me. Just as much as I need you to carry me there. "A voice that was unrecognisable came from it, such a vast range of people that were in the town I once eagerly looked forth. "Another trick so you could prolong your lifespan?Haha, it won't work on me, fro what's coming ahead requires me to have no distractions. ""But, before you do it, remember your choice. Have that in mind, I can call a truce, for now, you can trust me that I won't lie.

""Why would I?What's stopping me from breaking you right here and now?After you've been trying to psychologically harm me for such an extended period. "I held it down as my arm tired, ready to think about giving it a second chance if my heart desired. "I can't speak another way. Just the words others may say. ""Enough of the nonsense, you know I can't stand it. I'm aware you've watched me before with others, knowing my preferences and noticed that my patience can go so thin. I'm willing to give you another chance, but at the first sign of you becoming an annoyance. Well, something that I should've done before, break all of your screens and walk there with the shards and a broken box. "I wasn't going to use it for long, even after I was done with whatever laid beyond the entrance I was heading to. The pillars getting bigger too. Just a sight though as I had not even an idea, couldn't even comprehend how massive it would be from where I stood. "We're almost there. "It said so jolly, right after we passed the spot of its possible destruction. "Use one voice, once that I don't recognise or else I may be tempted to end you again. ""As you wish""I'm not your master, just in case you were going to say it. ""Whatever you say. But how about you remove this over so I may have a sight?"That sounded surprising, just as we passed and got closer, it made me think a little. Could it see beyond its own glasses?"What do you see now?"I asked, whilst having my sight towards the road. "Nothing but below, your footsteps walking on their corpses. ""What have I told you about speaking so poorly?I could have you broken at any time, let me remind you. ""I'm only telling you the truth about what has inquired. How many fell, fought and died on this spot. Just to end up being walked at feet like yours. "Like mine, he said, which made me think. Were those my footsteps before?Another reason, yet again and again. "I'm not going to even release your sight from over there, that I can promise to you. "Not after what I have realised. It couldn't be trusted despite what it said. "Yet, I have to use the information I presume you'll still present to me, wilfully and submissively especially since your sentence lies in my hand now. ""So be it, caretaker, I know you can be a man of your word. That, if it wasn't falsely given. "It said, reverting to its previous voice, going through as much as it could. "Here it lays, finally and we're close too. ""Well, my new master. "I stopped it right there, giving it a shake or two, clearly displeasing it as I managed to not only interrupt it but also help its following words transform into buzzing noises. "Don't call me that, don't you ever call me that. Are we done with the mockery or shall I lay the next period of discomfort onto you?""Enough. I got the point. But have you?You won't like what's on the other side. And neither will I. If I came into contact with them again. "It said with different voices, one assigned to each sentence, giving birth to a peculiar event that transpired in my ears. Though, it kept intriguing me, not it but what laid inside the giant box in the sky. "So, aren't you going to ask?What's inside there?Who is it?""Knock it off with the different voices, set yourself onto just one and keep at it. And don't change into you know who or any other that I so previously encountered. ""Fine, so be it. But, tell me now, aren't you curious, shouldn't I spoil it for you so you'd be prepared to face it even more?""Why?We're almost there, shut up, for now, I got to concentrate. "Just there, under the massive construct, held by pillars moulded, burn and melted on the ground. "Are these faces sculpted on them?"I asked as I saw hundreds of them on all pillars. They looked like graphite but also slate, losing their edges and depth in darkness, different expressions but all in pain. "Whoever sculpted these must've placed a lot of work, all of them are real. ""Were real. "It corrected me whilst giving the indication of the time that left. "Why are they screaming?Who made them?You're supposed to know everything that's happening here, isn't that right?"I asked the box standing in front of its descendant. "That's correct but not at all. I have no knowledge I could pass to you, not under here and not now. ""We had a deal, remember?Perhaps a little more motion should put you in your place. "Arguing with a box didn't lead me nowhere and neither did my rashness. "I'm sorry but I cannot do that now. Not under here. "Strange how it suddenly became reluctant to do so after being in the presence of the bigger cube. Something was scaring it, a tool that wasn't supposed to feel anything. Neither pain when I shook it, neither fear before when I threatened to break it, so why now?"Fine, it's not important who built those pillars or why are they holding it, but how do we get in?That shouldn't be any problem telling me, right?"Even the wind was silent at my call, swallowed by those melted faces, holding it between their placed positions. Either ignored or it reverted back, the light that shined through faded into black. "Bah, useless thing. "My hands even more tired now, after holding it so much, I doubt it helped me in the long run anyway. I left it behind as it started malfunctioning, disregarding the elongated advice I was sadly given. "This is it now?"No voice and no one here left alone with no clear entry. So far I longed to get to this place, just to. "I see. "Above me, I noticed the way in was not born through a pair of stairs or anything of that sort. But a doorway directly under it. I looked around too and saw what would end up being my way of reaching it. Touching face after face, defiling the creation, shoving my hand in their mouth to pull myself higher in the air. Climbing whilst grabbing their teeth, entering their empty eye sockets, emptying whatever defile thing set their nets inside them and placing my feet soon after. "I will enter and face whatever lays behind you alone as I must've done a long time ago. I got no idea if you can hear me or now, you disgusting being that dare call yourself celestial. "The pillars were tall, almost governing under the cube, yet I had no fear of falling down as I felt like they held my feet and hands stuck in their teeth just enough to reach the next one and lift myself even further above. "The time for my ascend has come, right after the continuum descend I've been forced into to arrive here. "Just one more to reach it. Another one to be able to finally be forgiven. "I'm almost here, don't wait for me any longer as I finally arrived. "With each one, each step made, I got closer towards it, the door, the trap, the gap that would lead me to it. "I'm so close to it. "Feeling no hunger and no pain, so high above the ground, dismissing what was left of the despair I felt before. I reached the top in the end and felt released. Just as the metal, so cold in my hands, it didn't matter. Neither did the wounds on them, from almost being chewed up and punctured. "I made it. "And could finally grasp some air, feeling its roughness against my skin as I was held by nothing in my attempt. "Open already, just open at my command!I have lost enough time on this rubbish journey. So much, why won't you open?"I asked it, expecting a response from the other side, a hand, or a grasp to take me inside, same as in the vision. The pain was starting to kick in as my legs were chewed. "Stop that and let me in. I can't stay like this any longer. Why won't you let me inside?"I asked again but the door didn't have a handle, the hatch had no crank, the entry had no way for me to force nor to break in. My time was running over and still not in. "Gah. Let me. I won't be denied. My entry was promised a long time ago"So painful, blood ran through, no one answered and neither did you. Genevie at my call. Sam wasn't there. Neither was she. "I can't hold on any longer. "On the empty side of a sightless cube, getting ready to faint, the distance was too far. "I can't stand that fall, let me in. Bah. "I couldn't stop them, the faces were doing so, chewing through, my every cord, socks, shoes, getting to bone. "I won't abandon you. It will die unattended, you can't do this to me. To us. To any of us. Gah"My feet were broken and my feet got skewered, letting me fall from above to my inevitable cessation. "Nooo. "Right as it opened. "Too late. "As my blood ran through the pillar, closely to reach the ground, yet it wasn't as fast as I. My feet felt numb as I had nothing else to say. Too late. Before reaching the ground. "Noo, professor Presley. "He feel with his feet broken, bloody and beaten. His head too, bleeds, his eyes wide open, the consciousness that he once held was now lost. "Save him, do whatever you must. "I yelled at him, there was still time. "I'm not sure we can do that Sam. ""Do it, we can still, it worked for us, many times, save him no matter the cost that will come. I'll sacrifice whatever I must. He's the key in all of it. ""Is he still awake?"He jumped there and grabbed him, lifting him upside. Whatever was left, connecting the joints, broken down with his feet. Such a backlash from the fall, feet broken and bleeding, his head trauma screaming. "Come one, we got to bring him to it. "I said whilst we were rushing, avoiding everything and everyone at the cost of it. "Do you really have that much faith in him?"He asked the professor. After what we've been through, after what I've done. "I owe this to him. "The lights blew right into my eyes, distracting me from what was occurring. "How much time has passed professor?"Hand in hand with him whilst being carried, he promised to save my mother. He came here, and gone through worse just to bring me back just to die?"His spine was shattered too. I fear that we don't have any less that we would've had at this point. ""Go, now!"A brim of twilight flew through the curtains. A fight could be heard from not so afar, someone was talking. Yet another fallen one found his way to me. "Is he?I understand. "Nothing made sense so far and there was nothing nor not one person that could explain to me what has occurred. The bed was soft, softer than what I was used to. "Could someone shut down the light? It's hard to see. "I asked so casually despite not knowing. "Don't be so silly, we can't shut down the sun. "A matron stood near my bed, gently shrivelling her finger between my curls. "I'm sorry, but I'm not sure we met each other. Who are you?"She stood there blocking the mighty rays that once so deeply disturbed my focus. "Oh but we met before if you don't mind. At supper. ""Is that so?"I asked, knowingly that she was telling the truth. Such an embodied mask, with fluffs and feathers, golden dust. "Why are you still wearing the mask?"I asked confused. She took one of my hands and placed me. Feeling what I was wearing as the time went on. "They're waiting for us, all of them. In the ballroom, the menagerie, the dinner room and the foremost supper. ""But I'm not dressed well for it. Agh"My head hurt for a moment there and what I saw in front wasn't clear. The room ruined, broken, withered and dead. Before coming back to see her well. "Are you feeling right dear?Did something happen""Nothing, not at all, don't worry. "Her jaw fell behind there but it was a mere distraction, nothing of that sort was possible. "Then let's go. May I accompany you?"I asked, lifting myself, with my suit on well dressed and straight despite sleeping in it. "You may. "I kissed her hand and held it tight, entering the next room accompanied by such a delight. Her dress ribboned, black and red, feathers from a bird that was most likely dead. By know, we both noticed something was wrong. Barely anyone was dancing, walking around, presenting a dire situation. "What's the matter now?"I asked one of the attendees, trying my best to help however I could. "It's nothing, I'm just feeling sad ever since I fell down. "Sadly mistaken of what I originally saw, he spilt his drink on him and on the floor too, running through a long stream spreading everywhere. "Is there no one who could clean this mess?"I can clean after myself, don't worry. Right after I'll. Grab hold of my strength again. "His mask was too chipped just like he appeared to be. Whatever was in that drink he had, spilling out of him too, must've been injuring him despite his awareness. So well as it reached the windows, that it made me curious to see what laid outside. "Wait, you don't need to see what's there. Come on, we need to go. "She came out of nowhere and blocked me when I tried seeing the world. "It's okay then, perhaps I'll get to see the outside world myself instead of looking at it through a glass. "A flash came through my head right then, reminding me of something. Quickly forgotten soon after, well, if it wasn't for the help of her banter right before it. "Don't worry about that, you've got all the time in the world you absurd oaf. Now, may we continue our small walk?"I couldn't let her go unattended. Though they managed to distract me a little, will it be with their cut curtains that were eaten by one?Or another that kept walking in circles. "The daily activities have sure changed. ""They sure did. "She comforted me and was right too when she said it. They were never as entertaining as they were now. "But what is that I see, looking at us through the almost opened door?" Someone who looked special, not wearing a mask at all, rapidly going around and going back from where he originally came. "Ignore him, don't trouble yourself with such a sewer rat. He will get this place dirty. Well dirtier than it is. You're one of us now, don't you forget that. "Such a smile she gave me to hold, so much spite and hate behind it, filled with rage. Something I wasn't able to see and couldn't see unprovoked. "We need to keep moving, from room to room now, until we get to the guest of honour. "She said without giving me a clue. Despite indicating otherwise. "I thought I was the guest of honour""Well, you're not. "Cold, just as her dress. "I thought you were black with red too. "So quickly she changed, not just in appearance but in spirit too. "Is the place also melting? Are the curtains fading?" It looked like it for some reason. "No, it must be your imagination. Let's go and fix him""Fix who?" I wondered, I wasn't a doctor, neither was she. Dancing around with me, going through the places we'd normally be if we chose to go to by chance. "Some wine?" Near the table we were, standing in the hall with too many guests next to each other. "Weren't we in the ballroom?" I friendly asked, after seeing how such a casual manner and act they were all into. "We were and now we're not. Why aren't you enjoying yourself like the rest of us?" She pointed out, yet none of them were doing so, sad faces, desperation and all. Looking down, missing pieces of their costumes. "Ehm, I said like the rest of us" And the room suddenly bloomed, the night outside, the lights inside almost bursting to cinders. The bright red covered the curtains, the chairs stronger, the yellow and the sun. I couldn't see the edges, all lost in the dark, a small triangle was shaken with to make a pitch. The room got wildly more lively with an enthusiastic manner, drinking the wine and going through the supper. I couldn't see anything beyond the masks but none of them worse anything like the other. "Such a lively event" One said to the other, nonchalantly of course. "Care to take a walk outside? I think that I'm feeling quite nauseous from all the good mood. "Such a farce she made, giggling inside, showing nothing outside. Despite her saying so, the others were still rejoicing, celebrating through the course they were so going about. Yet none other than her approached me, not a whisper, not a sight. "Give me a minute and I'll join you. "I told her as I turned back to them, seeing their half of their faces changing whilst trying to hide it. Were they hiding from me or her? Such disrespectfully for such a praise respectfully event. "I think I need some fresh air too. It would seem like the attitude here is slowly changing to being rotten. "She nodded before I joined her, wanting to be away from them and their lousy manners. Though I had another reason for it, seeing as they were standing in a room that wasn't really like itself. The food was so long departed from its original state, bashing through their hard faces, not eating a pinch. It scared me to think that I was like them, rotten not only outside but inside. She didn't notice, wishful thinking. And we went through, arriving at the foyer, the stairs were long leading towards the entrance, the exit and many more paths. Some that I would like to explore, some of the tenants, others that looked interesting. One tied to a pole, a column, quite old. He looked unhappy but so would I be, in his place tied to such an awkward event. That becomes, the guest treated like animals the more I went through. "Are those two fighting?" I asked whilst backing away, both of us stood there, out of harm's way. "Let them duke it out, then we'll be fine. Or shall we call someone to escort them outside?" "But that's where we're headed, isn't that right? "Such daringly and unfrightened I asked her back. She noted that too. The only one who seemed interested in my person, not like the others. Who glanced for once then went back to their business. Or started too much, acting as if they didn't if I returned the favour. Forced to look down, thinking I would be shamed because something I have done, or something I was recklessly forced into. Yet I couldn't feel it. "I will break your neck you puritan. "The fight got worse, and other seemed to take noticed of that too. At each other's throats like wild dogs, pulling one, then the other. Their ties now strangling, ready to snap one another at a wild plum and for what? No one dares walk into them and it would seem like the situation would depart into mad ways. "Wait a minute you two. "She stopped me from advancing in their position and issued me to stop in my tracks. "It's not the time nor the place. Let the custodian handle these sort of. Problems. "A bickering voice said so before a giant man came. Such a large swain, his arms bigger than his body. I've never actually thought about seeing such a stature into a fellow guy. A grunt came before grabbing both of them by their collars, lifting them above. One spilt his one drink that he desperately tried not spilling previously in the fight, now to fall and dirty the certainly well crafted suit he was wearing. It maddened the brute, causing him to spasm and flail them around, causing nausea and discomfort to them and everyone around. We didn't watch for long as she kept trying to lure me away towards what she thought to be. "More important matters. ""But what could be more important than this? And where is he taking them?" Both were taken subsequently, like children by an angry parent, deserving yet frustratingly overexaggerating with the punishment. "Oh don't worry about them. They will be re-educated I presume. Never had to deal with him before and hopefully never going to have to deal with again. "She said whilst blinking an eye, making a sign, hoping she wouldn't suffer the same fate as those dirty persecutors. And how right was she about the punishment they so highly earned and deserved. I took a step farther than that. "May I open the door for you, madame?" Quite the ring on it, a fluctuation of sounds came out of my very mouth. Made me feel even strange with each specific action I've made. "You may. But don't make me wait too long. "She stepped in, then out. I followed. "The courtyard I see. ""And the gardens too. "Cutting, chopping, completing the scenery that related in my mind. "Isn't quite early for them to work?""Don't you mean night?" She asked, confused. As, didn't she check out, the light of the sun?" "Wait, wasn't it day a second ago?" The mood changed too, and the gardeners left, messing with my perception of time and space. "You're really going to tire yourself if you keep doing that. ""Doing what? "I asked, relating to what? I couldn't do it with her since she wasn't as confused as I was. But keeping calm and trying to pass through it unhinged and unshaken was my priority. And what said she before?" "Oh yeah, is the guest of honour outside?" "No" She answered, before readying herself to add some more. "I just wanted to show you the outside, the floor and the robe. "Such a robe covered her dress and all above. "When did you get that?" "Before heading outside, or did you miss that too? Just come with me, I'll explain the rest. "Hand in hand we walked together, no one around to see nor disturb us. I wasn't sure about her game, neither why she wanted to show me around here. Yet, she enticed me in her web and I couldn't escape. For some reason, my darkest thoughts vanished and I wanted nothing more than following her. Those tusks, the blue roses and her gallant knight near her. "Did you enjoy yourself in the sudden but long time we've been together?" She asked whilst the light of the moon, so blue and white followed us despite having the spot taken by us. With no other sound but the one of her voice, the cracks made by our steps on the hard stone we've been walking. The fallen sticks we crushed as we made our way to a small bench, in front of a wooden house made out of wooden hinges. "It's been waiting for us. "She said with a smirk, the mask got shallower, tighter around her face, whitening, closely to leaving her to become pale. "What are you hiding behind that robe?" I perilously asked the moment when we both stepped on the swing that helped us pass. The border that stood between us was no longer there. So close to one another. I close my eyes knowingly that she would do the same. Slowly as the moon's light started fading too, right above us as the time ticked its last tongue. And in the gap, the second before it. "Professor. "I heard a whisper. No. I heard a shout. Reminding me to open my eyes to see the empty shell that she was. For only one glance that was enough. Enough to remind me before turning back. Despite the image come back, I couldn't keep up with it. I grabbed the chains and took a stride away, pulling them, stripping them, ripping it apart. She fell with the swing, breaking the bench too, looking at me so confused. That I wasn't swallowing her deceptions anymore. "What have you done, you complete imbecile!" She yelled too, taking note from whoever did the same a while ago. I didn't understand her invite for conflict but soon after it came to be. "You need to go now, hide before it comes and grabs you. We need you alive for what counts the most. "Something was pounding, its path impaired. "Behind the door, it almost breaks through, go and hide, I'll distract it before it leaves. "She kept saying, explaining herself and her reason for doing so. "Wait, but I've done nothing to provoke such a comfort. "I haven't calculated right, the force what happened to her. With both hands fractured yet she felt no pain, the chain almost welded. With one of her hands, now stricken too, her true identity truly revealed. Empathy filled me as I felt bad too, her pain, her desperation and seemingly fear for what was going to occur next flew into me as if a part of her blood stream came into mine. And the feelings alone weren't the only ones that were like that, neither did the slight pain, a connection of some sort that wasn't fully developed between us, that was disabled right when it was about to flourish and come to live. It. . "I can't get up" She said and right as I was ready to help her out, to attempt to redeem myself from the heinous act I've done. It grabbed me with all its might, grabbed like no other was before me. "It's bigger than what I was before, isn't it?" I thought about it and asked it out loud as I thought I was imagining all of it. "Gah" A slight squeeze let out a lot of pain and so did my endless struggle to get out of its grip. The more he did it, squeeze then merely release the pressure, the image of reality flashed through. Even if neither of them lasted long, I could see that the hand wrapped around me was a lot bigger and worse than it originally seemed. "Don't take him. Release him at once!" She tried stopping him but he's already made his mind, taking and heading me towards something. I tried my best, despite not expecting it to work, since it has never worked to wiggle out of a tight hold, even when it was tried by the slimmest of the people. She tried but couldn't follow, his hand held me in front and I couldn't see him. The grip was too tight so I couldn't move, confined against my will and those of hers. "At least couldn't you tell me where we're going?" And he didn't tell me, acting like a baboon, following a serpent's orders, since I couldn't call any other name for someone that would so desperately hire such an enforcer to restrain those who try resisting. "Let me go at once, I've got an appointment. "I tried appealing at first, since trying to forcibly get out of his restraint failed. No word, still just mutts from behind and a grip that wouldn't even let me breathe properly. He shoved, almost throwing the door out of the way, the same one that was so seemingly well treated before it came into contact with him. The other one, to which he's used to breaking it open, managed to bruise it too, damaging it with merely a faint pull. What was his strength? I fearfully, though, wondering further what could he possibly do to me if I angered it. His hand was thick, even if I dared try angering it, I couldn't even scratch. "You must be packing some few horns under those gloves chum" But no response and he didn't even do anything to imply he would put me down. I had to be carried throughout the mansion in front of so many people staring and whispering discreetly. "Where are we going? Not much of a talker are you?" Though he must've done some of it whilst goes around corners and peeping at

us. How else did he know what I've done? The way got only paler and more deserted as we entered another grand room. "Kind of hot in here, don't you think?" This must've been the maintenance room, lots of stairs and giant cogs swirling around to the mechanism of someone's doing. "What's this place? Come on, you've got to give me something at least. "His note was already set, despite my attempts to interact with him. He never tired, even as he climbed the stairs with me on his side, accompanied by my weight, both bodily and words. This place was abandoned, at least the wing of the manner towards where we were heading towards. The cogs and the pipes weren't only there, but as we got farther they started coming out of the walls, halls, even come entangled around the stairs, forcing us to go around them. What kind of correction was I supposed to be forced to forgo? We passed so many of them as we close on the top, the spiral set of stairs. An opening I saw, going through my head as the plan formulated. I only needed a few seconds to escape if the probability of him slipping on it and falling were in my favour. A long forgotten mannequin rested its hand on the stairs, not so front of us, coming right off the wall, right from the other side and it would so lightly seem like it would be his downfall, one way or another. Cracked and old from the looks of it, hopefully, it wouldn't be so frail. He got closer and when the time come. It shattered under his feet as if it meant nothing to him, not even acknowledging it. "Wait a minute. "Another thought came to mind, as the enforcer of somebody's will seemed to be set on another set of rules. Yet would he follow them himself? "Property damage I see, you've done it by your own doing. Such an outrageous act you've committed and you have to pay for it. "I clenched my hands, hoping it would work, but he didn't seem to listen to my voice at all. "Not even now as I caught you in this act? I promise you that. . "He shut me up immediately but not by hand, showing me what laid ahead instead. "Are going to a junkyard?" But I couldn't stop trying, attempting my best to gain his trust as the place we were going didn't seem to be safe. He slowed down, taking his time and I had no idea why he did it. So many objects and spare parts were thrown around, the room had a statue with a head for its own. Each of them opened their mouths, made out of metal with pipes and other coming out of their necks and other parts. Was this the reason so many machines tried powering it up?" Hold off a minute, why are you bringing me to it? What could be the reason for? Troubling yourself?" Suddenly, re-education didn't seem like the best thought that ran in my head, a grimmer, darker one flew through. They could shred me to pieces judging by the size of them, in case they didn't go deeper than that. Could they be full bodily buried inside the mansion? I still had time to struggle as a great deal of matters laid forth between us. And I had no time to admire its elegance nor the floral assortment inside the room. With the steam just barely starting to come out of their mouth, eyes close but the heat grew hotter as we got closer to its possible source. "Don't bring me to those. Those. . Those mouth of hell. "Bah, that didn't work and I don't know why I even expected it to be otherwise. "Help, someone! Anybody!" But they wouldn't have time to reach me. The grip didn't let me move freely around, neither could I reach the various thrown trash that laid around the room. If my suspicion was correct and this turned out to be an incinerator for the various objects that needed to be taken care off. If I turned out to be one of them. The time to worry about it had to come later as it distracted me long enough. Think Pres, think. His arm had some sleeves but that didn't help, the heat must've slowed him down, it would do that too if I were his size. The sweat must've got to him that we slowed down even more with each step, barely reaching the floor, creating seisms when they finally did it. "No one is coming to my rehabilitation I see. "Silent until the end, giving no thought to me, which really meant he probably didn't even give notion to what I was doing. I look on the side and saw his hands wrapped around my body, all locked into position, there was no way for me to unwrap them with my bare hands. A pipe that was torn apart more likely, as we passed I managed to grab it, as soon as we got near it. Just in time too, as steam came out of the three heads, getting ready, slightly opening their mouths. He didn't do nor act upon me grabbing it, giving not even a notion of me doing so. Iron lead but bent towards the wrong side. I had no idea how massive was he, other than the power he generated whilst stepping down, so attempting to swing at him backwards would be too bold for me to do. There was still time and a lot more than one way to cause chaos. And in it, my possible attempt of escape would arrive. So long and handy, I used it and pulled as many junks over, trying to make him trip, despite there being chances of him falling on me and crushing my bones, I would take that over being burnt alive. Many of them fell apart, yet none managed to make him fall, pots got crushed, coal, needle stacks and fans all of them didn't even matter at all. I flailed it as often as I could, breaking pots, bringing books down too. Who could be so insane to destroy books? It was more than a tragedy, but such a think would fall onto me the minute we got in front of them. With their mouths almost entirely open, nothing visible from all the steam going toward the open like tower formation above them, leaving to an open hole. We were that close and my options were still limited. Will he throw me in or let me go? Did he wait for me to act upon it? What could be the reason for his sudden pause, other than. It. He released me and I fell down, feeling the release as if the entire pressure that he inserted inside me suddenly vanished. Yet I still fell on my knees, barely supporting myself with the help of the pipe I managed to take on our way here. He was still there, behind but I wasn't going to turn and see. The mouths still haven't closed as of yet and neither have their curls and moustaches melted. One of three ways for me to go and it felt like I was forced myself to jump into the fire. By my own doing as there was no way out, the brute held more than enough of the tight space that leads through here. And neither was the option of me overpowering him good enough to take the risk. My one and only chance were simple, seemingly as he didn't care enough to take the pipe away from me. Again, I would have to rely on chances, that would be slightly against me once again. If those heads didn't close the mouths, just enough to get stuck inside their throats, I could try climbing my way out. Bah, even with so many delays and given the time to jump and put an end to my own life, still no one came to my rescue. Who could blame them, though? None of them stood a chance, neither united nor otherwise. "It would seem like It's time for me to join those two gentlemen I've seen before. Though I haven't realised this was the way they were. Taken care of. "The way he sniffed behind my back and from such a distance too. It had a greater temperature than the one coming from the incinerator. "No turning back. "And definitely, no way to fight him one on one. At least I would go down standing on my two feet, with a pole in my hands, ready to. Jump. In the middle as no chance was given, rushed into it by the hand that came again from behind my back. Temporarily blinded by the steam that felt as if it travelled into my every orifice, yet the heat that I felt whilst doing it hasn't changed. Instinctively or pushed by my sub-conscience, I stopped myself from falling. Stuck between the vents, I saw how above me, the mouths closed, their necks combined, all of them leading the same path. I wasn't able to speak with all the steam impairing me from trying, but not my thoughts. With the illusion of choice shattered, it added, even more, wood to the coming fire, making me realise that there was no way for me to forcibly open it. It must be iron or arfentanite, enough used to resist an entire assault or such. A leap of faith was needed, in hopes that I would be wrong about this being an incinerator, even with the chances against me. I looked upon it, just as the pipe broke, along with any doubt or wilful thought of changing my mind. "Gah. "Something came out of my mouth after all, right after I hit my back on the walls, then fronts. The neck ran down through the mansion, twisting and changing paths. From falling down, I transitioned to down sliding inside the bowels of the three-headed judges. For there was nothing else to suggest anything else about them than that. My face covered by my hands as I was unable to pull my clothes over my mouth, strictly stuck, almost glued onto me. Peculiar as I strapped my hands on my face, blocking as much of the white air as possible. The duct had holes and bumps that I had to suffer the consequence of, being lead through the rust, grown fungi and occasionally slightly puncture in the system. I saw even if it took a second, a glimpse through the cracks. Something unbearable that I had to quickly move my thought away from. Right with the flash of light, the change of vision and the most horrific timing I've ever gotten to witness and regret witnessing. The horrifying giant faced fiend, hiding its body, covered in a mouldy attire, tied with many wires. So many things I've seen through that glance, as what I saw registered through, enough to keep processing whilst I kept sliding. And its slender three hands, pointy and sharp, ripping apart people and shoving them in livery. I thought it saw me with its creepy eyes, uncut jaw and part of hearing that wasn't missing from the light. Hanging by his own cords, dangling for his own concord. I thought it saw me and it smile but remembered that it had no teeth nor a mouth too. The steam kept streaming throughout the session, blocking my perception and keeping me secure on my own thoughts. The face and his attire, his bloody guts made me fear, remember his grasp and its scene. It wanted me to remember, it wanted me to fear. I wasn't going into the fire, I was going through worse, heading towards it no doubt, else. "Why would it smile at me the same as it did?"Confusion made me take a rash decision once again, letting enough space for steam come in my mouth and almost make me puke it out. No doubt that someone would have to clean it off and it wasn't me. So long was the vent and with such distraction, it never occurred to me to question why it was that I felt no back pain from being rubbed against such an environment I was forced into. And why hasn't my pipe reached me yet?Another thought made me question it no longer, as it changed direction, venturing even more contorted places. The source of all the steam was getting close and I could feel no fire. Instead, I felt the fear once again, the one of ending at the hands of. "Bah. "This time, no steam came out, as I was thrown on a dark terrace, the hatch with open grills let me in, signalling the steam to stop with a ring but also the fiend. The ring came through and kept going, calling unwanted attention towards where I fell. My thoughts were impure and there was no time to contemplate on it, from the hands of a brute I was sent to another. As the few moments before the fiend managed to find its way to me, I kept my silence, on the floor, moving around with my hands on the rug. It was a rug, an expensive one, not that it mattered, that it lead me through the dark to figure out where I was going. I couldn't see from which way it would come, nor if it had a way of finding me, other than my original location, to which I knew it had already found out about me as we traded glances on my way here. The desperation grew larger as the thought of it hearing my heart beat would alarm it, just enough to come and get me and rip it apart. No wall so far and no sound other than the ring that wasn't as vibrant as before. The only rescue I seek forth would come only by my hand and it alone. Nothing else could provide the same result, not here, not anymore. As the ringing stopped, swallowed a slurp and notice for me. It founds its way to it and wasn't too far, I touched and felt, wood and a knob, it was a drawer, an old one, a system for me to guide myself. Hopefully, it didn't end up like the maze, leading towards a dead end towards where I would found my own one. A hum came throughout the place, it wasn't mine, it wasn't it, as there was no place for its vocal cords from the past look at it. I doubt it could speak and I hoped not to hear such a horrendously atrocity speak or growl at me. Carrying something. Came to mind before stopping. Not the hum ticked me off, but the hard movement and the heavy noise coming from somewhere in the back. Afraid it would hear me, I held my breath for some time, holding my chest, covering the place where my heart would emanate beats. Closed my eyes to avoid having even the slightest shine and listened. Some steps, one after another after another but how many did it have? No, one was not it's but another one's dragged over too. It must've wiggled its massive body, perhaps it wasn't it but I could hear, feel, inexplicably its body movement, the sounds of the body being dragged. Close enough to me. "Help me. "My throat hurt. "His finger. "Stuck inside my vocal cord. Pulled by the ribs, entrapped by them. My eye took one but saw the other. Our saviour was here. "Saviour. "He heard just mutts. "Saviour" I tried again but it went deeper inside. My throat was hurting and there was no way out. My arm is missing and I can't get out. Legs left behind in an attempt to run. "Saviour" I tried muttering but he was too far, his attempt to save me got too far. I wanted to let it out, of my barely working eyes but it took them too fast for me to last. A scream just came, a the signal I needed, to move on and continue my run. Yet I was slow, still on the ground, I realised now, the steam has helped me, he gave me insight, to move on my own and move along. The way shouldn't be far, the blood it left behind showed me the direction. I took the opposite one to try escaping. Another life lost but it served well, to remind me a little of what happened. What has happened to them? All of them were like that, I presume. But understanding wasn't going to help if I was dead before it. The carving started and I could hear it echo through the entire place, helping me understand, how deep, how far it went. With each sound and each plunge, it felt as if a vibrating came through, revealing the place in my head naturally, though. Even if it sickened it to have the image of him butchering that poor soul, it made it no less a sacrifice worth taking to ensure my escape. A small one that revealed not much, as it finally reached me, informing me of the touch, what it felt, what it removed and where it placed them. Making no sense for what he held in its hands as they didn't make any sense to appear or be in the body of a human. Whatever he nonchalantly disassembled on the table he held it against, it wasn't a human. Nor what the being that tried communicating with me before. So much unstipulated shapes got pulled out, connected and tied with knots, many of them. Plugged out of the orifices and what not, the same fate would be held onto me if I was careless and got caught. The way in front of me still wasn't clear, I was trying my best not to knock off any object and tip it off with my location. Another wave of sound, of waves, going through the facility, revealing the place that laid in front of them as I kept moving. This wasn't good, a bigger one helped me discover how many sounds triggering bodies of mass were scattered around. It seemed like I wasn't the only one who tried escaping and their fates, or parts of there were still left around by that butcher, as a reminder for those who desperately tried escaping his wrath. A medium one, what I could only label it as only encompassed a variety of parts of the walls, doors and what laid atop, a small part of the ceiling. Closed, with locks and chains, one wasn't disassembled but tied and shoved, crammed inside. Melted too by the looks of it to block the entrance. Gah, that was close. I grabbed and held the stack that just popped out in front of me, ready to tip out the balance and not in my favour. Judging by how much more came in, it was almost done with carving its next body. The beats of his heart, dangling, barely above the ground too made peculiar and specific vibrations in its beatings. Smaller area, just around his lower side. I could almost see it, in the dark, further away as I was still slowly coming in. A set of chains was held close to its body, just above but behind his beating, loathsome heart. Something else was inside it too but I couldn't and didn't care enough to make it out. The aftershock has happened. I tripped an unknown object that I haven't seen before. It heard me too, I could hear it, I could feel it, sending all kinds of vibrations, revealing as much as it could. The body was thrown, both of us were trying to get as much distance as we could. Me further away, him closer to my location. The hearing was impeccable but I knew he couldn't see that well in the dark, bashing himself on the various shelves, columns and sacks of dirt that were left there. Crawling and doing my best to avoid it. One object just came in, the another, barely managing to avoid them, helped by it. Then I couldn't move anymore, looking behind to see it revealed for second before jumping to dark. My foot was stuck, feeling no pain, on a trap that would normally disable a bear paw. He heard the snap, the ring it had. Too heavy to pull and not to mention the additional sound of getting dragged on the rough oak floor. It was heading straight, with some exceptions when he turned but I knew that I would get to see my own body with the vibrations, just before he popped out of the shadows. No sound, still, I looked, almost turned with my entire body to look in awe and he stopped too. Right as he was ready to reach me. A few metres separated us. The ominous image of it standing there, staring into the dark, revealed only by his beating heart, vibrating through his body. A snap and a crank could be heard and I knew why. It smiled, or at least that's what it would've done, after realising that someone else was sent here. A woman, her pearl necklace tore apart, each pearl falling and making a distinct sound as they all dispersed everywhere. Hitting so many objects, making so many sounds, triggering so many objects. I was as confused as it was as its giant head was moving unnaturally everywhere to record and take note of all the sounds and everything that happened. This could be my chance. As she was moving too, I got closer and grabbed the trap that held my leg between its jaws and didn't process any further until it was safe to. No, notice that it registered me or what I've done. I knew, though, as the image got clearer with the help of the vigour, as soon as I released it, with the time it took for it to almost pinpoint my location, even as I moved away. There wasn't any turning back. In the position, I felt as it approached its next victim, perhaps even another that was coming through the vents as I did. She tried crawling again, her legs must've broken on the way there, or before. The fiend held no sympathy nor and pity for its victims, approaching it as it would towards any other. Close to her, it was too late to feel empathy for another one that would end up being dead. Yet my hands were shaking as I heard the words echo again, realising now who she was and what has happened. And she knew too well that I was able to hear, even with such a great distance and in peril, separated between the beat of its heart as the final approach was coming. "Saviour. "It came out of her mouth too and I still didn't know why I was called like that. But I knew that something had to be done. As there was just enough distance now for it to come back to me. I unstuck my leg, letting out a shout of pain. "Gahh"Wrong about my leg not being stuck, I unleashed it and subdued the jaws. No time to get up as it blitz towards me. With the jaws held by my hands, against my body, my only was to defend myself. Each step it made tipped me off of the possible trajectory. With each coming one, I changed too, repositioning the trap, keeping my position and waiting for it to finally come. She stopped too from moving and I didn't know why she did it. Each beat of heart, just above the ground to not hit it over, this would be my opening to come. As it came out of the darkness and this time without stopping. I reached out and pushed the trap, releasing the jaws and puncturing its vascular organ. It made no sound but released a set of dark gases out of its mouth, backing away with the jaws plucked inside, pulling through. Right before managing to distance itself, I profited off the little time as I knew it wouldn't be enough to be the end of it. The set of keys was in my mouth, as I got up and started running, at this point knowing the whole place and feeling it out even more. With each stroke and each pulls before it got ready to pull it off. The door should be right there, on the second right, above the set of blocks and levers, mistreated chairs and rubbish. "No. "The set of keys fell behind and I was forced to disrupt my continuation, to walk behind and search for it. The ring made as it fell down revealed its location but it wasn't there. I peeled and felt everywhere on the ground, trying my best to find it, waiting for big waves to come. A crack came and waves from different sides came to be, as the fiend wasn't dead, rupturing the trap in half and throwing it with such an abominable strength that both sides deeply penetrated the walls they ended up into. At least one of them, as the other ones made its way in the chest of an unfortunate fellow. Back to square one but this time I had a good card, lost but still more achievable. The beats haven't stopped and there was no liquid coming out, nothing I could see weaving through the darkness. Whatever encased that hear with its carapace, if the trap wasn't enough, there was nothing else I could to slay it. Not even with the precious organ uncovered could I stand against, especially in my condition and the position I was in. It moved as soon as it got up from the fall, leaving the sound waves waiting for the next move. It sought and there was no doubt that it thought about its next move, ignoring the sounds that she made across the room, farther away from both of us, with her fingers on the bottom of the floor. The fiend chose, deliberately to ignore her and focus everything on me, the one who managed to hinder it from its quarrel. His beating heart never stopped beating in the same place as it waited. The only vibrations felt came from there and from the sounds she made whilst getting ready to lift herself up and start moving again. Yet, still no reaction from it. I was still waiting for the right time to locate the keys. The problem was that it realised it too and waited for me to give out my location. Why else would it ignore the twitching of that woman, other than his appointment with me?It knew well, not only that but my fear too. To act, to get it, to run, to hurt it. Even more, as I was taught there was no other way than around all of them. This place was vulgar, unknown and alienated towards me and I had to get out. Beat beat. Beat, beat, beat. In the dark, something could be heard. Was the saviour still here or was I too late?So hard to move, even harder to make it farther. Each step into the darkness, above me the light bulb was lonely broken. Shards on the floor I stepped on them, feeling no pain, feeling as I gained reign on my body again. The beat could be friendly, I hadn't known any better, it must be a sign for help. Was this the saviour guiding me toward him?I should've told him the truth despite being told to do otherwise. I would've ended up here if I did, which I did anyway. Something hard came into my way, I had to feel it manage to walk around, so sturdy and annoying, how I managed to cut my finger into one of its splinters. My fingers felt so soft from the fall, something broke in me now too. Was I like the others now?Impure, shaken, lost in the dark, seeking for the liberator to set me on the right path once again. Harder as I got closer and still no one came. No one to harm me, to cause me pain, who was it in the dark?I asked myself after seeing the figure, the shade and the form that slowly contorted itself as I got closer. "Hey, I found you. It's been so long. "He hasn't answered yet, thinking he's done something wrong. "You didn't wrong me before. I know it was a mistake, a misjudgement for you and I. But I can forgive it and so can yourself. "I hoped he understood, I assured him so. He was waiting for me, not moving, taller than I thought he was. Something was broken in the ceiling, it was night and dark, only the light of a moon came through. It must've happened just minutes before as it travelled down to reveal him. He stood tall in front of me, just by a side. I froze as I saw only parts of his body, hanging down, big and pulsating. His mouth was open, breathing hard, releasing gusts, so big that he could swallow them whole with me aside. My every feeling told me to run away, afraid he'd harm me, with his pale long expired fingers, perforating the floor, making marks in it. He didn't notice and I was thankful for that but something bugged me. And that was, where was our liberator and what had he done with him? How have I not succumbed to it yet, the shock was much but hasn't shaken me so? Something drove me here, to help and guide him, something that I haven't seen in the others. Many of them lost, many of them forgot, but that's why has the liberator come. To deliberately free us from madness, to free his lost lambs, and seeing him. Seeing him how and what has become, it pained me to see the abomination that laid in front of me. To think he'd harm him, that he has him pinned down somewhere, waiting for. I looked in the direction he was looking and had something in my mind. Not even once did he give any attention to me, straight ahead, looking for any move and any given site. Was he the one that made that sound, beating the floor just as I got here? I didn't know what was about to happen to me but the voice in my head that so relentlessly guided me so far, it said loud and clear. Giving me the command I had to bear through in order to be liberated, like all of them. Many have sacrificed before in order for him to get here, the voice spoken to me. And there was no worry as I would be free, right when the liberator will heal it. Its voice felt so warm, something that I was never able to feel, other than the cold at any given time. And so much did I seek that warmth, never given, through both body and soul, lifted once again by the promise. This was the reason I stood calm, in front of the. . . I gulped after hearing what it said next. Kneeling down and slowly moving into position. The wires it had had a knot, easily untied if pulled fast enough. The voice continued in my head and there only. "There will be repercussions for what you have done. Broken too beyond repair, beyond assembly. You must give yourself in for only then you can feel warm you've so lonely wished for. "With tears in my eyes, if only they would drop away from my eyes, it still hasn't noticed me and neither did him. I knew, the voice told me too, he was there, undefended, with the key of his escape laying only feet away from him. "He will break you in half once you're going to do it. But not before, its mind is poisoned, staring ahead and into the one who's hurt it. Such vengeance is bared until one of them stops existing, with no way around. You must become the misdirection he desperately needs now in order to escape. Just as I need you to help him in order to survive. "With such grace, it spoken to me, using a voice of my own, despite me knowing what he was. I pleaded my life a long time ago, forfeited for something that outweighed my own. My eyes were fixated on him whilst not making any sudden moves to anger it too early. A chain reaction would soon come to be. "I'm doing this for you. "I said it, knowing he could hear me as the voice confirmed it. But what was she doing, standing too close? Whispering to me, beyond all the guise, the distance and the danger she was in. My attempt to save her was in vain as it seemed like she would sacrifice herself to assure my safe return. Her mind must be lost if she thought it was a fair trade. She still hasn't done it, there was still time. Time for me to make a move like I've done before, with the heart beating and the fiend wanting nothing more but to end me. She kneeled now and kept talking, it made no move towards it as if it made no difference what she did near nor to it. I still had time as I thought I knew, the various knots, pulsating, oozing inside, above and under the heart, getting near her hands. A big sound was about to come, I feared in coming, a shout or scream or even worse from something I wasn't sure it would come first. Again, I lied to myself that I could do it, I could save, I could risk it again. My life, my well being for another person, this time, whilst not being sure of my escape. I could sacrifice it at any time, I didn't care for my life. No. She kept doing and I did nothing instead. Too afraid to even shaken in disgust for myself that I would be found by it and accidentally save her from the irreversible fate she was heading towards. No, I was. I was so afraid of death, even the slightest thought of there being a chance of me to escape gave me the strength and courage to go through with anything. Yet, in the lack of it. She was dead. Ripped it apart, making a huge wave, the knot broken and letting so much of it go. It angered and instinctively bashed shoved its hand through her chest, getting stuck it in. Unable to control and tie itself, it twitched, revealing everything, enough for me to get the set of keys. Angered and crazed by the apparent hatred for both of us, it didn't stop and pulled itself closer to me whilst having her impaled, slowed down, moving on tight spaces and slight nodes. This was its downfall, too stubborn to get rid of the extra weight that slowed it down. And if it weren't for her help, I wouldn't have managed to see everything in a new light right after feeling her body being dragged closer to me. Something was spilt on the floor and she was covered in its blood, too damned to stop its own bleeding point. Too stubborn to stop and die as I reached the door and saw, the body that was shoved inside of it, almost filled with mould and decayed. The right key was only one of them and I had little of time to find the right one. One stuck and a cling with vibrations. Another cling, a second wrong. The vibrations didn't matter anymore as I knew where the hole was and what to do. By the time, I struck the third key in the chain, the sounds of her being dragged, jabbed under its prominent feet could be heard from not so far. The area between us was as lit as if there was a star between the block of darkness that laid everywhere else in the facility. "Damn key won't fit it and there aren't many left. "I let it know, hoping it'd understand the dilemma we were both in. Not many were left, cling cling and neither the next two managed to fit in nor work at all. It was closing in and fast at that too, both of them now. Perhaps I could stall some time and wait for it to drown into its own sorrowful existence but at the same time, the chances are that it could mend itself back together to finish the job. "Gah. "And the next one didn't help at all to ease the pain of our game of waiting. "I can hear you there. "I said whilst circling through the remaining keys, after hearing how he started slamming the body and at the same time its hand on the ground. Our confrontation would seem to come and at an advancing speed too, with its body slowly regaining strength. With each strike inside the lock, with every jiggle that loved into almost moving on its own knees or what it had there that kept it in one piece. "There" It would seem I declared myself the winner, just as it close to me, ready to impale me too with its other slender hand before falling on the floor and dying with us. "You lost" I yelled too, in dismay as I knew, unlocked, that I would finally get to escape the grips, to grasp freedom and safety once again. The only part of my plan remained, with adrenaline running through my body, to open it and. Blocked, the body. "How could I forget?" It wasn't there just to scare. I pushed and pulled, trying to get rid. So close to getting me and I had no choice. I pulled the handle and ripped it apart, throwing the remains at it to knock it off my track Bought some time too as it deflected the broken part of the door, rotten and fragile. In doing so, a mistake, it fell down from grace with no support, damaging and having to pay a part of its life to slightly redeem its fault. Still not done, I got my hand outwards and tried pulling. Stuck again with no way to take it inside, the bloody body still blocking. Mouldy and rotten, just in the same state I saw and felt before, the time came for me to do it too. Pulling it apart, thinking the body was still attached but a hand came off first. Without giving it time to lift itself up from the dire state it was in, I threw the arm, slowing it down even more. Whilst keeping it so, having part and part being broken, one last time, just as it was ready to lift itself up, closely to its two feet. Again it fell, just as I managed to get the torso and the fractured jaw falling off and managing to hit his heart after leaving it in a vulnerable position. With each leap before the fall, with each time it came closer to getting up, so did it managed to get closer to me. But none of that was important, as the door of my freedom was almost so broken I could reap it apart by pieces. To use the sharp edged planks to finally slay it. Yet, the last time I managed to throw the torso, I stopped. And so did it, finally, not moving a hand, even if it was so close to me. The light suddenly vanished, the vibrations were silent. Two lone sourced of glow came one from outside. And the other one dreary, the single timed beats that could barely come out of it.

Laying there so close, with its slender sharp hand reaching my feet, without enough power to reach nor harm me anymore. "Your end came so clear and so fast. I haven't even expected that. "I kicked its claw away and felt no more resistance from it, nor from its disgusting guise, hidden in the dark now along her. "How did any of them manage to find their end at the hands of you? That I will never know. "And neither have I cared as I was almost out. Some parts of the body were still left, merged with the remainings of the door, soon to be taken apart again. Before throwing the next one, I felt something cold reach my feet. The slender hand as it wasn't done yet. Yet it hasn't punctured me, neither did it held my member hard enough that I couldn't dismiss it and throw it again. Just for it to drag itself back to it. "You just don't know when to give up, don't you? Of all the mindless things I've encountered so far, you are the worst of them. Even that pathetic bomb knew when to die after a while and stopped its disgraceful attempts to harm us. "But it didn't understand and at this point, it was clear to me that, it didn't have the mind to do so. Just before it did it, one last time, I got the best of it. Holding its hand under my foot and keeping it steady. "I know you can't and won't be able to scream. Not that it would've been the first one you've heard, yet I can assure you that hers was the last one you will get to ever hear. "It tried pulling away from under my foot but still didn't understand, despite its attempts, it was over for it. That giant pulsating heart, that didn't have enough liquid to spill out, either being coagulated at the end of its cord or just not enough to get to the other end, but it still didn't end. On its last call and still tried. "This should teach you. Even if it won't matter in the end, once you're not longer functional. "I grabbed another sharp broken part of the door and noticed it, after having enough time to examine it. The soft side, the part that would so easily be vulnerable, the same one as I didn't want to end it yet by shoving a dagger into its heart. "I feel no remorse and no pity for such an object like you. "It heard me, just before I stabbed and cracked deeply into the floor, pitting it against its will. Leaving its last moments to squirm and try wiggling its arm out despite having no possible way to get it out. Leaving me back to my final pieces to be taken, just enough for me to get out towards the garden. I didn't know why it was there or where I was being lead towards but. Even the sound it made whilst trying to get out managed to disturb my thoughts, my patience and attempt to hold myself from ending its miserable existence. "I know you're suffering and you will continue to do so. "I stopped. Another set of vibrations came. But. So close. It started moving, tried more likely to move its lips and try speaking to me. Yet no sound came, only the image of its heart and lips moving in sync before it stopped flailing its arm. With the other one and my impaled companion longly disabled. "I can't. Understand. I can't read lips. "I've spoken softly now as something changed into me, I still resented it from what it's done to them. Yet. "No, I will not fall into one of your sick tricks, especially now when I'm done with trying to defend myself from your harm. "Enough space was carved from the combined remains of the corpse and the door now. Just the right amount that I could pass through was gotten rid of.

"Regardless what you might be trying to say. And how much more you'll heart will keep beating its last moments. I hope you'll spend them well rotting in here. "A farewell to both of them before going through. Everything came back to normal, or at least that's what I thought. "Where now?" I asked myself, hoping this new discovery and new ability would come in handy. If someone heard me and tried speaking, I could pinpoint the exact location. The sounds of flying birds, of only there were any of them flying. "A terrarium, after the butchery I was in?" Bait after bait but none was taken so far. If this place ended up being the previous one, there were measures to be taken. Something unexplainable even more so happened. I changed my mind and before going any farther, I had to be sure of something, to be fully ready for such a burden. Not even crawling through the cracks, I managed to push the remains from outside and open the door entirely towards the inside, breaking and spreading the remaining pieces on the floor in front of me. Its breath was still there as of yet, some time would come to be until it fully passed on. Perhaps I was supposed to fully check its butchery, now that I had some insight with the place, close to being fully revealed by the light that came through. Not only that but this place where I've almost found my journey's end and my possible death would become a testing ground for my latest acquired ability. If I managed to fully master it, perhaps I could pull it through. There wasn't much, though, not what I expected, just the same pulsating member and. Something else. I thought about it and thought well as I couldn't figure out what nor where did it come from. A sound like no other, an object, something else than that I couldn't name nor describe neither to myself. It didn't make any sense to me, neither did its call. Was I intentionally called back to this place from which I wanted to get away from? Either way, it was worth a detour, now that this thing was taken care of. "Slow down and stop distracting me. I need to focus. "Not that It could do anything anymore, though it provided me with some insight. Perhaps what I was looking for laid back at its working spot where the end of many took place. "Keep beating like that, I still need a reminder where the exit laid. "Even with the presence of light, I wasn't sure how far I would venture inside, nor if any other threats were there. The small beacon I ignited, the beating could help me. "I'm sorry I have to prolong this. Even with what I said before, and the small fraction of empathy that I may have towards you. I need you alive. "The drops were still falling down despite me thinking otherwise, just slowly, the pool was larger than before. Such attention to it wouldn't have been possible if it weren't for the light to reveal it. "Again, this may hurt, and it probably won't surprise me if you weren't going to regenerate even with my help. Yet I know that if I didn't do this, you would more than likely run dry and stop working. "Close, almost face to face, I kneeled to its level, just enough to feel its whole heart. Beating in my proximity, I could see and sense its every channel, every path and every vein inside where the remaining life like blood flew through. So much has passed that not even his mouth could move anymore, neither its hands. I lifted up the part that used to have a knot, the many others being still connected. With a piece of cloth that I held in my pocket, I took it out and shoved it in the cord before connecting it to the other side. "I have to say sorry again but I won't let it run through you. It's not that I don't trust you but I've seen what type of annoyance you became, even with some remains of your strength. "And luckily for me and it, the body remained still on a side covered in darkness, sparing me from seeing the rest of its disturbing looking body. And her too. Both arms laying on the floor, holding a single pearl in one. I took it for the passing before travelling further. "This is where the table should be. "Using only the memory of what I heard before, I reconstructed the place in my head, guiding myself to it. There was no need for me to touch it, as I knew what laid on it and how much, whatever that was, as it wasn't blood what it took from its victims. "Agh. "It driven me with annoyance, hearing that damned sound and not knowing the source. Distracting me from whatever I was going, what I was doing now and thinking about how I got here. Like an obsession, despite me having many of them, I had to catch the source with my own hands. Thinking of it. Spare ones and other parts laid everywhere, yet none of them were human like. "Prosthetic parts?" I asked myself out loud, at all time, with every question and thought out loud, I wanted it to hear me and not forget that it wasn't left lonely. Though it made me wonder, what was it doing here with so many of them? "Were you a doctor of some kind?" And quite some expensive parts too, made out of such a precious material, embedded and well crafted by a master craftsman I'd say at even my first assortment. The fingers moved on their own after pushing some wires, checking more and more of them before ultimately throwing them away. "I know you'd probably get mad if you saw me do this. I noticed that you took good care of these parts. "Well polished and clean, I felt no rust and no dust, no dent nor anything that caused them any damage. Neither did I notice nor feel any of them misplaced in the small workshop it made for itself. And for everything that was needed, even. Heads. Which was never done before?" Though I doubt that stopped you from trying. Wait a minute. "Whilst coming around, I felt something strange, a leg, the size of my own. Comparable the same, with some exceptions. I held it in my hands. I threw it away soon after, not wanting to think about it or what it wanted to do with it and with me. Making sure I'd still hear those beats so I wouldn't lose myself into the darkness, I plunged, even more, descending in the unidentified surrounding. Perhaps I was going to hysteria but I thought I could hear it not so far from here. "But what is this?" I had to base myself on my senses only as I felt nothing and couldn't see as much after the point I've passed by. That's when I heard it. A distant sound. But I didn't know, didn't realise how distant it was before hearing it so well. It was the sound of a distant event than happened before. I realised that as I saw it as a witness, alive and well, tall and strong, with a healthy beating heart, with its slender hands keeping many needles and patching someone new. "You're alive. "I said but it didn't hear me whilst passing next. Was that another victim? No, she stood there on her own and didn't fear. "How may I help you?" He asked, with a normal voice, in a normal body now, formal no less. "I need a new replacement, this one is broken. "Her leg was broken indeed though she felt no pain as he easily removed it and started sewing another one in the place of the previous. Freely, I moved around them to see from all perspectives, with the light bulbs being clean and shiny, his cabinet on one side and a workshop in the other. Doing woodworks and toys on one hand whilst adjusting body parts on the other. Such a smile and a nice appearance. What was the connection then? This man wasn't that fiend, that beast and that monster so what did it suddenly change? "Huh? What happened to you?" My attention was redirected after watching on the other side, seeing as there was no vent leading up to this point, neither could I hear the beating he had, perhaps the beating he will have some time in the future if this was his past. I got closer so I would be sure that my thesis wasn't entirely false. "Gahhhh. Ughhhh. Eghhhh. "I shouted in his eardrum, possibly damaging it from such a distance between us. That would've happened if I was there, really there and near him. But I was nothing else than a witness of the sound that brought me here. Strangely as I didn't hear before managing to come out victorious from our confrontation with each other. And even stranger that it acted so normal, not only since it looked that way. "Were you always like this?" I asked, knowing, thinking that the most plausible explanation was that my body was still located in the room where we started, with it still lying dead, beating its rotten heart. Though I wasn't going to throw out the chance of me walking through this place, fully revealed and hopefully unharmed. Not that any of these could do it anyway. Such an occurrence I thought about. I thought I've heard of such an event in the past, used on many but where? Seeing past events that were used to my consent in order to do what? Something was driving me, controlling me, using something from my past and others and I didn't like that. "You will understand that I don't like being controlled. And that I don't care to witness what happened and the condition they used to live in. I will find out the reason I was brought here then take my leave soon after. "I wasn't sure it heard me but hopefully, it did. Despite us both knowing I was being manipulated, there wasn't much I could do, for now, rather see what I was taken towards. And what it wanted to offer me, for such an image shown before me, of what it happened to it, revealed to me that any offering, anything that it wanted to give would come with a greater consequence. I looked back before going the stairs, through the fixed door that seemed to be slowly decomposing. It had its misfortunes too. But watching him work so slowly on them, managing to aid them like a normal doctor would give me some hope. And at the same time some dismay. Just to be sure about it, so I wouldn't get to lose the image of the present, I had to talk from once in a while, to remind myself where I truly was, despite going through so many places. Once I was anchored to it, despite climbing stairs that wouldn't normally be here. "I remain in the room. And I do remember when I came up with this strategy. "And it was after I gained an insight from the celestial I was taking care off. Perhaps the information that I was given by it would come to a greater use than I initially thought it'd do. "If there were any stairs in here. I'd like to know if they'll ever end. "I must've been walking for minutes and judging by the fact that I wasn't tired. "What was that?" Knowing It still couldn't talk, there was no point in asking that. Yet everything was shaken and smoke could be smelled, coming from below. I climbed the stairs faster, trying to reach the end, climbing and climbing until I reached the end, the door. "Finally, I can see, where will it lead me, though?" I opened it to see the blue sky and clouds being lacerated in half. With one hand holding on the door and the other covering my mouth as I was in shock. On a deck of a normal ship but this wasn't the sea, too many clouds around, white and yellow, getting smashed around with everything that came into contact. People were acting as if it was normal, pulling sacks of sand and moving them around, sailing the ship that most likely had a captain. The crew was diverse yet I've seen none of them before in the mansion. "Was this a part of the mansion at any point?" "If so, why were we moving?" "Steady now. "Someone said I thought it was directed at me, yet I was so wrong. Though I haven't declined the offer, as I was shaken away, the altitude we were one must've taken a toll. Again no one saw me, or so did I think, yet shortly after was I greeted by what I could only name a fellow crewman. "Hello there, you must be new here, is that right?" "You can see and hear me?" I asked but before getting a response, something that I waited. Proven wrong shortly after as someone passed through me, greeting back. "Yes I am, my name is Bindra. I'm glad I was chosen out of so many people to join. ""Yes yes, look. I know you're new and happy you were given such a privilege but you'll need to work harder than the rest of them. "She held one hand behind her back at all time, with me standing and looking at them trying to understand why was I being shown all of this. "The deceit, the promise and someone willing to suffer through anything to get towards something. Is that what am I being shown?" I asked before waiting for them to finish too. Yet still no answer came forth, though. "Including something extra that not many people like you possess. Come forth later into my chamber and I will assure that your residence here remains permanently. "She nodded her head and turned it around, I could see what she was doing remained in disgust. He must've been the captain, smiling as it heard it all, before going away and leaving her be. There was nothing she could do it, coming from a superior.

"Ehm. Hello there new girl, my name is Esther. "Another one came. Dressed as the latter, the sky uniform and everything or so did I call it, as I saw nothing as such vestments in what you'd call a normal ship. "Hi. I'm Bindra. "Much more clower this time, as she was shaken. "Don't mind him and don't get fooled. He's not the captain, neither even a deck hand. ""Wait, then who is he?" "He's just a passager that keeps taking a piss on people. Such a blunder that he probably didn't even tell you in which room he's currently residing. "Said the deck lady with a playful tone. I moved one as they started to bond, I had no time to waste on them. "I won't get caught in your drama, not even in theirs. "A flash came, unexpected and saw something surprising, unexpected, that didn't happen in the last flashes I encountered. It would be a first of its kind and most likely not again. "But they look normal, and nothing changed. "Have I missed it then or were they like that? Their mouths stripped bandanas and fractured pants were just the same, as no one else. Perhaps this was the change, I was sent to explore, to see, to understand, they were nothing like those in the mansion, so where was I now? "The next stop towards the airy terminal. "Someone just announced the next stop, in a strange manner too. Another group stood on edges, caught with ropes to avoid unwilling accidents it would seem. "Do I really have to wear this strapped on my leg? "A relatively young boy asked, tied up to his ankle, so sturdy that not even a sharpened knife could set it free. Either my timing was right of they were triggered as I came into contact with them. "Which reminded me of something, don't worry if you're still here and well. "I could try focusing and try hearing again, feeling the whole deck, going through the second level. Something must be blocking me from seeing inside the room I was truly in, perhaps the same thing that granted me this ability. "Hey you sir, why are you making faces and concealing your forehead? "The kid asked, whilst his befriended lizard stood next to him. I couldn't hear anyone around, close to him to be referring as. That could and might as well mean that. "Are you deaf sir or just ignoring me? "Again he referred to someone that wasn't around. I had to ask again, this time, I didn't know if I'd get an answer. And another question would get to be wasted by me towards someone who probably didn't hear me but someone else. "Huh? "Plain and simple as I wasn't going to waste much time. "I asked if you can hear me sir? "And he asked back, thinking that we went nowhere with this but I had enough. "I'll do with your game for now. "The kid looked at me confused. I managed to see a little of that before turning around and glancing at the others. The night was coming and no one else was close to interact with me, no one other than him. The blue veil turned into dark and pink before gradually becoming darker. A storm was coming. "Someone or something somewhere is probably experiencing something bad. "The kid was peculiar, even more than what I was used to hearing from someone under and above his stature. "Speaking from experience I presume? Though, judging by your age, I doubt you've had any to begin with. ""Are you taking a dig at me, old man? "The child asked to the geyser, wondering what was it about. But I wasn't going to fully immerse in his banter, having to figure out where we were heading. "Did you hear that? "He asked, slow as I did it before him, truly knowing from where it came. Or at least two things that happened at the same time. He and I heard but I know that I felt it as soon as it happened, maybe even before it did so. Not so far from us, closer to the bow, a crewman of his, maybe mine too now, dropped a glass of water and shattered it on the wooden foot bottom. I felt it before he even managed to notice and open his mouth to it. Even before opening his mouth I saw vibrations form all around the sunlight, through the floor, multiple of them, each for every shard that reached its target. Suddenly stopped, they maintained their position in the sunlight as there was nothing for me to be revealed. Waves like in the water so did the wood seems, despite us being so high above it. But the reason they did it was soon made itself clear before he even finished acknowledging what happened, I looked in the other direction. The man that once referred himself as a higher up crushed a few photos taken of him with other women under his feet. He tried, twisting his foot and trying to muddy, destroying them as fast as possible. I didn't care if he was blackmailed, covering it up or destroying them for the sakes of it but the action he made, the waves made with each twist collided with the one coming from the shards. The shards of a glass and the shards from his previous relationships, an interesting coincidence but I had no idea what it had to do with me nor why they stopped in front of one another. "Someone will have to clean that up. And I'm too tied up to be able to do it." Said the boy, resolute as he wasn't seeing what I had in front of my eyes. "I guess. "Sadly for him I had no way to entertain him, the same way as the idea of them being stuck like this didn't entertain me either. "It was more like a by the way. I don't know how they used to say it in your old day an age. Speaking of, say, you're an old man. Where were you residing in the general district?" "I'm kind of busy right now. ""My name is Luke. But my friends call me Nimble. "I didn't bother anymore with him, as something caught my eye in it. The waves, standing where they were, some of them started vibrating even more in their place, almost as if they were ready to rupture the entire ship into pieces. Something told me that they weren't supposed to be in the state they were currently in. Neither what could they evolve into?" "What do they call you? Or used to in your day and age?" "Quiet down whilst I'm checking this. "I said to him as I kneeled down, getting closer to one of the waves. It must've passed through my feet and everywhere around, yet I wasn't sure what would've happened when I touched them. Even more as I was curious to see what could happen if I kept my hand in them. The waves were silent when it came to him talking, to her trying to pick up the glasses and towards what now was the burning of the pictures. I could hear and see all of that by myself well enough without any help. It resonated with me on a lower level than I was expecting it to be. Just one small touch before they reached the full potential they could have. The bad weather could and might as well me made by the massive level they had at such a high altitude we were in. Those thunders I saw in front and below, hearing it well behind too, were at the same level, almost as the continuation of the waves. All of that before fading away inside the storm that was brewing under us. "One touch. "I whispered to myself and at the same time, with my mind clear, I didn't forget for who it was directed towards. "That's enough. "I was stopped, the waves disappeared. Right before I could touch them, under my hands they were gone. A hand was on my shoulder and the rope not so far. The kid stopped me as the signs of rain started showing themselves near us. "We're too high anyway for the rain to fall kid. ""I know sir but it still wouldn't be too nice with the storm and the harsh wind coming all around us. "That maiden and the man already went to their rooms alone and neither of them seem to think about the little boy standing near the rain and the bending old man. "Then tell me. "Before I stood up and turned around to him. The previous occurrence was strange, yet harmless and none of them seemed to notice it. "How come none of them came here to untie you and bring you in?" "The place was deserted, a constant feeling that had a bad habit to follow me around throughout every place I went it. Perhaps it was me bringing the eerie feeling that distanced other people from it. Yet he remained here, tied to the place. And so was I. "For now. And now only. Before being tied here, I had a hard time. A really hard time than you could ever believe. Talking, getting to know people. Interacting with others without having to run away. ""And that's when you tied yourself I presume?" "In the same position, he sat down again, on the edge of the ship with no fear of falling down. "No, I was tied by others. "None was around to listen to him, except me. It was hard to admit it but I only stood near him because he reminded me of someone who I glanced upon a long time ago. That's why I indulged and sat next to him. With no breaks to stop me from falling and no fear either. "Was this a bad joke then?" "It's not that. They helped me, I'm glad they did it. " "But was that the reason they've done it?" "To be honest, I don't know. Though I can't spend my time in spite of it, especially since I can't change it anymore. "I looked at it and the leg must've been tied quite tight. A long while must've passed with it still tied to him, keeping him down, perhaps even up in this case. "You can always just. Untie that knot and move freely. There's nothing stopping you anymore. "Just as he saw my motion, moving my hand, he stopped it with both of his, making me pull it away. "You don't have to do that. It's something I've got to do on my own terms. Even if I'm afraid of releasing it. "I understood how he felt though something wasn't right yet. Something that got delayed for a while. "My name is Esley. " "I'm glad you've finally told me that. It wouldn't have been a proper meeting if you didn't. "He looked tired and the sack of sand that stood near him would've more than a likely substitute for a pillow. "I think I 'll head inside there now. Funny how I have no idea what it lays behind that door, despite coming from there. "The weather was getting even worse than before, us being at the level of the rain, perhaps barely above. "Go on ahead, I'll be fine. Nothing to drag me down. " "And no one to drag you up. "In case of a fall, the unwatched child, he'd get to be at the same level with the clouds. Thunder made waves, some did whilst others not, coming from below, lifting themselves above. I stopped in my tracks, fascinated to feel the clouds and how the thunders were made. The image of them travelling so fast and fast towards the place they were heading towards was overwhelming. I couldn't feel it in its entirety as such a distance would be too staggering to think of. Though it did tick me off about the real extension of my given extensions. "It looks like it's going to rain. "The boy says, before setting up his bed, ready to sleep in the cold. Though it didn't seem to disturb him any more than it did me. "Funny kid. "I said whilst almost passing through, perhaps I would've opened the door straight away and went in if it weren't for the image of the empty deck and no captain at the wheel. "Wait a minute, don't fall asleep yet. "I stopped him from closing his other eye right as I came back. "Isn't there someone supposed to be at the wheel?" "What?" He used both of his hands to open his eyes, making rude signs and coughing at me too. "I said, isn't the someone who has to be at the wheel?" "I guess so?" Confused from the sudden awakening and my delightful intrusion, he noticed it too, soon after. Late once again as I felt it, from where we stood, moving on its own. I could barely keep myself on my feet as I felt both it, then the entire ship barely standing still, sending all kind of vibrations to reach me from all possible direction. The stability of both the ship and myself were treading on thin ice. "Are you okay?" His speech was blurred too, though he had something to support him, keeping him tied to the ground. I've had nothing. "Agh. "I almost screamed, alarming everyone that stood inside at the cosy surrounding that revealed itself as they opened the door. Almost everyone must've been caught off guard, coming out one by one, barely holding themselves in the air. "What happened?" Close to the edge, holding myself on it, the ship first seemed to go on a right whim. "I don't know. No one. On the wheel. "One hand holding my head and the other holding myself still. I could see the levels, the clocks and a second small one being held lower than the bigger one. "You've got to be kidding me. "That was mad, I thought I felt the entire ship down to its entire screw and tender, yet I wasn't able to sense, somehow the wheel device it held. Neither did I see it, nor other crewmen walking towards it. "Don't go, it might suddenly turn. "I didn't advance as I was being guided by it again, feeling the vibration as the wind itself play a role against us. "Stop it!" I shouted again as the gust came, turning the wheel and the smaller one. Only being able to see the device from the position I was in, the small thing didn't make a thing, but the bigger one turned, to the sudden, a hard left with the entire ship following the command that was driven by the air. "Gahhh. Barr. Scurrr. "Screams came from everywhere around, I could barely hold myself and the kid was being held up to the limit of the rope holding him. "No. "He grabbed and held me by the waist one moment before I was about to fall. The others weren't so lucky, falling apaart, almost off the ship too. "It's not going to last any longer. "She said with a torch in her hand, still lit despite the beating wind and the lack of support. The sudden turn managed to make some of them pass down from being knocked into the other side of the ship. "It's safe now. You can release me Nimble. "He nodded as the wheel fluctuated enough for us to temporarily stand steadily. It opened a path, a timed venture towards it before it would start turning again. "We need to get there. Both of us. "She said from the other side, seeing how the boy was tied, the others knocked and the wheels might've needed two people to control. I nodded too and told her to. "Move, before it starts again. We might not get another chance. At least not if we want to avoid them being thrown off the board. "Ahead of me, as she practically flew through, above the planks that constituted the ship, using them to propel herself further away towards the stairs, waiting for me to make my move. Not much and it wasn't safe, I booked it through and almost threw myself into it, before it started slightly shifting away, at maddening directions and with an abdominal speed. "You're almost there, grab the deck will ya?""I'm trying. I'm doing my best. Not to get throw out of this damn ship. "The stairs, I got there, just on the other side of her, having the most difficult time lifting my every foot up before having it rushed down by the strength of the ship. Stair and stair and I were to the top, with my wounded feet barely standing on their own, the road ahead had no support and no way to be sure. "What now?"I asked, seeing how she knew something, more than I did about piloting a ship unless counting the underground one as previous experience. Different tools for different people, and no way for it to pilot itself. "Yes. "She said, covering her face from the small. "Were those leaves?"I asked her, after seeing more of them come from her bulwarks, followed by small branches soon after. "A tornado might be coming, we need to hurry. "Was she insane or?"Was that a morbid joke?""It's going to be if we don't move the ship out of the way. "Almost muffled by the wind, getting rougher than before, still below us, yet the effect still managed to find a way to us. "Jump. ""No, I'm not going to. We won't make it that way. "Her plan was flawed and had no way to succeed, not to mention. "How risky it is. ""Don't tell me that you've got any other plan going on. "He was going to ruin our only chance. I didn't have to way for him anymore, I was going in, with our without, even if I had to navigate by myself with one foot under and two below. "Don't do it. "I leapt, slightly, feeling as if I was flying through the air, through leaves and small floating objects. His cry took a while to reach my ears, not that it matter what it said. "Aughhh"The high lever almost crushed my belly and left me kneeling down on one foot. "Are you okay?"He asked despite seeing it, yet I was anchored to it. "I'm fine. "I merely managed to cough it up. Without even knowing what I said to him. Confused about his hand signs, what did. "Grab the wheel. "He yelled, popping out my eyes to be fully open, realising where I was. I got up and shifted away from the lever towards the wheel, keeping it steady and straight. People got on the deck now, with ropes coming out from the chambers, safely wrapping the ones that got knocked off. "Hold it like that until I'm there. "He could move normally without being thrown or shaken. It couldn't last long, a cyclone was seething under. "There, I got it too. What do I do with it?"None of the men from the deck go there time so I had to make use of him if I was going to stir the ship in the right direction. "Listen closely, move the smaller one opposite to the way I'm doing mine. And pull the red furred lever when I tell you. "Eight of them in total, each steering the ship into harsh degree turns. Others even more. "I think I understand. ""There's no thinking, just do it. Right!" I yelled at him, seeing how he was rolling it left. Somehow, unexpectedly he didn't confuse what I said to him and did the right thing. I doubt he was blessed with the same ability to see through the thick fog that surrounded us so it was even better. "Left now and get ready to pull the lever closer to you then reset it after five seconds. ""You never said anything about timing the pulls. ""Focus on steering it, we're not out of the storm yet. ""What about them? Won't the sudden turn. ""Pull it. "Damn that woman, how could she not wait? I just released the lever, having no time to respond. Another order came soon after. "Good, now left. "And I turned it left, having smaller vibrations thick me off of her real intent. Something was wrong with her, thinking me off intentionally or without figuring out what she did. "Turn a right now. "I did the same as before, going left once again, differently than what she did. "Stop giving me the wrong indications. We could get into serious trouble if you don't focus. "He knew where I was turning the wheel before me doing so, going in the different direction the same time I did, before telling him so. His senses were sharp, too sharp, despite not seeing him before. Neither did his grabs seemed too keen to my eyes, despite what he did and the way he spoke to me giving a different vibe. "Relax, you can handle it from what it looks like. And we're almost out of the storm. "Though I couldn't speak for my entire crew, especially those on the deck, that almost got thrown around from the sudden turns and change in atmosphere. "Are we lifting up?" He asked, pulling the lever and releasing it soon after, stopping me from even opening my mouth to note him of what had to be done. "How did you do that?" Following directions even better than I thought. "It's not important, just focus on where you're landing this. "He seemed to be more than a labourer from below, not dirty from the coal being sent towards the engines that power the hole thing, his hands weren't ruined from the dirty small work nor from washing dishes. Yet. "You seem to know a great deal about navigation. More than you seem to be showing. "I told him and perhaps I had to admit a little, his grey moustache and start of a beard despite his age weren't such a knock out of him. "I'm a fast learner, that's all. Nothing more and nothing less than that. ""It's good to know. We will be needing this. "He couldn't see in front and neither would them as soon as I gave the order. "Go inside men, all of you. "At this point, they had a great deal of distance, almost inside, ready to patch those wounded people. "We're going to need to focus on some manoeuvres, think you can handle that? Also, give me a report of the situation that happened before I got here. "The port and starboard of the ship were intact, there was nothing that came into contact despite having the ship so shaken towards the sides whilst inside. Something else happened, he and the child remained the only ones that knew about what happened. "Nothing happened ma'am. Just the storm that started right on the sides whilst the ship kept slashing through the clouds. ""Why were you out then? ""Well, I was""Right then left. "Again he did it before telling him so, in just one direction going against my order against my order. He didn't lack good judgement, though I should've focused more on the path ahead before thinking about that. "I was talking to Nimble. ""Don't do that, no one calls him that. Though, where did you come from? I've never seen nor was I informed about any unwanted passengers appearing out of nowhere. ""Well, you could say I just popped out of nowhere. No one else beat me up to it. "Judging by her face she didn't know what I was talking about, yet I wasn't going to forget about it just because of the seriousness of the event that was being thrown at me. "That's not the answer I was expecting. I assume that you've most likely snicked in one of the cargos that were delivered before this ship set sail. "Though him approving it disproved it even more. I wasn't going to complain about an extra deck hand, just because the peculiarity of what he looked like and how well prepared he was. He understood how this machine worked, far off my expectations for now that I could focus entirely towards where we were flying towards. "We passed some skies but. "This wasn't good. "I can feel it too, in the air, the pressure and the clouds are almost here. "If he understood it too, it meant that my imagination wasn't playing tricks on me. "I'll need you to listen to my instructions to their entirety, okay?" "No tricks this time?" "No tricks this time. "That I could assure him and I had another thing planned for him. "IS Nimble okay?" "He's doing fine, pull the red lever and don't let go anymore. Block your part of the wheel and keep it like that until you're done with. "Fine, what now?" "This ship wasn't just shaken, it looks like there's a problem with either the furnace. I think. Or the machinery that lays below, powering up the engines keeping us above the air. "Then we need to repair the engines?" "No. "She said. "We need to give the orders to the engineers below, the new of what's happening and what must be done so we won't fall off the edge. Judging by the speed of our descent. "The clouds that were almost around us and the soon blue sky that would become pink and empty. "We might be slowly going down until the engines die. And after that. "Wait. I can fix them up, I've got some experience, if not, more than enough to help down there. "No, I need you to stay here and press some other levers. "No offence ma'am. "As the conduct was forcing me to address her accordingly to her rang, so as I wasn't going to reveal my identity. "But, there's no way I'm going to stay here, knowing that I can stop it. Give me a shot, I know I can do it. "She noticed too as I knew she would, after taking her eyes and sight away from where we were being lead towards, just to assert how I was handling the situation. Even now as I was noticing what she did, the false information and trying to figure out her true intent, more than testing me, she was trying to figure out too whenever she could trust me or not. "Then who's going to hold this? And what makes you think they'll listen to you and give you access to the lower decks?" "A ship with even lower decks?" "You've clearly not been before on a ship like this, have you?" Perhaps him popping out was real after all, though it didn't make much sense as of now and this high. "Fine, I'll trust you, but first, do you see that lever over there?" "The dark one with a leather covering over?" "Not that, the other one, red and striped. Pull it and hold it for as long as you can. Right now, after you'll leave, a countdown will start. Keep holding and listen to me. The exact time you're spending with it pulled, the exact time you'll get until you could go down, fix the engine and come back to hold the wheel again. If you don't manage to do it in time, we might stand in the peril of this ship getting turned around and breaking beyond its repair and the engine's. "That's preposterous, the settings make no sense at all. Then how come you haven't just blocked some of the levers, since they have various settings like the one I'm holding now? It seems to me like this ship was doomed to fail from the start. Moreover with the clouds flying over us and the kingfishers flying overboard, invading our place" I was getting into position, despite being hotheaded about it, I would still give the plan a chance as. "It remains our only hope, despite you commenting on the various machinery that wasn't even built by us. We just follow. If we make it, I'm sure to let the manufacturers know about your complaint. Time is running out, make the move now, and here. "She gave me her badge, holding the wheel still. One hand to another and it was exchanged, with the lever still pulled by the inches, I could hear the system of cogs and strings running by the lever and it was being held away by me. Even as we spoke, the machine counted how much passed and what was about to happen next would count towards something else. A rush by me which would leave me not enough, to go through possible. "Three levels below, separated with rooms, access and many more loops that you will need to avoid. You can slide your way easily through all of them if you're as quick of foot as you look. The moment will come when you'll hold it no longer and the count will start, I won't be able to keep it by myself, both of the wheels, especially since we're heading into the storm and you can see that on his face too, just about there. You'll jump over the stairs and give no thought to any injury or anything that would happen to your own body. The gate towards the bottom is most likely open so you'll have to problem going inside and avoided giving any explanation to the men and women that are standing on the sides or cowering under tables. They'll be too much in shock to react, trust me, I know my crew too well. "The second leap past them, as she was right about it, not more than a glance and even that was extended, unlike the arm that didn't even get to touch me before going further. "The room, you've been into, a second one that has no reason to be unlocked, leading to another one that has a set of stairs going to the second level. The stairs are extremely protected against high stress, enough to match the ship's extra casing too. Once you've got to the second level, don't stop and don't even think about taking a break from it, there's no rest for you until this will be taken care of. At the end of the stairs there will be a set of two doors, don't go in neither of them. Instead, turn around and take the door behind the stairs, it's hard to see, hidden in the dark but you'll be able to feel it just fine. "A touch and another, the sound came from above, someone was about to follow through and I hadn't enough time for the unimportant delay that was about to happen. She was right about it but I didn't remember the presence of two doors here, strangely as I hadn't enough time to check it. And there it was, a simple pull, then push. "Then pull and push through with as much strength as you can muster in the remaining moments you've got. If you don't remember it well, just run, avoid doors and look at the one below. After that, the problem will come, you will be driven towards the second level's engineer secret shortcut. There's no doubt that as we're speaking, a lot of them are on the way down there, towards the coal engines and the boiler room. The system works fine, hard to explain now, but keep heading through the halls, they'll be named differently on the top of the each room's door. You'll avoid most of them, and hopefully you won't encounter any of them on your straight forwards path, then turn left, climb up a half level above the one you're at and keep going the path you're set after reaching it. But if does happen and you do encounter any of them, here's what you do. "I didn't stop, the boiler room avoided, another iron plaque said propulsion room, that needed to be avoided even more as it was just a subdivided area she said it was. Far from the right one, just one engineer popped up, alone having a smoke, looked stressed. Afraid that he'd slow me down, and being thicked by the ripples made by his smoke shown from far away, I took out the badge and held it in front of me. Passing by as he didn't seem to care at all about it, distressed and hopefully giving up whatever he witnesses. He didn't give any point nor harsh opinion about me, even after looking in my general direction, seeing me before I even managed to take out my badge. The desperation in his eyes gave me an insight towards where I was going. "It should be enough to hold it, knowing that on the rare occasion I do happen to give it to someone. ""They'll just sit down like some lap dogs and understand from where I'm coming from?""Yes, something like that, and don't worry about any repercussions, as long as you're able to do what you've said about. Well, pass the next corridor, take the next door that pops in front of you, it may seem like it came out of nowhere but you might just end up being just fine. I hope at least, the badge I gave you also acts like a key, a special one, as it can be inserted in the lock. "And turned along the mechanism that held it whole, twisting and starting to manoeuvre itself to the clever machine that it was made to fit in. "I hope you've got, well, swift fingers because the mechanism almost works like a lockpick. ""Even with the key?""Yes, there's not much time now, the rest of it will be up to you, do your best to open it and reach the backup engine going. It had to be manually started, or else we'll end up on the bottom. "Darn thing, a slide in, a pull. The other engineers saw me and passed by, understanding what I was here for. Not even once was I questioned, nor did I. "But, couldn't I send someone here to help you?We're running out of time and it seems to me like by the time you're finished with. . ""No, no one must know. If they find out I asked for help, they'll have my head on a plate. I'm counting on you from now on, to go through all of it, after that, the path is easy, clear and linear. Enough that even someone inexperienced. "Could figure out what to do. And where to go.

"Though I really hope you've got the experience in doing this such of peculiarity in skillfulness. "Despite being ashamed of having it learnt, it managed to get me through, having the set roll, opening and backing down by itself.

"I've got nothing else to tell you from now on. "Leaving the rest to me, going lower, seemingly to another level below, after going not even an entire one above it. A turn and another. "Just like before, keep in mind, turn and turn, pull and release before going through with it again. You don't have much time on your hands. "There, in front, after climbing down stairs, then a downslide, then stairs again, it seemed to me like it was intentionally built to slow down whoever wanted to get through. "Damn her and her explanations, the door is here. "And it shouldn't be locked,

a slam from behind, far behind. Someone locked me inside but it was too far and the fall had top priority to be stopped for now. "Open it. "And I did, just like she said it, everything was done like she said, with the way clear and someone backstabbed me. Unhearable must've been sound proof, whatever and whoever was wearing it, I couldn't feel anything but the slam that closes it. "Well, what's done is done. Now to take care of. "On the other side, I laid at a balcony. On my left a set of stairs. But I saw the problem in front of me, or moreover below. From bottom to the top, the secondary engine, the one that would save us from the upcoming doom, straps cogs and cables, tying it together and functional. Everything covered and stuck by an eating organism, seemingly ascending from somewhere below, it almost enveloped the machine, taking it as its own thanks to the heat emanated from it. Ratched and decaying, it would eat itself and the machine before leaving it be. Such a curved body found its way into its every drain and vent, trying its best to keep its parasitic body alive. "Wait a minute. "Disgustingly I realised what it was, despite being grown in size, pulsating with water, I could feel the oxygen being drained and thrown out of it along with the impurities. Judging by its size and knowing what it was, it must've been attached for at years at least.

"Damned thing. "I had to get rid of it and fast, having every word almost reach the end of the sentence that came out of her mouth. "Below. "I said whilst making my way down there, if I was lucky enough, perhaps I could find out something important. But the stairs almost ended up being like a spiral in the tower I was descending below.

Whoever built this ship must've been insane to build a tower-like room inside a flying ship, that was locked tightly the way it was. It seemed like it was never-ending, going through a larger distance than I originally assumed. Its many mouths adapted to the many sources of boiled water that the engine must've had, but how did it get to be in the place to begin with?This wasn't going to be easy but at least it didn't take a note of me as of yet. Pulsating in its place with its coagulated outside bubbles, sucking and increasing in size now more than ever. My sudden presence was soon felt by it, yet it couldn't do anything against it from the place it stood. No, grip and not even an evolved membrane to defend itself from me, the only thing it could've done was if it were able to attach itself onto me. And even then, the many mouths were already caught in the trap, waiting to be ended. "Damn. "Accidentally escaped as a part of the stairs that laid in front was covered in its part. Somehow there must've another source of water coming from somewhere inside the walls, going through the various pipe systems hidden inside the crucible. That carnivorous extent was almost stuck to it, unable to reach to me but I had no idea what could've happened if I touched it, especially if I came into contact with such an old specimen. "Enough time wasted" I jumped over, almost losing my footing, going on stairs. The bar was ancient too if it weren't for my other hand to grab one of the bars I would've fallen down. From that bit that disintegrated on touch, left me enough space to look below and see where the falling point was and how I would be impaled upon the iron bars set aside by the original architects of the place. "There isn't any time to rest. Agh" I lifted myself up, making sure I wouldn't touch the veins that grew on the walls, below and around. There was still a long way to go and an important task to take care of. The place must've been infected more than I thought, the walls had many slender nerves spread across the walls on the way down as I approached the engine. An eerie feeling came from somewhere as I started feeling them. A flash and a sudden stop managed to scare me as the lively room became murky and decayed, hard to see. It almost felt as if someone gashed a blade in my soft part of the head, flaming it, piercing all over. The stairs were the same but all dirty and even as I got close to falling on my knees and getting my hands all dirty in the rust, the thought of time running by kept me going on. Foot after foot, on the disgusting stair, before I could come back to reality. The distributed version went before I could take a look to my right and see its decimated form. With its pores visible and inflating coat, it reminded me of where I was and what had to be done. The bars that were uneasy and unable to hold me if I tried sustaining myself over them. Almost there, I thought about what happened but it left soon after as it could wait until I was done with it. Though the image of the ship so decayed served almost like a premonition of what could happen if I failed to do my assignment. But I would not. The final part was close and I managed to avoid the still growing parts that attempted, even now to patch and attach themselves further on the stairs. I crushed them, though, at this point with so many of them, it wouldn't feel a thing. The shimmer gave to me more than I should've known. It wasn't water, I could feel beyond it, as it travelled, ounces of it through its entire system. Feeding like a parasite from whatever nourishment laid inside the engine. The place was structured, even if an enormous part of it was covered. The walls struck by force, someone was here before I could even think about it, yet no one in sight now. Filled with many command points that would normally be used for control were not in the function to be used as all of them were carved. Most likely by one who came here before. A manual start from there would be impossible, at least for the ones that were in front of me. The room was still round and there was still hope that the remaining ones weren't in such a bad shape like the one before me. Somehow I had to get rid of and I was reaching the end of the lever I once held, not to mention that I had to get back and stop the ship from falling. I looked around and saw how its once multiple mandibles with which it started at the beginning of its life now implanted themselves inside the floor, going deeper and most likely contaminating it from what it has become. That would explain why it felt like it inside, but not why it grew almost root-like canals made for the suction. Leaving nothing but one side to be visible of the panel. That revealed the engine I had to free of it. "There. "I noticed where I could have been impaled if it wasn't for a quick reflex of my hand. And away too from the roots that could've fancied a problem. I took one and flew through unnoticed, with not even a clue about the intent of which it had against me. "Yet, this could be useful. "One strike from the side, I impaled its soft coat, with no trouble, even after its growth, it remained as subversive as it would've been in its previous size and state. I twisted and tried seeing a reaction yet none came as it was too big, a blob, doing nothing but feeding itself. The liquid that I so deeply wanted to think of as water wasn't like that. Though they both shared in resemblance and texture, it somewhat felt thicker than it. Could've been from the contact with it or not, it wasn't my time nor job to decide. I pulled the bar out to make the place for the small stream that would reach the floor soon after its removal. Another time in the same root, I punctured it to make a spot for even more source to lose its composure. "With enough of these, I could get you to drain yourself to death. "Something shook me as I was getting ready to strike a third time. The bar served me well, even after, as a make shift cane. "The ship falling must be the cause. You really need to be ended as there's not another way this could go. "A similarity reminded me of before but not well, no backpack behind and certainly no lighter to scare it off, not that it'd do something of this size. The mouths that resided now above stopped chewing, now it was certain that it acknowledged my presence. The root started shaking too, primal instincts that must've been activated, distracting it from its meal the moment it felt threatened by me. Though, just leaving stream to dry it off didn't seem to work. Soon after, one of the roots, the same one I was taking quick shots at, crammed itself, one level above, having no liquid getting pulled through anymore. Nothing came after that as nothing was being absorbed into. "If this is how you're going to play, they so are it. "It drained itself but this was going to be its downfall. Walking towards the other one of the evolved mandibles turned into a big push above, rather than going below it. Making sure I'd get as many parts of its inside before it covered it too. Two off and it noted before I even pulled it out, leaving nothing to be consumed. "Hah, I wouldn't have thought nor the omen of encountering something even weaker than the enormous beating fiend and those insane fools from before. "Completely worthless against me, I kept going around, handing strikes to its every side, draining it from what it was worth. With all of them stabbed in every side, I lost the notion of time and the thought of checking any of the control sides. Some sounds finally came as the final jab at it came through. The sound as the last source of its hydration got sealed and it could hold it no longer. The last time it would get drained and unable to stop itself. "This is it, but I still have a problem. "Until it died, it held no interest of mine, leaving the bar still inside it, acting as a way for it to delay the blockage of the higher canal it was inside and as a way for it to get drained faster through the hole it held inside. "This is done with. "Now with the precious water retained from the roots of the overgrown barnacle, I had to start it. "By the time, I'm done figuring out how to start it and judging by your size, you'll have your entire mass completely exhausted. "Such disgusting parasites, growing so much over nothing, gladly ending its purposeless life was something I deeply enjoyed. From the looks of it, the changes occurred in seconds, as the bigger they grew, the more dependant of substance they became. "Hmm, now let's see which panel wasn't covered. "Not that it mattered as the small extension started drying and falling down too. "No gloves. "On me since the damn backpack got lost somewhere on the way. Another pipe was in order for me to complete the task and there were more than enough for me to use. With the freshest one, I started removing some of the wines that remained dry on the walls. "This should be enough. "I said after quickly brushing off the remaining pest that occurred on the wall. After that, I had to take the risk, seemingly as I hadn't a chance to return, at least I could prevent and achieve one of the goals set in mind. They seemed rusted, the buttons removed, one panel remained barely untouched. Not for long, but something was strange. Just as it almost died, after not even managing to damage it, not for the obvious but another reason. A fake panel, none of the buttons worked, I removed, being damaged from time and more stress. "Someone glued this on the wall. Damn. "A plate struck on the wall before this parasite even emerged, leaving this whole setting to seem like a trap. The other panel that seemed to be real, or used to be, was trashed and on the other sides there didn't seem to be any panels left to be checked. I looked above as it drew its final breaths, impaled both by myself and the high engine it stood atop of. Doubtfully that it reached the other resourced that were so closely inside it, as the shell of the engine was more than enough for the soft teeth it had in each mouth. Even now I could sense its impetuous attempt to gnaw through the stainless steel that was covering the well-crafted machine. There must be another way, though, to start it, now with the withered mandibles that stopped from draining in the fuel that was alimentering it. What was I not thinking about? It couldn't be that I missed something. No, they must've been covered by them, though I had no way. No way to remove them, with the bar that I used to impale it, I tried lifting it up, hoping there'd be a way under, a covered way. "Gah" I pushed it as hard as I could after it stopped spilling but couldn't move the massive thing not even an inch. So much it was laid in that position, for so long that I would've needed an entire crew to be able to do it "Damn you. "Wait, my voice echoed through the room. So high that I felt almost the whole surrounding up to its metallic bland ceiling. "Hahahahaha. "I almost laughed at how ingenious I appeared to myself, as not even on my best day could I come with such a glorious idea. Even as I did it, the room shaken again by its fall reminded me of the desperation sent to me by everything, from the dying creature to the fall. "But, it's not over. "Another pipe was taken away, the third one to be used, yet this time to its best purpose. "I don't know if you can understand me but if you did. I would've like to inform you that I'd get to use your whole embodiment to its full capability and usefulness. "I said excitedly. Its skin now not so repulsing from the point of view that I now had. I held the pipe even harsher than the one that I so used to impale it, going around the round room and trying to look for the best position. "There. "Where the distance from one of its mandibles and seemingly the panel that was destroyed by someone were parallel from one another. "I hope you don't mind. "I said without waiting for its approval, before backing away to the slightest to obtain a boost of distance. Enough now, that I would swing as hard as I could, not to damage it as that remaining part of it was already spoiled, but to feel the tremor it had. "Alas, it worked!" I couldn't believe it, shouting in a burst of emotion, feeling the pumps get slightly moved below it, from such a simple motion made by me. Enough space that it could be started, if only I managed it, they could be moving up and down being impervious to the now soft but hard skin above them. "This may be my last chance, both of ours. "Another strike to bounce them, a lot of them residing just above the mechanism that powered the engine. "Come on, just start already. "I said on a whim this time since the strikes didn't do much other than bounce them down and up. Rather, they were getting closer to drilling holes into the soft side rather than managing to be started. "This is it. "Despite my efforts not seeming good enough, I managed to kickstart it enough to feel a slight push of energy, of motion on their own, even if it was slow. With another pipe abandoned, and not caring of any infection I'd get, I started pushing through the skin, backing the motion as much as I could. Unable to do such fast pushed with the pipe, I got faster and faster, causing ripples from one side towards the other, feeling how the dry inside was getting mashed by both my hands and the moving pumps. Enough moves were more than enough that I could feel the rods going on their own now. "This should do it for now. "And it was good, the pumps going, the water stopped from being drained, the beast dead or close to it. One last thing remained, freeing the steam and heading back. And even faster now, that bits and part of it started falling off, long teeth taken apart if such a mass suddenly fell over, it could get messy, for both of us. With its mouths both inside and outside seeking its last meal, it would be a shame if I failed at this point. I had to seek the point where the steam would normally be released from, a gash, a hole or any other. It was being formed somewhere but I couldn't pinpoint the location, I took both of the pipes I dismissed before and circled it carefully, trying to find the release point. "No. "I just thought of it. It wasn't below but it must've been located somewhere above. "Good thing too, I doubt you'll leave me enough space to move. "I said but got interrupted from having to dodge a chunk of its now carcas that suddenly fell off it. I got away, whilst still holding them as weapons, in case, I would fail. Not enough room in my hands to take other, as they were too heavy and too sturdy to carry with me, not to mention too wide for my hands too. Closer to the stairs, I start ascending, trying to see any weak point, anything important being covered as the parasite was slowly being broken apart. "It would seem like the time for me to book it came closer but I'm not done with you as of yet. "I spoke from a strange point between us, climbing to seek, trying to sense where pressure was getting accumulated so I'd burst it. "There. "I said, sadly being mistaken and rushed it, chucking one of the pipes almost as if it was a spear, strangely instinctual and wrong as it wasn't the point where the steam was being held. "Damn it, perhaps I can. "No, below and too far, the remaining poles were covered and stuck in one of its falling bigger chunks that made its way onto it. "This is my last shot. "I couldn't help it but talk to myself after looking at my hand, dirty but hold the remaining tool of salvation. I kept climbing until I reached the spring point, where it could barely hold itself on the wall and blocking the stairs no longer as I used the tool I had to lift it up. Not as powerful and strong, undeveloped like the rest of its strong mandibles. I was prepared this time, removing it with the rest of the bars around that I would've used to keep straight if time wasn't so awful with them, eroding them far beyond what they could've been. It didn't trigger a chain reaction as the rest of the bars still managed to remain in their position, follow me in my ascension, serving as a point of reference for me to check its every centimetre. An arc would be just fine, this time, just perfect for me to get the right angle before flinging the spear like object I now had in possession. "Come on, reveal it faster. "Despite knowing there was the lack of understanding between the two of us, I couldn't help but taunt it. Especially now, knowing that its existence was ending in front of my very eyes and it didn't have any way to fight me back. "There. "I said again, certain this time, feeling the sudden built of pressure popping out just at the point where I suddenly ended near. Just above, where I thought it would be located, with confidence, I threw it inside, knowing that the part that was framed upon it beyond the fall wouldn't separate itself from the stainless steel it held. Almost like a burst came out, releasing. "Steam. "The final part before I could hear the pumps beating faster, harder, the steam being blown away and the parasite remaining with its last parts withered on the engine. Close to the exit too, I was expecting that it wouldn't be stopped from working. "No time to celebrate now, I'm sorry to leave you in such a hurry. "I close the door after reaching the end of the stairwell, done with the pest control and concluding the manual reissue of it. I had to rush my way back and try to open it somehow as I was reminded that someone blocked my way towards where I was hoping to get. Stopped midway as a sombre sound came from behind. The door locked behind, at least that's what it had to be, shutting itself with no aid from my own strength. I waited for a second to check if I'd get to feel or hear again, anything of the strangest sort of variety. Both my eyes were struck on the door, the filth that resided atop it and the artificial light that had all its cables spread across the ceiling and just atop of the door. Trying my best to notice any sudden distraction and movement in case something tried getting a jump on me. "Nothing. "I had to get back from it, this place, despite getting rid off so easily might've got me a little too paranoid. Hopefully, it really died, as it had no strength to walk on its own. No, I saw it wither and stop going with the start of the contraption. Now it was the time to get out. Closed like a vault from this side, hopefully, it worked like one from inside as I hadn't the tools in possession for his time being. "Who's there?" Again, I thought I heard someone, the light was still shining bright and I felt no tremor to tick me off any possible presence that might be stalking me. Was it avoiding it, could I end up relying too much on it rather on my own senses?"No, come on, open already. "I said whilst starting to spin it off, as fast as possible. The faster I managed to get out of the closed chamber I was in, the better it was. Thankfully the lack of air wasn't a problem as the ceiling was filled with many openings, log shape holes for the air to come in. If it weren't for them, more than likely for me to pass out. "Come on. "Again, my patience was getting lost, with my head almost turned to see behind, to look at all time. Again I heard something. Something other than the sound of the bars getting turned under my hands. Coming from the top, still nothing else from my extension fo senses. "Thanks. "I said, excitable as it reached the end, second before noticing the steam coming from above inside the room I was in. The steam was pumped from the room I just left behind, luckily I busted out of the room, after seeing it, ending on the ground from the sudden boost of movement. Whilst on the ground with no one around from what I could see over my head, I wasn't able to control my hands and scratch my every corner of my body. "Gahhh. "My neck was hurting and insides hurt, before the second door, I passed through locked itself, separating my body from whatever was inside that cloud. "That. That. . That wasn't steam. "Hoping that someone would take note, hear me and come to assist me I said it loud. As loud as I was able to, unable to shout, the gas that came out of that engine, the liquid that wasn't water, had a side effect on me. Confused but not boldly stricken, I got up. "I can't stay here. It must've made me paranoid, up to this point. "I had to avoid talking to myself on the way back, so I wouldn't get sent to solitary confinement, seen as an irrational person. "But. "A thought came by as my vision became altered with each step made, it wasn't just an optical illusion. The gas was visible, despite not being in thick clouds like before, it must be reaching the quarters I was in. I took my shirt closer and covered my mouth. I had to get to fresh air, at the top of the deck before I passed out. Intoxicating, close to it, the chunky shirt I was wearing couldn't do anymore but slow the process and the intemperance that was driving my senses into a deep confusion. One hand was keeping the clog on my mouth and the other was on the wall, as I was having a hard time trying to keep myself straight. My eyes felt in a flash, almost as if someone just passed by and dropped a later, bursting into flames before dissipating in flames. I was almost frozen, afraid of what would've happened if the gas that was affecting me would've been flammable. I could barely stand as it was, see as I could, try my best to find a way out despite being disoriented. Another sudden stop after reaching the edge of the entrance that would've to lead me towards the engine room. The one thing that I was so desperately afraid of losing, after admitting becoming addictive to, decided to come back. A shiver came, from far away, farther than I ever could've heard before, not even the first time I experienced it, not even then could top the performance it now came to. Others pass by running but I wasn't concentrating on them, the deep confined levels and the specific thing I heard were too grim to take my thought away from. Away from me but too afraid what it would do if it found its way, far through the twisted network, past the, now crushed way that I once used to get here, a beat came through. Still on the same level, as I was, another one came. They followed, more of them, above the ground again, followed by others, not from it but steps. One step accompanied the beat, going and going on, not stopping, gradually and defined. Unmoved, perhaps actually moved by the gas, noting that it hadn't any side effect to it as it had to others. Behind those beats, before twisting my head, gnarling my eyebrows, breathing even more deeply through, a trail of bodies were left, fresh, other twisting their hands even now. If it wasn't for another one of the running men that just swept himself into me, falling down as I still had one of my hands keeping me on the wall, I would've remained there frigid from my crippling newly obtained phobia. His face too, being soon covered by both of his hands, shaking in terror, trying his best to cover his eyes. I tried lifting my spirit up but, there wasn't any to be. Walking away, there wasn't any chance for me to help him now, as I knew it would come for me, beyond the many turns, despite his speed, it didn't forget. And as I knew where it was, being distracted by its moves, even thought I had to give my best and concentrate towards escaping the place I was in. Before it was too late, I couldn't hide but try running. Suddenly, he rolled, the whole place did on a hard right, making me hit my right side on the wall, trampling my shoulder, feeling as others fell into the same fate as did I. Its massive body especially left a mark on the side it was thrown against, but it still wasn't enough for it to have enough of an aftermath after. Unhinged because of its unaltered but hardened body, it kept marching towards me. Following the chaos and bread crumbs I left before I came here, it made its way throughout the airship. I took the other way in this now indistinguishable maze, without having the directions I once receive and with the upcoming turbulences that would end up being more of a nuisance than helpful in the effort to impair it. A small leap, a play and move than even a child could achieve, that's what kept me, even with the help of a fraction ahead of it as I would use whatever kind of extra distance gained over it. A bad idea to spare it as now it would seem, with its every approach, turn that once reflected mine, yet still far, the punishment for wanting to make it suffer for some extended period of time would come back to me. The way ahead was unclear, luckily with the leap, I jumped over a foot on the ground. Another sparing person who tried spending its last moments, soon to be at least, as the gas affected everyone. Especially it as I could feel the vibrations still connecting both of us and somehow I even felt that it could see me too. Knowing where knowing how and where I was going. Slightly sliding and barely keeping in motion, despite being revitalised it still lost a lot of fluid. More than I did as I felt some blood, a bit of myself coming through the now dirty cloth I was trying my best to hold against the impending gas. "Almost there." Muffled with the help of it, I kept going straight ahead, before taking a right. A familiar sickening feeling as the turns I kept taking made me annoyed, until the point. The damned point that I wasn't sure I wanted for it to come. The same one that I wasn't sure it would or could come. The point where I almost stopped but didn't and if I decided then to do it, I would've been dead. The longest straight forward path, empty with no one as none would take it nor dare stop. No objects, nothing to stop it, from the slow march as it most likely felt it too now. With most of my senses now numbed, slowed down too, I knew that I wouldn't have had another chance to escape. I couldn't stop, with the open door standing right in front, leading to somewhere. I recognised the pattern, even with the heat and the steam covering my vision. Another stream of air came from the front, that I could feel almost as well as how it was closing to me. Near me, despite how empty it felt, many other doors on the side, all locked, with the exception of that one that waiting for me. Airtight with the ability to seal itself and keep the toxic gas away from me. On it, a glass window, round shaped, now on the side, like the others too. I couldn't see if there was someone, anyone in those rooms, behind those screened doors. "So close. "The blood now mixed with spit, still inside the cloth, didn't stop me from trying. My best, a foot was broken. Not far behind. This couldn't be, but who's foot was it? There were many other, or so did I think, I was still far from the door and afraid that it would damn close without me, just like the one that kept the engine in place before going to it.

Hopefully, it wouldn't end up pumping more in. As the closer I got, the closer it came towards me and I were reminded before about how fast and strong it were. Crushing the bone, vibrating more, just in one step as it even avoided. A scream came, behind but not far, I could hear it even without the help of the insight. It broke right through the bone, pressing through with all its massive, metal crushing weight. And even with the scream and realising the presence of another victim under its foot. It ignored him and didn't stop at the sight nor sound of another human being in pain. Bent on revenge even now, more than it was before. "Just. A little more. "I could hear myself and no doubt so could it, after not being able to hold the cloth in my mouth anymore. So close, despite having my hand tired too, my feet to their end, the door seemingly getting ready to close itself. A sight before that came. With sweat almost making me close my eyes, so much of it came from my forehead. On my side, someone's breath seemingly came from behind the glass dome that was reinforced. So close to the hall that I went and so little time to get to it. Almost there. I grabbed its side, as the door almost closed. Stopped it from doing so and almost sealing my fate away. A small reflection in the dome that was from me, bouncing from another and another, transmitting the reflection from one towards the other. The body was too big for the hall, as it got ready to force itself through the tight spot. No way to change and no way for me to wait longer to see what it would happen next. Sliding right through the space that seemed tighter, away from the slender hands that could've reached me, possible from any distance as I was never able to see their full extent. "Ludicrous. "I said, distracted and almost ready to have a heart attack. As ironic as it would seem, I didn't look behind but below, thinking it got me by the foot. I flew right through, though, my face cold, right before my body from the compressed air that was sent right through. The door hasn't closed immediately but I managed to get in despite being afraid of what would've happened if it got me by the leg. A button, crossed with a number, on my right side, I slammed it as my strength started kicking in. The beats got harder too and the sounds of steel getting dragged upon a harsher side could be heard. It forced itself, I knew it, coming closer, knowing that as soon as it closed, there wasn't a way for it to open it as the edges were almost welded together with the walls. "Take this. "Without looking back, despite having kept contact with one another for so long, I knew it heard me before I closed the door. The hand almost reached to get me, but a seemingly bad effort as it didn't manage to get through, just enough to push the door faster. Faster than the button would've done it, knocking me behind from the pack of it reaching me. The sound stopped and I heard no throb after turning around. Away from the machinery that accompanied the rest of the room, with the vision obscured, right as I wanted to see. The only scratch marks on the glass, unable to smash them because of the thickness and texture it held against. A defence not encountered by many. No bash and no strive to get past the only object that blocked us. And, despite not being able to confirm, see not feel, I knew it was on the other side, even if it wasn't for long until we both took different paths, we stood in front of one another. Not knowing each other too well, almost as blood-sworn enemies, after two close encounters, beyond words and action, we almost stood as equals, despite there being so many differences between us. And then, as my consciousness almost got fully healed and so did my senses after so much air getting through my lungs. It almost felt like I heard the sound beyond the locked, the tightly locked gate. Of it leaving, slowly returning from where it came from. "It looks like. I won. "I said it on a monotone note as it didn't leave much else than a bittersweet victory. If I could even call it that way, for now, each of us, being lead towards different parts with chances that might intersect with one another as this place was almost like a maze. I turned to see the machinery and the cordage on the wall, that was leading to every place, limiting with the ship with the power. The gas must've powered it up at a grim exchange as the many inhibitors, other than me got affected. Or at least those who didn't get to safety like we did. These room, I must've seen twelve other than the one I saw in, enough space for one at a time to go through, and see how they shot soon after. I doubted that many other managed to get through.

And walked the same way I did. Crawling through the passage that most likely lead towards the same road, as doubtingly the ship wasn't escalating through a vast system. No, that would be giving it too much credit. Though with the place barely lit and the occasional hit from time to time, I was glad to be safe. Since what I've learnt so far, from this far off received experience, I would get to be covered for as long as I didn't stop. Not now and certainly not after, reaching, a ladder. A wooden one, going as far for me to say it would lead towards the levels that I ventured through to get here. Without a second doubt, I started climbing. A past experience has spoken to me, reminding me how and what happened before in a situation just like this one. But waiting for it to come and corner me wasn't good. I stopped and saw, this was planned. A mask with filters, four of them, not heavy and not soo shabby for me. I prepared it, checking it first, for once to see, it looked as if it worked. Again, before going with it, in the little window of time I received, even if it was faster, without the constant shake from the ship being driven outrageously, it was still too much of a distance for it to reach me. The safe path ahead, but I hesitated. The thought of what I've done. Not guilt, but of what other side effects it had on the people after the nausea was over. A step with each thought as there were many to still take. If it was enough to make a parasite grow, that not being boiling water that I thought when I saw it first hand in my ignorance. And the gas, the presence of masks to protect ourselves from it. The same one I was shameful using, knowing that I might've been the only one in the worst scenario. Now it was clear to me that I wasn't hallucinating and being in the same room as I felt its presence, encountered it again. The, so called captain lied to me. About everything. Taking notes and giving me false hope about what was about to happen.

And another one of steps joined the set of past ones. That gas, even some of its effects that got to affect me for the short time we've spent in contact together. And before I knew it then, something was happening with that crushed hand, behind the beating heart as it passed by. A reaction I felt but didn't note until now. The only thing that got to make me think about the dangers I would face against the more I progressed into. After opening the sealed trap door.

"It leads into a room. "That was new and so was my soft whisper as I wasn't planning on making my presence felt yet. And to my note, the self one it shut itself back, air tight, the small gusts that came out with me vanished. By now with my air access purified, I could try my best to stick to my best abilities. Though, if one way lead to another, how many of the ones that might've gotten through managed to get to one of the rooms set? Could be worse if other took notes of them and started searching. The door was my first best, a safe deal to get close and listen to. Knocks and other clenched boots with one another, someone was walking by. I couldn't feel it but I knew, from the simple sound that it wasn't someone heavy enough to make a difference. Yet, It almost sounded as if, whoever was passed the door walked normally, with no scorn. And in no way could the effect let him in such a state, unhinged, able to walk like, perhaps faster and softer than me. Other could've been with him, yet I couldn't be sure, I wasn't going to rule it out, though. A fight would seem most plausible in this dire moment we've both bent sent in. Already set, two wills against each other, as we both stood on the door, one trying to get in whilst the other blocking it. It wasn't locked but he didn't know that yet, the intruder that wanted to break in and reveal my sacred location. With one of my grips on the gate and the other standing on the extremity that was between the edge of the door which stood exactly near the extension of the wall. This position was perfect as I managed to keep it tight for the longest while. Just as the attempts got harder, he was getting more frustrated with me. Whenever it was me or the system the door had, the advantage was on my side of the door. In which sense, he couldn't get in, despite trying and trying, something was coming quickly in his way. My consciousness was clean and I knew what it would happen if it came for him. Even with the chances of him being whole, I. Couldn't take the risk of getting an infection inside, the chances would've been even slimmer for me. "Damn. "I looked away as I judged it fairly before he stopped trying to get in. If anything would've happened, a scream or cry for help would've arisen. Now, the sound of him running away, just to be accompanied by another set of footsteps. I had to care and not make a sound now. Not even a gulp of my own saliva, after hearing a cane being stricken to the ground, coming from the same way as those footsteps. There was definitely someone there and. "Come out now, I know you're in there. "He found me, with a voice that was more than enough to roughen me off. Moudly at the base, probably worse in person, I wasn't going to hide, though. I opened it expecting the worse, despite being proven otherwise. A risk for a risk followed by another. "Let's go. "He said, carrying a cane and a mask on his face, after seeing mine, both of us knowing what to expect from each other. The place we came from and what was going to happen next. "You know what. . "Before being able to ask, or even imply I was asking, whilst following him through the chamber quarter we were in, he was ready to lend me some of his comprehension. "Happened. I do, we both know, I saw it. ""So you know it might be coming for us. ""Yes, it came through my head, even ruining my plan to hide until things settled in. "I hadn't known if I could trust it, more than a simple lead that is, not even if he knew it had something for me, other than following like a moth to a flame. I needn't no confirmation, still I received one from him. "Whatever that was, it managed to scratch my view. Even thought it wasn't a great one. Seeing one of my brothers being. ""I'm sorry to hear that but we could mourn it later. We need to get to the top of the airship. "He stopped to see, to the way, the side, the door, the hatch towards another quarter. The side we were on had its staircase demolished, I looked behind, having his back, despite knowing that if someone decided to have the jump on us, we would've been totally unprepared. "You smoke?"He asked, in this strange and awkward timing, despite barely having him met. "Now, it's not the time. ""Is it ever the time for it?I've been trying to quit for the longest time. "With the pack out of his worn out the pocket, almost wet, he took one one cigarette after seeing my decline and one only. "How are you going to smoke it?You're wearing a mask. ""Well, that's the idea smart fella. That is the idea. "I knocked it off his good hand but not the pack, seeing how it was set off on the same hand he held his only crane. "You know that's quite expensive nowadays. ""Cut it off, you can smoke all you want after we're out. "I still needed him, knowing what was out there and at the same time not knowing what to expect from it. His face complexion didn't let me much to expect from him. Truth, there was nothing and nothing indeed to. "Stop me from leaving here and now alone. ""I won't be stopping you, it's true that whatever happened now and here, it might swallow us whole. Though, you seem like an interesting fellow, different than the others. Perhaps. "And he stopped, unlocking a door that stood just now, between the two of us. And in that moment, despite not being sure on myself, if I should trust him or not. There had to be something. "A declaration of some sort. Something to assure that we're going to both get out of here together. As we both, obviously need one another. "I waited for a response, standing at the heel of the door, with one of my eyes being watchful on the other side, still to this moment. "Fine, think what you may about me, but let's shake on it then. We'll get out together, seeing how we're the only two who came through the same way under the same circumstances. "He reached with his long hand and gave me a hard shake, with a look on his face, leading the way, knowing the place better. The different path towards different people, the quarter we were in was nothing alike others. It wasn't too soon after that we found each other in a sprint, avoiding those who were the most hardly stricken by this plague that was set against us. Other on the floor, the common sight that tagged with us toward the way, despite this time them being more animated than the last time. Reaching for us, seeking support, despite us being in the hurry. He grabbed me by the hand, no, above it, almost like a chain, pulling me, despite wanting to check them out. To help, to see, as we were going through the dangling cabins, with the lamps above us ready to fall and engulf the place in fire. They were beyond saving he said. "And there's nothing we can do to them. "As I understood and assured him of that, he let go of me, even if I wasn't sure. "We're almost there. "I said, recognising something, a seal on a door soon to come into contact with us, the same one, hopefully, that should've appeared on both sides of the door. And no one else in sight to slow us down. He prevented me from going any further and so did I after. Holding his hand on the wall and the other as an extension to stop me. Suddenly a door opened in the direct path, from a right, through it, that enormous fiend busted through, charging whilst holding one of those people who came into contact with the gas. Before beyond repair, bigger and melted with not only the suit was wearing but with part of the fiend, the wood and soon with the rest of another room that he was driven in. Before long, just as they both disappeared into the room that laid across the ones they came through, I looked at my skin as almost managed to cripple myself with doubt and disgust, seeing small pouches formed on my hand. "It's going to get a lot worse. "He said, knowingly after taking notes to what happened. "We need to get out before it decided to come back. "I said right as we passed the room it came through, broken, cracked and with a crumbled wall after his decimating strike was given. It hearts clean and too far for me to note, we didn't stop and bashed through our only hope, breaking the door but not beyond repair. We closed it before going up the stairs. "Wait. "I said, stopping him again, grabbing him by the tie, avoiding any touching of our skins, not knowing if our skins would combine. Despairingly thinking that it seemed as if the meat popped out of the suit I was wearing too. "There were people before, just at the higher level before coming through. ""Do we have a choice?"And we were answered, despite not asking for it, other than to ourselves. "Someone's trying to break through below, we might've not locked it well enough. "A problem arisen, even if I informed him of our problem, he knew too that we didn't have an option since none of us was well suited for a fight. Both being close to the same age and stricken, with a lower level despite not the same, of disease. "Let's go, we can think it through once we're there. "A small hole came by and I didn't know. Whenever it was here or not when I first passed it without knowing. The size and seeing where it was didn't make any sense. Like a small storm drain with many bars standing on the wall, a pair of feet and someone was looking through. No time to waste but something baffled me. The face of that young man looking at me, unaffected by the gas, wearing a mask and staring at me in that one second as we passed with such a peculiarity. Before reaching so, upstairs, I couldn't feel nor hear what he said as someone was crashing through, even deeper below coming from us. "This is it. . "He said, with no weapon nor anything to help us, a room full of people laid forth, none of them even reached the door to open it, all of them fell as victims to the damned gas.

"We need to. "I didn't finish as we started rushing through, all of them gasping, grasping for anyone is the sight. They note as we were unaffected, at least not the same as they. Not as repugnant, melted and stricken with pay. Spite drove them towards madness and they pulsating, rippling and moulded bones pushed them through, closer to both of us, left with only enough space to go by. Not enough as we would have to do the best to avoid them, the best of our capabilities to not become as contorted and affected as they were. We couldn't run through and at this point like no other, nothing could provide me with any guarantee that he wouldn't turn on me. The vibrations helped me now, in the dire moment, something that he didn't know but I understood quickly. After ticking me off some of the parts that were driven even more by the atrocious disease that was corrupting them, growing thicker in some parts, hardening and not being able to manipulate beyond their set form. Those small parts, just as they were getting ready to rush through us, noted me of the small spaces I could touch and push myself in order to avoid them. Five of them and luckily three were on his side. An equal distance as whoever was below couldn't and didn't have enough time to reach us. We didn't stop, neither of us did, as each step had a bit of them fall, at least those that didn't harden up to the bone and fragments in their skin. Alike, they were less human than ever now but I've already made my mind about that the first time I realised they haven't even tried getting out of harm's way. My companion, who's name I haven't even known was silent as so was I. Their hissing and slurred words didn't distract me as I had everything that had to be done in mind, everything that had to be said already stricken. Our promise would soon be broken in less than seconds. In an action that separated, would separate both of us. Two of them would trip in seconds, trying their best to catch me, despite risking being cemented with one another. One twist of my eyes towards the right side and their direction noted me where they would end, so many in one sight and space, but he was too close in his relentless attempt to get past through. Without noting that he would get grabbed before he even had the chance. My only advantage remained, having to assert myself towards the only ability I've been given. Neck in neck, almost, I felt his hand grabbing a hold, not that it mattered as he had no chance to even disturb, and from the feels of it, the strength left him a long time ago. He needed to know my location, which was a bad sign. In the mere seconds that we had to come up, individually with a plan for each of us, that might be working towards one and the other's torment, I had realised that our deal was soon to be crossed over. Who would be the first to betray the other?The room was still big, perhaps three or four times that I remember coming through at first. Or was it the fact that everything was moving slower than before?This gas was doing too much to all of us, even with he protection, the measurements were taken, it still found a way to erode our trust and not a lengthy alliance that was now reaching the breaking point. Would or could I betray him after this?Have I become this low, or, perhaps the better question remained, would he do it if he was in my position?What would I?In his?"Duck!"I yelled as I felt the joints bent, one of them from his sides got ready for a leap, enough to gain some extra leverage and distance over the others. Whatever was happening inside his knees, the substance and the remains of the bones solidified as the pressure got higher. In his action, he ended up doing more, slowing the others down as he suddenly stopped to get into the right position. Luckily he saw and noted of my action as his once set vision on the left straight up on the other, seeing what I saw too. He ducked and lowered himself, just as I did, in time to avoid the leaping degeneration. So low, yet still on our feet, we saw him float above us, trying to avoid any part of him that would come into contact. Knowing that, at the same time the opportunity couldn't be wasted, we pushed one another to walk, just as he kept drifting above, heading towards the stairs. The two on the left, I didn't have to watch as the vibrations bounced between the companion of mine and them, giving me a great deal of information about how stuck they were and towards where they'd go. If they were able as the remaining thread was fastly approaching, as were we towards them. A part of my skin solidified too, towards my wrists, almost distracting, leaving me in an unnerved state about my situation and problem. With one hand above the ground, reaching it with the tips of my fingers, I got up, pushing through, grabbing him with the other just as it was safe to lift both of us. Two threats at just an end's thread, closer to us, too close to comfort and we still didn't have much to reach the safe resolve. The other two disabled. A flank would come as the two approaching ones were equally distant from one another. We separated just at them, seeing how we had better chances to make an escape. He stopped and let me make some space, watching how the situation evolved from the point I was on. They couldn't leap, I somehow knew that after focusing on their knees, seeing how they still had a soft inside and their bones too mangled to be stricken by the iron melture that worked before. Fixed on him, the degeneration that pushed him to lose his once loved humanity also stricken him of common sense as it would've had an easier task if it came onto me. Instead, it took a different direction. My eyes were on it, to be sure I wouldn't be wrong, changing direction, I felt the other two moulded ones that couldn't move anymore. Which left me to the one that was directly coming for me and for no other that stood against. Not too close, I was almost driven towards the wall that could get me cornered, not by the one heading for me but the other who's distance in between him and I could've provided a lot of risk in the possible occurrence if we touched one another. A pair of candles, one of the pairs that lit the room was close to my immediate left. The time came as I grabbed it, an action was required from my part and it wasn't helpful for me to concentrate on my comrade in arms. Neither could my attention be driven away from what was about to happen, regardless of what I was going to hear out next. He didn't have the upper hand but as this point, I stopped moving. Enough, this was enough, he came close enough for me to plunge the metallic set of three candles inside him. Almost like a chucked spear, close to an impalement from still a safe distance. His chest seemed to be bursting in flames as did his arms as he stretched them in order to lift himself away from the cleansing fire. The fire prevented him from constraining his attention and seething it towards me, with his eyes almost burned, in flames, it gave me enough. Space for me to jump on the floor, rolling away and stopping with my foot and hand on a ruptured plank. Getting away as it would. It got close to fall on me, instead landing on the floor. Ahead of me the two conjoined being stood and couldn't touch. Behind, he made it too, helped by the image oh me encouraging him, somehow he made that thing trip on its own and fall on the stairs. "We made it. "I yelled, excited by all of it, despite not being over for as long as we stood in here. "Thankfully. "He gaffed too, after barely escaping himself from the imminent danger. Though, something troubled me. Just as we both levelled up, and the distance between us being so small yet large. The sound from below, soon behind and now in front of me, revealed its source. "How was I so deaf?"To my own senses too as I didn't notice until it was too late. And nor did I think about even daring to take even a step back. It came from behind, approaching him from a blind spot. "Run!"I yelled but he didn't understand, not until it was too late for him to make an action. The large figure, overwhelming any partition of the dim light that once came from behind. The same slender hand I saw before hastened itself to the point where it made it too late for him to act, despite trying. A flame started spreading too, another fired would start chasing me like it did before. "Are we. "But I couldn't finish as I saw her in him, in that slight moment before the slender hand, so big, wide and long extended towards his face in a backwards swing. He watched me, something telling me that knowingly he found out what was about to happen. Watching past the hand that came out of the darkness, towering above everything, staring at me. The mask was blurred but not before seeing. A smile on his face before the mask was blurred out of the air that was driven out, his lungs banishing what remained of it. The fire almost reached the point where it could spread across the whole ship, enough to block the path between us. It suddenly closed upon him, crushing both his mask, face and hands as he placed them in front of it. Melting them and getting stuck in place. I turned around and didn't look back, knowing what it could happen if I did. The anger, the avoidance as I passed through, burst out of the door, out of the room that would envelop the rest of the ship inside. I fell, yet, slipped on the ground as it rained, for a long while by the looks of it. Behind, I couldn't see anything as the fire and smoke started, looking as if it wanted to eat everything in sight, despite not being able to have gained sentience. The door wasn't going to be closed and I wasn't betting on it. I threw out my mask and finally inhaled a deep breath, taking a huge risk if I was still inside a confined space. The air was pure and clean, almost healing me from the growth, now visibly shrinking after mere seconds after being in contact with the clean oxygen. "Hey you. ""Nimble!" I yelled back at the kid, after seeing how he was fine, the last one truly alive in all of it. By now, with the sudden motions, despite having the ship being so stable the mask ended up on a side. He noticed in and I could see in on his face. Though, even with that, he thought of something else, other than it. "You remembered my name!" He shouted back, with the rope still being tied to him and vice versa, all riddled with water but so was I now. "What's that?" He asked but I turned my gaze before he told me so, looking above to see the so called captain, still driving the ship now by herself. "You've got some explanation to give!" I said, hoping she'd. Hoping. A burst of flames and despoiled hull came out as did it. With one of its slim hand's holding, covering and protecting its entire giant vascular organ, covered and infected too, despite its power, height and ferocity. It moved slowly now, knowing that I had nowhere to run, as the rain couldn't reach inside and the place would be slowly burning down. "What in the rotten world is that?" She finally spoke as it suddenly appeared in her field of view. A gruesome sight now from the front, most likely even worse from behind as I could feel something there, something attached and moving but I couldn't set its limits nor form. Whatever of whoever found. Itself attached to it faced a far worse fate than we were going to go through. The fresh air tightened and solidified even the smallest portions that weren't connected to him before. A great distance had to be taken between the two of us, came to mind as I pulled back, gaining as much as I could in the remaining space leading to both the kid and the fore-deck. The last remnants of the fire that almost came close to doing our job and purge him got put down by the rain. I could see its true form, pumped with a bulk from its back, almost like a hunch-back, trying to remove itself from a human size hand came out, away, yet strangled by the cords it had behind. The grin came back, the jawless fiend with its now melted attire, its upper body covered, now by the remains of those who he simply drove through the incinerator pile that I set on during my escape. "Sir, what is that?" I reached him as saw the look on his face, terrified by what he saw, as the slender hands came from their hideout, long and pointy fingers, covered in the remains of my thrown candles. I didn't see it first but it deliberately covered its heart with that substance in order to solidify the carapace, furthering its protection, spreading even farther away on the knots. A taunt came as it wriggled those hardened knots in front of us, signalling my drastic mistake. The once ripped part was still so flagrant, gave me a feeling of what not coursed through its ridden veins, of what he attained, of what he just got its feeble hands on, to push into its own cord-like veins. We stared at one another, measuring each other out, now that we both had the chance to do it, in a foggy yet strong light. We didn't charge at one, nor did the other, the kid now stood silent, only his sweat and the falling water bouncing onto him could be so daringly noted. His legs looked sturdy, long too yet bent, as if it wasn't its full size, the fact that he was constrained when we first met wasn't the best sign I could receive as my victory wasn't against itself at its prime. A note had to be furtherly taken as something was melted, from before in between his knee and what was left of his leg, preventing it from lifting to its full size. Its hands still remained as I would have an enormous amount of trouble attempting to avoid their grasp. And as I first thought I could see its body from those beats in our so dearly previous encounter, I never thought I'd be so wrong about so many things. A step was made and so did I, making my mind abandon my thoughts and assessment of its capabilities. "h" The kid gaffed to the moment it did, trying to either scare us or to take a fair out of reactions. That face that is had by it could alert anyone even at a glance, it didn't surprise me that Nimble got scared at such an extent. "Don't worry kid, I think. "My breath needed a second to be taken before going on. It noticed as it switched glances from him to me and vice versa with those glass-like eyes and moving sides that were attached to its face, getting shaken only from those close sided movements. From the side it shifted through, I managed to have a glimpse of myself of what laid behind, perhaps now, the part of him, soon to become its extra luggage. Even if it tried intimidating us, it gave out its bigger impediment, its restriction. Perhaps, who could say, it couldn't even charge now with such large masses added and stuck on its joints. "What now?" Nimble finally muttered too and I couldn't blame him for asking. Both him, I and it were treading on something, just as the ship we were on was getting ready to fall under its own weight. "Are we dropping altitude?" "Again?" I asked him back, dulling. That's why it shoved its feet so deep, I didn't look at the depth and the shattered planks under. But this time, after using Nimble as an anchor, I realised that it was deliberately driven this way as she's taken a note of the smoke that came from the cabins and the monstrosity that laid on the deck in front of her ship. Not yet, no stability as it shaken, but so did we as we were going to be tiled, possibly thrown overboard as the sudden tired of wind and nimbus would pass us both. The rope looked sturdy enough, to wrap around my hand and gain some leverage. It wasn't much that it lifted its other foot, to this best of capabilities and plunged inside the floor, soon to crumble under it. Despite protecting them to its best abilities. The rain still dropped and managed to hit the floor, travelling fine through the cracks between the protecting layer and the knots that kept its heart weld together. Not as invincible as it thought itself to me, a plan did finally arise and so did my statement to him, soon to come to its fruition. "I'll hold onto this if you don't mind" I told him, again, assuring my good friend of my intention, seeing how we slide towards the front, now to become a lower part of the ship. "Hey, Sir. "He most likely wanted to give me the notice, just as we both ran through the long strained rope that was going to hold onto us so we would stop. "Sir. "But then again, with this mad direction she took, we could get crushed by its fall on us Both of us on our feet, backpedalling on the now slope like an impasse. The smoke was now blindsiding it as it lifted itself to head above, which would end up as a weakness that would end up badly. My arm was shaken by the kid and I didn't take note until it was too late. A flash came but I couldn't take note since a lightning stroke the main deck, feet away from it. Despite not striking the fiend itself, it manages to make it cover away from the point as did we as the strike and the light that came from that direction were too much to take. And it wasn't much either that we ended at the end of the rope that held us together, still to its end's reach, closely to the ship's edge. He pulled my sleeve again, to be followed by another time he said, sir. "What is it, kid? Can't you see with what we're dealing with?" I yelled as I didn't understand what could be so important that he'd distract us from this. He lifted the gaze that was blinding me in the meantime. And I understood why was that and why so dire, we had taken the position, tied to it as was the fiend. Me being the only one who didn't see it despite being so close to us. "The course is set for us to blast through that valley!" "That's what I kept trying to tell you. "A tight one too, perhaps in such a way that the ship couldn't maintain its integrity. I looked back and the smoke was still lifting itself too high to be able to cease and signal her to stop. Even if now it was too late for the now set course to be delayed or changed. "Sir, it's trying to reach for the rope. "He directed my attention right before I could notice, in this moment of grief, with the second stream of smoke and ash coming out of the lightning stricken part of the deck. That slender hand would reach and most likely crush it without even a second look at us. Just as we could barely keep a hold on our composure, barely kept on the ship by the simplest string. "No, don't do it. It's between you and me. "I yelled and I knew it understood, despite having made the mistake in the past and misguidingly thinking of it as an idiotic tool. But that only made it sweeter as it took its time, having the balance not to fall off, avoided the strike from above and our calamity at the tip of its. The sky left out a second time, the strongest strike, splitting it in twice from above. The second strike of lightning came right above it, managing to strike through a righteous fury, managing to almost mask our sight another time as the light coming from it was too bright. The shock and its backlash almost ripped outbound rope, lowering as the fibre got almost shredded. I help my head down whilst covering with a head to accompany it. A charred scar was left on my shoulder but not before my scream of pain. "Aghhhhhhhhhh. "I didn't see, couldn't watch, still below as the act scarred me beyond the physical pain I felt. Something penetrated my skin and I couldn't see what, after opening my eyes, not being able to see. "Where is it? Can you see it?" Except the broken boards and the ashes left behind, I looked below and thought of the most likely conclusion. "It gone thrown overboard. "He said, giving life to my thought, the strike of energy saved us. "Can you believe it? We're saved!" I told him, leaving the news that would leave both of us on edge, despite not being for long. "The ship. "Whilst being reminded, even with the mark it left on me on its way down, somehow it got cauterised, but how could it?" Sir, we need to stop the ship. "He said but we were still on a slope of thoughts. "Raise the ship!" I yelled but there was no way she could hear us. At least one threat was over, leaving us one more. "To climb over and prevent this ship from crashing down. Come on Nimble, hold on. "I grabbed an end then jumped to the other, climbing with the help of the rope, getting close to another one of the many edges the ship had. "It might break if we don't take care. ""Let me worry about that. "I told him, all along as we stripped the ship of its handles. The kid grabbed too and pushed as we helped ourselves, one on the ropes and the other on the bars around the edges, closer to the soon to beside of it. As the smoke passed by and the ship soon to be ridden by the angered stones, I wondered. Beyond there, wherever it managed to land itself into if the fiend I so desperately encountered, was it still alive after such a strike? Even if finding the answer could have the chance to hit me back a lot worse than having the satisfaction of seeing it dead. "Cho, cho. "He sneezed, just a second in my back, unable to hold it as a secret, the cold he's gotten. "It's getting late. "He said as I understood it well enough, I was getting. "Tired myself but don't stop now, I promise you'll get more than a fair share after we're off the ship. ""Promise?""Promise. "A fair amount of effort and we'd be there in no time, at least I would, despite having my time off, there was the slightest opening for me to get there and make things right. A thought that haven't gone by myself in a long time. One that I haven't gone by to achieve, not by myself. "Hopefully, we'll manage to do it. I mean to stop this ship together. Right Nimble?""Right. "He said on a brighter note, right as the storm has done raging and the smoke was put down by the last falls of the rain drops. Another step and we were at the point where his rope was struck inside the fall, resistant as ever. "It didn't break but I'm not sure how much more it could strain itself before it got there. "All around I saw nothing but the broken parts of the ship, either staggered by something in the past or something in the present. "I can't follow you from here now on. "He said, whilst now holding on the edge not to fall, the same way I first found him. "I understand, it's most likely too much for me to ask, for such a dangerous thing. ""I'll wait for you though so don't forget about me once you're there. "A smile would've been enough to reassure him of my success but I couldn't give to him such an assurance. "I won't. "And that was something I should've taken in care, as I was left only with my hands on the side, something to be climbed against. With the ring of smoke finally clearing out, she was able to see and hear me. "Come on, I still need your aid to stop this. "But she didn't have something in mind, another time-consuming objective as the stairs from the side I was on got smashed before I reached them. "I can't climb this way. ""Go the other then. "She shouted back. Damnit, I had to pass the entry through the inferno below, past the dome made out of dirty glass and wood to get to the side that would most likely end my attempt whilst making my way towards it. "Ser!"The kid suddenly yelled, what could it be now?Could he not see that I was. "Busy!?"But I wish I could retract those words as I would get to see him for the last time. With both of his hands on his waist, pulling away the remains of the bonds that helped him away from floating still. "Don't do it, kid, not now, it's not worth it. Agh"It felt as if something pierced through my skull, worse than a flash. My head was aching and I could feel a part of it getting numbed down for seconds. The way ahead changed from what I saw before and now, the empty damaged part of the deck suddenly sprouted a giant square-like pole being stuck inside for a long time, swinging the ship like a pendulum rather than it flying like one. "What's going on?"I asked but had no answer, should've expected it. "Wait, kid are you all right?"I asked, whilst seeing him suddenly recover too from it. "Hey, what about you. Captain?""I'm not sure what to make of it either. "She said, seemingly shocked by the tone of her voice. "Kid, stop, this isn't the time either. Don't release that rope. ""I have to, don't try to stop me. "He had me chained as in no way could I release my hold without falling over, neither could I reach him in time. "Is this the moment you've chosen to finally let go?"I asked him, already knowing the answer and the fact that the so-called captain had no saying in it either. "Yes, this is the one, there might not. I might not get any other chance than this one if I let go if it. ""You can only make this chance once. And I can't stop you after, nor now, I'm too far from you. ""Then go. "He said. "You can still make it to her and stop the ship. "And continued with that. And, despite not having a say into it, she confirmed that. "There's still time for us to attempt it, those. "And a stop came, but what she didn't know was that there might've not been any control over the ship we were on. Perhaps that was the reason for that abrupt stop. Yet that wasn't my only reason for doing what I was doing. "I won't go there, not whilst knowing what happened. Not to you over the others I've tried and abandoned. ""I've made my min""You keep lying to yourself but it won't make it real. It didn't work for you and it certainly didn't work for me either. "It shook him a little but not enough. His facial expressions lowered down, just like the last seal that held the rope on himself and keeping him inside. I was fine where I stood, but unable to let hold of the ramp I was holding on, but what about him?"No!"It was a sudden move, shocking me despite having it expected, he let go right after releasing the only intent that held him anchored on the ship. His story soon to be unheard by me because of a mistake I did. "Don't"The image was slipped in two as the pole separated a good chunk of what I was able to see in front of my eyes. Yet in the motion, the shaken part and him falling overboard. His tiny body finally released having stopped as the forever haunting hand came out from the end of the ship and stopped him from falling. Afraid and angered by that, I realised that nothing could stop its endless pursuit of me, from fire to rain, through lightning and the fall that should've ended its miserable life. It rose from its end and didn't stop, holding the now unconscious and blameless child's life at one end. A small and ceaseless effort and it came by on my side, unshaken and mass free from falling down. An offering or a blackmail, he was kept in its hands as nothing more than a broken puppet. "Release him at once"I yelled without realising at first until seconds after that we were too far to understand each other. He wasn't crushed, I could see that well, with the help of the stability it now held, nothing could stop his march towards me. Even though a big part of his body was charred down from the damage he previously received, he remained unaffected by anything else. It didn't bother him at all with the giant pole that was shoved inside of the ship, contrary to that, it used it as support to propel itself even close to me. "What are you going to do?"She asked from behind, knowing about the conundrum we were in. "I don't know. "I looked above just as I should've realised it, she was close to the edge, talking to me from above now that she knew that the wheel didn't work. "Wait for me. "She jumped but face no recoil from her actions, landing exactly near me. "You can release now, whatever you're holding onto. "She said whilst having a perfect mix of equilibrium and strength to keep herself on the ground. "We need to head in. "She said, again on a distant note, as if I could trust her. "What are you talking about?We can't abandon him now, especially that it has him. "She responded to my bother, knowing and seeing how close it came to us, leaving us seconds. "Until it comes here to kill us both. We can't fight it, we need to do the second best thing. ""You mean?"And my question soon to be so disgustingly answered, coming from someone who had no idea at all. "We need to go back into the inferno you've created. "She said, right before going inside, the now broken and debauched gate of the inferno. She thought I have created. "Damn you. "I said now to myself as there wasn't any other choice but to follow with our executioner right on our tail. "It's not burning anymore. "I said out loud, my mouth took over without me wanting so, but I would've expected the whole place to be already burnt out beyond redemption. "Ofc course it did, what did you expect?For it to burn right under?"How could she laugh in a moment like this?Going closer to the stairs, the two conjoined were nowhere to be seen, neither were the remains of the others. "Something happened after I got out of here. "And something was about to happen, right as I looked back, the slender hand reached inside and pulled the rest of the body that accompanied it inside. "It's coming. "She took a note and started hurrying up, knowing what it was capable of and the endurance it had, having it watched from her safety above. I looked back and already lost the track of her. "No, no no. Where are you?"Damn woman, if only I could remember her name, there was no other way to the stairs where she could've gone. Broken steps, I had to jump them over to avoid falling and breaking my legs, after this was done, I knew they couldn't support the extra weight again. There was no way for any of us to return after. "Gah. "That was close, a few centimetres and I would've been a goner, I ran down the stairs, hoping to find a way, something I missed unless my only option remained to die at the heart of it. My lungs were pumping but I wasn't turning, after reaching the depths, she pulled me over and covered my mouth. "Don't. Say a. Word. "She whispered as she held me close to the wall, trying her best to blend us with the now grim coloured walls. This wouldn't have worked on any other occasion, seeing how the entry towards both sides was destroyed along with the light sources that used to reveal the rest. A stomp came as it jumped over, not going through the whole mess, breaking everything in its way. I didn't matter but it saw right through our guise. "A. "She tried speaking but the slender hand, the other one it had extended itself and grabbed her by the throat. "Release her"I said, whilst taking a hold and trying my best to remove its grab. Just like iron, in a way that I was only the equivalent of a pebble trying to push a rock aside. It shoved me aside whilst using her body, reaching the side of the wall, hard with the same shoulder that was hit by it before. "Agh. "I let a sigh of pain as it pulled her closer. I couldn't look at what it did to her, just at the sight of her being thrown away after. No word came after as another victim fell over to its nefariousness. I could only barely lift myself up, just to fall a few feet to my knees, trying to get away. "Damnit. "I said after being down, rolling over and trying to lift again, seeing how it slowly came after me with no way to repent for its atrocious acts. No one is the sight to slow it down, it looked at me with so much pity, all along as it held him still in its arm. Just to add insult to the injury. With its broken body and petrifying gaze, breaking, intentionally through the ceiling and letting the rubber just float over him. Swing after swing from its now enveloped hand came, crushing part of the doors, everything it saw, despite being so long that it would reach me. It chose not to. "You want to see me run?Is that it?"I asked, with my back still turned, trying to take my only opportunity and look for an opening. The single light I encountered after, from a lamp above got shattered just as I passed under it. "Bah"I said after spitting a shard that came into my mouth, then my hand and feet just before falling again, to lift up and try reaching. A door not so far, hopefully leading to somewhere safe, despite having it just behind. Yet another opened from my right as it would seem like another one of those who came into contact with the gas didn't feel anything else but spite towards me. It almost charged at me at my position but it got crushed between the door and the slender arc that went through its torso, crushing more than it would seem to me. "Aah. "Almost covered from the sudden motion that came so close, purposely to show me that it was in reach of me and that it could break me too at any time. "Don't you dare. "A sudden escape of weakness from my side as it wasn't the strike that was so closely driven next to me but another motion of his other hand towards the child. The one that I had no way to know if he was still alive or not. Maddened by my attempt at a verbal strike against it, it grabbed a hold of the part of the door that was open and broken it with a swipe, throwing some splinters and wooden edges into me. I used my hand to block them from reaching my face, just in time as one looked as if it was going to blind me. Pulling myself over was hard but I was close but only because it let me attempt it, being always in the reach for me, letting me know of that as its aggressively increased. More and more parts started coming and being thrown into me. Debris and other parts, shards, making me switch sides, being driven from one part of the hall towards the other. I was so close. "Gahhh"I let out, feeling the cold steam blasting through my back, a pipe was ripped out from the ceiling by its hand and no other. Its patience had its limits and I had to feel them first hand as it came from one side, shoving me towards the other, forcefully, ready to break through any door and any part of the ship to make me suffer. "Stop"I said, barely holding my breath and pain inside so I wouldn't give the satisfaction of hearing me scream. "Stoop it!" Instead, I let out a shout, the way ahead appearing farther away, with no flash and no vibration, not even the sight of any other help. I was abandoned by all, left at the mercy of someone I have hurt. One strike almost left me crippled as it almost broke one of the doors I was thrown again in the great hall I was in. It felt me there as I couldn't move, temporarily from the spot. Those svelte pumped and bellow long fingers felt like razors running across my neck, eager to end me right there. But not long until it would end that tease to torture me again, I knew it had something in store for me as they lowered down my waist. Lifting me and carrying my uneager tired from the effort I was subjected to. It knew where I, we were going so it would hold me in front, showing to me, the key to my escape but also the desperation I would be forced into since I couldn't remove myself from those etched fingers of its growth. Another door would seem to be ready so it would be opened, it used me to bash it closed as someone tried coming out. "Bah" I said, but this came for pain, as the severe hit damaged a part of my neck. The way it held me would leave me no space to turn around and check in what state the kid was in, neither did its behaviour land me any clue of what its intentions with him were. Nothing to say and nothing to do as I waited for my ride to get there. Only hope that it wouldn't cripple me to the point where our ride would've been for nothing. We would almost be on our way, if it weren't for another one, probably the last I'd see, a light bulb that lit the last part of the hallway we were in. No candles as a pale wind blew them all, a red carpet on the bottom, a colour that got to dirty even the golden rims that used to accompany it. The bottom and the objects that fell as some of the rooms were previously opened were my distractions from what would happen next. With my hands on my head, just in time as my prediction just so happened to become the truth, it slammed me through the ceiling, breaking the last light. "Gah." I let out another grunt from the pain as the shards came right into my back. I couldn't see nor feel how deep they entered, of if they were kept inside, just some of them that fell on the side. Even in the shadow, with both of us encompassed inside the dark place, the figure of the door could still be felt. Now of all places and times, I could feel it getting so close to me. Something was behind it and I couldn't feel why but there was something important behind it. It hid from me but the initial presence was felt, something ran away, perhaps, knowing the danger it once felt, setting aside everything it was doing and running away. The sudden steps and the run, that I could feel as a pair of shoes touched the floor beyond, signalling me of the purpose they held. Carrying whoever were in them away from us. "At least. One of us. Got away." I could barely mumble though it didn't care now. Holding me against the open door as the sides started with a sudden glow of light. Whoever was behind it must've lit the room as he knew there would be visitors coming. No knock was needed as we halt in the idle position. "Aren't you going. To knock?" I asked with a grunt, knowing that it'd hear me and get annoyed by my sudden slander onto. "Gah" I said again as I got clobbered into the door, shaking the foundation. Despite feeling pain, that didn't shook me, but the fact that, with what I could feel, there was nothing beyond. "Impossible. Gah" I said but again I was interrupted after being slammed again into the sturdy room. No way would it keep ramming me into the door like that. "Fu. . " Before even being able to get out with my slur, another motion came by, smashing some of my teeth, close to it, despite seeing no blood or anything come out of my mouth. My endurance was given, enchanted but still, it wasn't going to. "Stop it. " From doing it again, this time having succeeded into making a crack in the door. It pulled me as a glimpse of light finally got freed from the prison that laid before us. "Do it then. " I said to it, knowing that, from the small area that was now lit around us from the upcoming light, from being so close now to its beating heart. As it backed away and got ready to smash me right through with no thought about my well-being, ready to finally put an end to my life. I wouldn't resist it anymore as it was a waste of time, my opening left me a long time ago, the moment I. Plugged the knot again.

"Gahhh" I yelled as the image of the wooden block appeared in front of me at a great speed. Yet, what it didn't realise that I had enough space, this time, to use my arms to protect my head and skull from the impact. Speechless, both of us now as I was smashed through the door, falling on my back along the remains of the door. Slowly, turned aside in the air, I looked at the back of the ship that was getting away from me. Just as it reached the side with its entire body, holding the kid in its hand, preventing its body from falling by the use of the legs left behind and trying its best to reach me with its slender hand despite being too far. Both shocked as I happened to be thrown out of the ship, away from its reach as it suddenly refused to give a chase to me and jump over. Free falling now among the debris, I could see the ship being swung from somewhere in the air as the pole that was driven into it came breaking, taller than the skies. The nimbus around me felt so amazing as I fell right through, losing the sight of it, finally at rest, as the image of my hunter soon to be forgotten. Slowly but once again, turned around, not by my own doing but still turned to see the distant land below me towards where I was flung against. Despite having to feel fear, I felt something else, confused about what I felt before, those steps, the sound and the sudden surge of light that came before I arrived there. "Where are you, mysterious host?" The first sentence that I could finally drive out of my mouth and not in pieces. Since my pace was going to end the moment I reached the ground, I wasn't going to let that be the last sentence that came out. Neither was I ashamed any longer about being wrong, about getting heard by anyone else, my thoughts, the words that didn't come out of my mouth. "You hear that? If anyone can, regardless of where you are, I'm not afraid any longer. "Despite having to see my end happen in front of both of my eyes, I didn't hold back. Seeing my own grave as I was being thrown against, exactly as I imagined it, at a wheat field, under a cloudy sky, having my mind travel towards someone I have deeply admired. It felt peaceful in a stronger sense after realising. That everything I saw in front of me constrained of lies that were so disturbingly thrown against me. A flash came, striking me a lot stronger than the lighting that temporarily stunned that fiend before. My legs were moving once again and I stopped falling, I didn't know if I landed here or was brought my force. No recoil and no damage that should've shattered my bones. "What could it be now that I was driven so far towards even facing my own grave?" I asked towards whoever was there and could hear me, after being thrown around in another room, with both a ceiling that wasn't supposed to be there in the case I came from the above and barred windows with bone like bars. The motion came from the sides of the compact room and the seats and tables from the room didn't seem too welcoming either. "Too wide for my senses. "And too empty too for me to feel secure and at ease. Some were lit and others were dark, the many spots infected the room except one that just arise. A candle was lit from, close to the back, someone was welcoming me to come into contact. "Who's there?" I asked, as I only saw a figure, nothing too dangerous, someone dressed peculiar but nothing to fear. Since no word was spoken yet, I chose to look around, since the last times I just rushed through, it ended with me. Getting to this spot, with one or more bone fragments crushed. The first impression it left on it was that, the bones and that something extra covering them looking as if it was another layer of protection. I was so set on it, wanting to analyse it as it remained the only peculiar object in the normal room we were on. As a passenger it was only fit that I followed the right of one, to try to take a piece for any further research just in case. The curtains were dirty too, probably from the contact with them. I approached it, and bent over the table, just enough to. "Ehm" Retracted but suspicious, I looked back at the figure and waited for it to finally introduce himself to me. "No touching. "I couldn't figure what kind of voice it was, again like a drone, something that I have to hear before and had to recognise with my specific indulgence into my craft and study. "So who are you?" Whilst questioning, I still planned on taking full advantage of his hospitality. The small chairs were accompanied by sopas at every turn, a high quality for such a place like this. "Why don't you take a seat?" He asked, disregarding my question, my appearance, despite looking as if I was summoned here by him. "Fine, I'll indulge in your little game. "And so did I, coming towards him, one thing popped out, another than the apparent ribs this convoy had, a carpet like the same one, most likely produced by the same person. Or brought from the same place, speaking of, so did some of the fancy chairs, looking the same as the. Ones in the mansion. "You've got some explaining to give, more than what you think. "Said the body in a suit, growling like a liberator, approaching me looking all mighty. "Sit down. "I said to me, just as he planted his fists firmly into the table, shaking both the lamp and the light that flew throughout the places. "You've got no idea what I've been through, the least I deserve are some explanations. "He was confused but not as enragés as I predicted. That was weird too, I was told to observe him but couldn't predict it so far. "If you may sit down, I'll tell you what's going to happen. And do not worry your bottled head, the worst is just about to come. "I didn't know if it would work but I grinned as it did. He didn't threaten me but I could see the suspicion on his face. Though, it made me wonder, did he see me the same way I saw him?" Ehm, as I was saying, pleased by your complying. ""I'm not doing it for you so please spare me the damn banter. Spit it out as fast as you can, I'm still not sure if. ""You're safe if that's your predicament. "And that could be one certainty that I could assure him, especially after what he's been through. But one thing I didn't know yet, who was the culprit, which one. "Were you hurt by someone, in particular, professor?" I asked nicely, his trust had to be gained by me so he wouldn't falter from his assignment. "Perhaps we can trade this information if you're so keen on bargaining with one another. ""Very well, tell me what you want to know, then after, I'll tell you what's what. And don't worry, we'll meet again on the next spot on the list. "Something that he noticed, I saw it beyond the gap and the motion inside, just as I murmured that word in the most melodic manner. "What list are you talking about?" And what he didn't realise despite being so fragile, misdirected, predictable and so manipulable, is how much he made my task easier by comparison. "Well, the list of the tasks you're supposed to take care. "Before finishing, he didn't wait for me and already asked why, all the way whilst slamming the table again, worse than before. Something did happen in the short time he was away, but what. "That's the question I will be asking now, since. "I stopped and move the curtain on my side just enough inches for me and me alone to see and no one else except myself. "There's still a long way to go. "Not clear enough and at the same time I couldn't rush it, that would clearly break the whole unspoken other agreement that occurred between us. And what he said next was simple and unconvincing, and I couldn't judge, especially since, from the place we were and the altitude, we didn't have it done forth. "I've been fancying myself a new ride. "With the most peculiar accent, along words that weren't his, to add insult to injury, I could see from the jerking of the soft edges of the hem that were now in his hands that he wasn't going give me the time of the day with a proper explanation. "Fine, state your next question then, but after that, I want a clear answer too, else we might not be pleased with one and the other's presence. "But, he changed it, and fast too, knowing, no, expecting me to do the same, most likely if he asked the same question as before. Instead, the professor asked. "Who gave you the list?" "It's more of a question of. What gave me the list? And go on, answer me the question if you dare. "Staring the scoundrel right between the eyes, I knew the answer and. So did he by the stop. He realised what I was talking about. "Then who's next to ask?" "I don't. I lost track, the last one was quite confusing. "At least for one of us, and not so much from the other. Then the bright idea came, right as we went into the turn. "I'm sorry for the turbulence you're encountering but it will soon pass. "This had to be resolved fast, I knew where every bump in the track was and especially how much each of the turmoil lasted. "I'm used to it as of now. ""Look, I can't wait for an entire silly game like one of this, so let's see. My name is Dimitris and you know that. ""Was my first question. "Quickly on the point, proving the attention he held against me. "Now, that's settled, what attempted to hurt you? I can see from the tip of the waist that it was bent. "And quite roughly took, something held and almost manage to crush his inside, something strong too since there's nothing that could crook such a reinforced layer. "Why do you want to know?" "You're breaking the rules. ""I don't care. ""Fine professor, answer me that question and I'll let you in on everything. "And after seeing that, despite being so close to death, he managed to, overall pull it quite good so far. "I don't know who. Well, what it was. ""Something about him, perhaps her. Both? A body or sides or any claws and strikes? Perhaps even wearing stripes or something. ""Nothing of that sort actually, well. Wait, did the whole compound just shook itself?" "Curses, I haven't anticipated we would reach it this far in such a short notice. Very well, we will continue this after. ""But what about filling me in, you promised!" He and neither did I could stay any longer, for none and no other. "Possible blackmail as you have nothing to offer and nothing to take from me now. As I said. "After raising one of my hands and pointing it towards the door, seeing how I was listened to and it opened. "The door is now open, don't worry now, you wouldn't want to miss the next embankment, would you? Isn't that so. Professor?" With a grin I said, welcoming and for leaving, something to remind him of me, despite us meeting again soon enough. "After what you'll do, you'll figure it out. ""I'm not leaving until I'll get my answers. "He said, despite having no choice. Knocked out and moved aside by the pores moving under him. "You are now. "I said after seeing him struggle, yet he stood too much and some of it rubbed off, enough to last him enough time to be escorted outside. "After this, you're on your own again. ""I won't forget this, you. Dimitris!" He shouted but it did no good to him, neither to his condition. Still leaving to his own discount. "You'll know what to do kiddo, I trust you well. "And hopefully he would find something to drink, even to me it appeared as if. His neck was dry, and at this point so was I. I waved him off and didn't taunt him back as he flipped me whilst being pulled away. Much was on his mind and I was running late too. The lamp got turned off and the moustached man faded away, on my way as I could feel my legs start pumping again and the membrane that kept me inside made an opening for me. No door, just the opened hole that threw me outside, towards a fall that I would've expected. Yet. "It's a palace!" I said as the lights coming off made it pop out in the middle of the gritty forest, beyond the metallic fence that guarded the place. The gate wasn't that far and I still had to know. "Damn" I missed my chance as I turned back to see, whoever came to bring me here disappeared with his ride. "Typical. Though he did state that we will meet again in the near future. "And as soon as I finished what had to be done here, the sooner I could find out how to escape. "Anyone there?" I asked the gate had a guard house that should've had someone in charge, but it was empty as if no one expected for anyone to come. To be safe and sure, at least, I took a look at the sky and try seeing, how far was I from the swinging ship. Perhaps we've gone too far, in the night with many stars, despite having a lot of them go off at a strange rate. I approached it and slightly pushed it, my waist was still hurt and couldn't rush it without getting my strength back. That, if only it decided to do so. I should've looked for another way in, as the first in many but, most likely now. I figured out that the kid wasn't alive anymore but it didn't come after me. And what Dimitris said, made me think about the possibility of being more like that fiend, to say the least as irritable and repugnant as it was in our last encounter.

There wasn't any other option, I still had to push in and tread carefully. "Gigles?" I said, and ducked down, they didn't notice but a bunch of youths were not far from where I stood, enjoying the night and what not. The fence was too high and sharply impactful at the end, there was no way for me to jump over without ending impaled onto it. "Hey you!" I yelled at them and made my presence clear. A bold choice but I had nothing to fear from them, at least not from what they looked like. With a hand on my chest and slightly tilted to look as if I came from shambles, I came closer towards the locked gate, ready to bargain my way in. Three of them, a girl and two boys, dressed too nice, fitting to be in the presence of such a palace. And quite fast they found themselves on the other side, ready to interact so pleasantly, quite casually with me. "Hello mister, what gives?" The boy with the black curls asked, the girl next to him, questioning my looks from the sides she took with her eyes. And a third one, introvert, standing behind both of them, and hiding from my gaze, the soon as I turned my eyes to face him, he back away. "Ehm. "I cleared my throat, hopefully not because I caught a cold from my previous informer. "I'm sorry to bother you at such an hour but I need some help. A lot of it actually. ""What happened to your belly? That's not supposed to be like that.

"The girl asked and stated her opinion, I couldn't see it from the shaded pair of glasses she put on as she looked further into it, what she could've possibly wanted from me. She was the closest to the gate, I even had to follow the example of her friend and back down a little as her intrusion through the bars startled me. "It's just a flesh wound. ""That doesn't look like a flesh wound, don't you think Cam?""Shut it up, I want to see. "She tried seeing, more than I could've cared about it, as the pain left a long time ago. "This is far worse than I thought. Come in. ""Wait. "The far one in the back stopped her, I remained silent at their predicament, as I decided. So soon to be distant towards those that might not be so lucky and make it after. "What is it? Can't you see that he's hurt? I mean I can understand Lucie there since he's normally a dap, but what's your excuse?" Both she and him were too far away for me to hear, except feeling something, despite not wanting to rely on it again. He had something behind his hands, a reason why he had his hands turned. "So. "Half of him was turned to face them, just enough to check if they were distracted. The old man standing on the other side didn't seem like much trouble. "So what's the deal with that? Are you like one of the guests or. Passing by?" His clothes were dirty, could he be a peasant then? Wouldn't surprise me if he came by here from a drunken stupper. "No, listen, I. ""Here it is. "She cut me off and him too, handing him. "Wait for Camy, where did you? Did you steal that roll of bandages? And what could he even do with those, especially since they're. ""Shut it, Lucie, there's no time for that, especially with a wounded man. Here, these should suffice, at least until we get the keys and let you in. "I tried knocking her on the shoulder, to stop the imprudence but it was too late as she handed them to him. "Thanks. "His thanks didn't warm me, especially with the cold air coming in, meaning that. "It's time to come back in before someone notices that we're missing. "At least Jard seemed eager to come back with me, couldn't say the same about Camy. I swear, sometimes she remained too innocent for her own. "Good, this should last you, but try not standing out, there's a group of some. Snobby fellas, I heard my father call them that, but they're most likely to cause trouble if they see you. So, umm, stay out of sight until we're coming back. "She warned him but he didn't seem to care much, still silent after, giving us no chance to politely decline to help him. Damn, I forgot it was too late for it. "We should go. I think, I can see them standing near the edge. "Jard spoke, so close to me that I could hear him even if I was deaf. "You heard him Camry, let's go. "She said something else to him, something that she didn't want us to hear. "Ehm. ""Really mature Lucy. Fine, let's go. We'll come back with the key, just don't wander too far off with a wound like the one you're covering, okay?""I won't. "He said before deciding to do wander, not so far. Aside, from the unwanted sights. "Can we go now. ""I've already said so. "She said, cutting my way again and getting Jard to take off with her. "Wait for me. "I said whilst trying to hide any blame she could throw. "You know I was just joking back there. It's a cold that was given to me, I swear it!"But they both brushed me off the moment I came near them. "Come on, stop slamming around, we need to act normal. ""I am acting normal, you're the one that should act normal. ""Good one Lucy. "I told her before to not call me that way, but she did that on purpose. I shook my head and ignored her but I was quickly reminded as we approached the stained door the reason we left in the first place. "Not him, please don't make me go back. "Jard finally decided to join me in the conversation, despite not being on my side of the story. "I kind of like him. ""The interpreter?""No, I was talking about that man. He seemed kind enough. ""Kfff"Despite both of them acting so nice, I suspected something was wrong about him, no peasant would come so far, dressed like that in a place like this. Either the air or his presence made me feel a tiny bit tipsy, could be just me. "So, aren't you going to open the door?"She asked with some expectations. "Don't you have servants for those kind of things?"The last time I checked, that's how it worked. Even with my friends not sharing my opinion, despite being right. "After you. "I opened, in case we'd get caught, since the blamed out would always be the first to come back. "To the scene of the misdeed. "He said and I followed. "To the scene of the misdeed. "In the jolliest manner. "Shh. "She said before entering. "Not so loud or we'll get caught. ""Caught doing what?"And Virgil appeared, as abrupt as he ever was, not giving a sight towards any other than her. "What do you want Virgil?"Camy initiated, with both of us standing barely at the tip of the door, our friend beyond. Everyone else was still distracted by the man and his bubbling machine, attention spanning towards him. "I noticed that you left. I mean, all of you. "He switched and looked at me after as if the plan of our sudden escape belonged to me not her. "I don't have to. ""I wasn't finished. "Stop from talking, what a goon and he only did it to prove something to her, I knew that for sure. "As I was saying before being rudely interrupted by your friend here. I noticed and started looking, though I'm glad that you didn't leave so unnoticeable without saying goodbye. ""Well, we had some trouble to take care. Right Lucy?Right, oh. "She gaffed and remembered, still on the other side, the door wasn't shunned, he waited for us to let him in, to signal it was safe. "Just let him in, before someone hears the ruckus, I want him to be present here too as I'll scorn each of you in part. "Lucy didn't seem to agree with him much, I could see it on his toady face, especially with the cold wind that came from the open door behind us. "You heard our captor, come in. "We had to make some side for him but he came too, joining the party that we not so long ago disappeared from. "Now, I'm really glad that our small party reunited once again. You can see the joy I'm expressing, the drink I'm holding in my hand and the three of you are not allowed to have it. "He took a sip taunting them, perhaps he had something for me but I couldn't be sure if he really cared. So hard to read, even harder to know, what was really his plane. "You can stop from rubbing the door their mate, no one heard nor seen it open, I mean, no one even notice you leave. Except the person standing in front of you. "It figured why though and so did his peculiar acting. "You're drunk Virgil. ""Oh, and wouldn't you be if you stood in here for so long rather than try escaping it?""Listen here Virgil, I'm really not into your advances. You can back me up at any time fellers. ""Oh sorry. "One of them did, the other as silent and impartial as ever. Every time. "Yeah sorry about that, I was just waiting for the right moment to come. That's all. ""I'm sure of it poor, getting all puggy over something like it. ""Virgil, just stop it, you're way too drunk to. "Before being able to stop him from further embarrass himself, the voice of the performer got louder, his small two chambers with funny faces got louder, showing the crowd his tricks as they laid in amazement. "Well, nothing new there. "Said Lucie with a not so amazed voice, couldn't blame him, though, we stood so much outside that we didn't get to see what the machine works, neither why it had a clock over it. "They're still preparing for it, he said he's waiting for some fumes or something but I'm still thinking he's just a bunch of bollocks. ""Whatever you say, Virgil. ""Don't give him something to work with, please. ""Yeah, listen to your sweetheart there. You wouldn't. Wait a minute, is that a bloody cloth in your hand?"I didn't realise I still had it in my hand from the trade-off we had over the fence. Darn thing could get me in a lot of trouble. "No, that's not blood, it's just a messy from getting outside. ""Oh right, keys. "He spoke too, another thing I didn't notice as he started to wander off from us, searching for me. "Wait for me. Stall for some time. "And Lucius went after them, accompanying in the search, leaving me alone with. No. "Well, that was quite rude, asking you to stall me whilst jabbing around. Were they drunk enough that they didn't see me or what?""No, it's not that. "Damn, out of sight, I couldn't see nor follow as I had to deal with Virgil first. Even worse, the crowd and some people noticed the ruckus we were sprouting. "Oh, let's join the crowd, shall we?Too busy or should I just go all tell your father what you've been doing?""No, don't!Virgil. Sure, I will follow you there. Just, don't tell my father about this, okay?""Can't make any promises, come on now, the show looks like it's about to start. "People were whispering and their lament could be heard even louder now as we had to go. Together, despite slightly pushing him away after trying to grab my hand. I had to keep it calm as he had something on me. "It's okay, that we can until after the show is done when another will begin. The chandelier's light ran brighter from above, almost blinding after trying to stare at it, the crowd also made it harder for me to focus on anything else after we joined them and got closer. Enough to see him present it, even more, my father with his black suit, bowtie, tickling his moustache near the well-endowed performer. My mother was nowhere to be seen, at least no in the crowd, and hopefully, dad wouldn't get to see us standing here in the foyer whilst being, clearly so carried away from the presence of such a performer. Couldn't have a straight beat near a drunk guy like him. "So, what do you think will happen next?"A womanly voice came, someone I didn't know, giving a living to the thought I also bore. "I don't know but you know what they say. "Another one spoke and then followed by so many. "What could it be?What's that? Who's he?Do you really think he's worth the praise?""Are you all right Cam?Is it because all the noise?"The clearest voice of them all, coming from someone intoxicated, the glass now empty and most likely seeking to drink some more. "I'm fine, no need to worry about me. Especially when there are more important things to talk about. "Rather than focusing on the damn noise going around, waiting for my so called friend to seek out the keys so I'd get another excuse to get out of the damned place. "Shh. It's about to start. "Someone silenced me, or dared so, though I couldn't see who it was, neither another one who stepped on my dress, getting it even dirtier. As if it weren't enough with the dirt that got in it whilst being outside from the rain and mud. "Careful now. "Virgil got pushed too and so was I by him as we almost dropped like domino pieces. And then the voice came, getting the rest of us rallied up, finally, everyone could get distracted enough for my friend to get the keys. "Shh. We'll talk after Cam. ""If I may receive your attention. "The man with his top hat, cane and cigar, allowed smoking inside despite already having his way in. "Now, If I may have some silence, not just for me but for the show. For this most crucial gentleman that has given the person, you're seeing now in front of you, a marvelous experience and possibility to express himself in front of others. "And quite the audience this night, all focused on me. Go on you sly old bastard, they're close to eating the ashes from your hand, after putting down my cigarette. "Again, don't think I'm going to pressure even more time into this as I know you've been waiting for the past half of clock here for anything to happen. But nothing could've been possible without the help of the generous donation and the courtesy of our host. Lord Rockbostor. The first. "That's it, act nice, succumb to my banter and ovation, soon I'd get to see who you really are. "Oh, please, don't. You'll make me blush, in front of so many gorgeous people that came from such distant places to my humble home. "Enough with that old man, let's do it already, the delay was long enough to make me even more anxious than your so esteem guests are. "Oh come on, why don't you come in for a test run?I think we can all understand, especially after waiting so much on it. ""But what's the hurry?I'm sure that, if they waited so long, then can still wait. "I got closer so they wouldn't hear me, I couldn't drag him inside since he was the suzerainty of the place, not to mention the complications oh having. My eye ventured there before and now it would seem that it receive a second chance. "Then what say you lord, would your so wilfully daughter then come inside?""What are you talking about?"I pointed and they moved from the spot, letting him see who was in here despite not having to be. A little eavesdropping from before never hurt anyone after all, except her. "Father, it's not what you think, I had to snick. ""How dare you come here after I forbid you to leave your room, not to mention putting one of your mother's dresses and acting like a guest?"And the embarrassment he was obviously showing, met by the anger in his face and body, fists clenched and moustache ruffled by the now watchful people that he called his guests. Judging and ready to berate him after the show was over. "Father, I. ""Wait a minute now, no need to take this out of proportions, we can settle this difference between the so-called distant aeon by a simple walk inside the machine I stood so much preparing. Come on, you can scorn your daughter after. ""But, it cannot wait and need to be taught a lesson. Just look at the impertinence on her, she wouldn't even lift her head up to face me. "Come on already, I have not enough patience to spare for your small issue. "You can tell her yourself, after you come back, on the other side. "I backed away from, in style, enough to leave some thought to be had by the audience and flipped the crow to open one of the hatched, some steam came out and it let a noise, someone from above us must've heard it. And in exchange, I heard someone there too. I said to myself. "That can wait, now, if you may, your esteem lordship. "And made some room for him to pass by me and enter the now open room, as it got fully opened and left out some of the hot air that was left inside from before. "Are you sure this is safe?I'll let you know that none of the people here nor the guards would like seeing their curator suffocate inside your cabin. "He came closer and whispered as well, making sure that none of them would or should notice so early sprouted cowardice. "It's fine, don't worry, you've got my word. "And passed a wink, both to him and the crowd, perhaps at someone in particular that was following both of our very moves constantly. "Fine, honorary guests. "And he decided to draw it even more than it should've been. "And my so hot headed daughter, it's time to see the esteemed machine we've heard about. With the bravest choice as a subject, me. "No doubt as it came to mind but they clapped nonetheless. "Come in, after you. "After softly pushing him inside. "For your sake, I hope this works. ""Don't worry, it will. Just buckle up with that leather belt, hold it tight and don't forget to hold the bars on your sides at all time. And try not breathing too much of the gas pumped in, it might be slightly toxic for your body. ""What did you say?"I flang the crow and closed the hatch, having his annoyance of a mouth finally shut. It shouldn't last long until both of the cabins were full, as I started, making the light come out from another, travelling through the pipes towards the other. The process shouldn't take long and the hatches should both open at once. And now for the audience before it came to an end. "Now, what you're about to witness may shock the weak of heart, especially those who just happen to be related to the person in deed. But bear with me as we're about to witness together, something quite peculiar, an experience that's indescribable. "They looked in such amazement despite not knowing, except her, looking in distrust as if my beauty of machine wanted to swallow her father whole. I approached the crowd, came closer to her and so drunkenly friend. "What's the matter, girl?Feeling sick?"Judging by the face and what she's been doing lately, wouldn't surprise me, to say the least. "What are you doing to my father?""Oh, nothing. You've got it all wrong. It's not what I'm doing to him, but what I'm doing to the one he's deeply knowing about. "And luckily for me and the unplanned delay, I managed to get the right settings for him in time. "And in time again, as you're prepared to witness. "I said whilst walking away from her towards the opening hatches. The remaining steam came out first, along with the lord, exhaling and dizzy. "Just a side effect, don't worry, you will be just fine. "I assured her, as she came to help her father stand. And I was quite sure of something, it wasn't the machine what slew his energy but the reaction he had. "As his one and only long deceased childhood friend came back from the other chance for a limited time. "I pointed at the clock that was at the top of his cabin, the point of interest of both the crowd, the lord and the kid. "Speechless to say the least. "And the reactions, both of the father and the daughter. One looking as if he saw a ghost of his offspring as confused as she could possibly be. Priceless, just this moment along would be enough. If not for our deeply troubled friend near me and from the exact reaction and no thought made known so far from the lord's side, it wouldn't surprise me if he got brought back with the exact pair of clothes he was wearing when he was sent inside the grave. Wearing all black, a small cloak and assortment of boots, wearing everything down his hair and up. "What did you say. "I got closer and slipped just by his side, turning him to face the crowd, overwhelmed, to say the least. "And he talks too. Don't forget, you've got not enough of the time displayed to get to know someone influential in the life of your illustriousness. "His lips were shaking, most likely a family trait, made you think, what could he be thinking about. After turning him again to face his friend, not even being sure they recognised each other. Yet he slightly went by too, away from me and still confused despite having explained everything to him. "Did you bring me here to die?"He asked, with a puppy face, ready to fall in tears, from the looks of it, he didn't have much to spear. "So it would seem like my reason is another. ""What's this madness, how. "He lifted himself with the help of his daughter, after suddenly lifting himself to take a deep breath as the young boy turned too, he continued. "How dare you do such a thing?To bring such a dreary memory of mine?"They look at each other after, the crowd's eyes split into two sides, one for him and the other on his limited lifespan. I could hear the chants in the back trying to figure out how much he had left, minutes to seconds, even less. And they couldn't say they weren't surprised either as none of them really knew what I could do, other than rumours. "Augustus, could it really be you? Were you really brought back?" He tried reaching with his hand but the kid was too confused to see anything other than the wrinkled hand pulling itself to him. "Calm down father, you might get a stroke. ""How could I, after seeing him. So many years passed. "Tears came by after finally up, getting closer to hug his old friend that still wasn't sure what to think of it. And enough was wasted. I came closer to ask him. "Despite having to intrude in this so emotional moment. "I pulled him over, as he was shaking, still too perplexed, seeing life after such a long time, but the question was simple. Yet before I could ask it, he turned around and asked again. "Am I going to die when that timer ends?" Am I?" Stop it already. Whatever you're trying to pull off, I want you out of my home and I want it now! ""Not yet, not until I hear until they all get to hear who killed this young man!" This man was insane. I pushed him away and took out my mantle to cover him. "Don't worry, I won't let you die. "I confronted him whilst getting him as farther away from the nose coming out of the crowd. "The show is over, scatter!" I said, making them spread, the knocked jaw I left him with should delay until I found a way to extended that clock. "Is it true what he said?" Came out as he backed away from me too, unable to recognise me from so many years. "Why won't anybody answer me?" "It's. Complicated but I know I can save you, I just need you to trust me. All right?" I showed him my hand and gave him the same smile I used to when we were both children. "Come on now, I'm sure there must be a way to stop yours. ""I. Trust you. "He said despite not recognising me. "You won't get away with it!" "Make one more step towards him and I'll crush you down where you stand!" The man had no scrutiny but it was his machine, I couldn't throw him out yet. "Guards, stop. How can we stop it? His time limit. "He had to have a heart, it was only a child we were talking about, a blameless one for that matter. "You can't do it, not at all. He's more than dead now, whenever you want it or not. ""You're lying, there must be a way, there's always a way. ""Don't I have something to say in the matter?" He asked, despite being in a situation that overwhelmed him, every one of us. "Father, is there anything I could do to help?" "I don't know, I'm afraid I'll be left helpless to watch my dear friend die again. "A few feet away from the old and the other circus dressed men. "I can't die. I refuse to do it. "I needed some time, and looking at the clock didn't leave much for me to know. "So afraid to die. Please, you're the one who brought me here, can't you fix me?" "I'm afraid I can't do that chap, I don't make the rules, the machine is. "He pointed with the crane and I saw again as the arrow went over however much I had left. "Still enough for me to try something. "I grabbed his cane out of his hand and tripped him over with it, his head made a small bounce as he hit the floor, knocking him out. "Are you all right?" Some people came by to help him out despite none of them offering to help me. Perhaps if I could knock out the clock next, perhaps that would stop it. "I can't reach. "I said, after my failed attempt. "Here, let me help you. "The girl that stood by the old man came to help, taking my cane and her attempt followed. "It's pointless. "I said, she jumped three times and couldn't reach since she was obviously the same size as I was. "Do you have any better idea then?" "Here, let me try. "He joined us despite never asking for any of his help, neither the cloak or anything else. "You don't have to do this, I. I can handle my own problem. ""Don't be stubborn, especially at a point like this one when your life depends on our help and ours alone. "A slam came through the machine made it shake soon after but the clock was still here. "Damn it, it's probably deeply connected to it. "A set of laughs came from behind, as the small new crowd backed away. "You're such a pair of fools, removing the clock won't save his life, it's just a counter until it runs out. ""Then tells us how to save him, again. I demand to save my friend from the death sentence you've placed upon, unwillingly I hope. Or else. ""Or else what?What will you? Have an attempt at my life?Perhaps you'll have your men have on me too. Listen here your majesty. Stop doing that, don't grind and mess with the machine, you little scoundrel. ""Don't touch the boy, I'm warning you. "He stopped me before I could do anything if this was the game he wanted. "Fine, have your feeble attempt but after it's done, me and my machine will be leaving this obnoxious place. But if you break it, you'll have a lot to pay more than you could even imagine. "As my dear father and so glorified entertainer bickered, the time was running fast. "Are you okay?"I asked, to be polite. "Well, I just found out that I'm going to die in a short notice. And right now, I don't know what to pull, what to turn to make it. Not kill me. "He went through and pulled some parts, pushed some buttons whilst I stayed there and watching the clock run wild. "What will you do if you can't stop it?"I asked but didn't get the answer I wanted immediately, as he took one of the links that connected both cabins and used him as a necklace. "I'll have enough time to think about that once I'm dead. Now, are you going to help me or not?"He had a charm, despite having an even paler complexion by the minute. "Deal. "We shook on it after a spit on each side, I turned around and asked him too. "Father, come on and help us, you can deal with that. That. That murderer later. ""Don't worry, he won't leave unpunished though I'm not sure we will be able to. ""No, don't talk like that, not yet, we're able to do it. We can. ""Shut up Camilla!"I shattered as he yelled, afraid at first though. With tears in his eyes. "Don't you think it's not hard for me to watch my friend die again in front of my eyes, his skin getting so white. Watching me through the eyes as a stranger. "He started exhaling a lot of air, turning into the gas, barely holding his composure, I could see by the way he was holding his chest that he was having heart problems. And at a bad time too, my friends came from upstairs, I signalled them to way , understand as they saw another young man that was hurt. "Are you feeling pain through your chest?Um, I don't know what to do, father, there must be something. Medicine, or anything. "The only cruel man entertained, in the crowd that looked in shock as a boy was brought to life and about to have his life stripped away once again, ironically remained the entertainer. "Right now, despite not having my question answered, which may be proven as a cover up by this not so guilt free majesty, I really enjoyed the play I've seen so far. But, right now, his heart's having a heart time pumping blood inside his body by itself. You can see that even the clock is regulating itself to cover the beats, jumping just as the blood keep pumping. "Exactly what I needed to know, perhaps this could work. My father was in shock with nothing to know or do. I came closer, taking his hand away, with one hand above the other and embracing my knuckle, I pushed him near the wall-like part of the machine and started manually pumping his chest. Right above us laid the clock and my indication, each pump adding more time to it. "Father, they're related, his life and the clock, more than a counter. "He looked in a wave, and the performer's disgust as I kept adding more to him. "My. How did. . ""Get some water or medicine father, you must have some. Father, stay with me. ""I'm sorry Camilla, immediately. "He couldn't believe nor did I but he got past the crowd and ordered them to do so. I kept doing this, I had to, despite risking to shatter some of his bones, his hands were holding me forearms, his eyes closed, I could see, clearly he was in a lot of pain. "Well well. "A clap came from behind, so audible that I could hear it from where I stood. "Don't disturb me now, I need to focus. Please. ""I'm sorry but. "His voice stopped and so did his hands. "Don't worry Cam. One more move and I'll smash the glass in his head. "My shining knight in a glass armour, not broken but standing unspoken for. "Thanks. "Come on now father, we're both depending on you and so are the arrows beating to the sides of the timer. "Cammy, can we help?""Just in time, but a small change of times. "They came from the side I reckon and the plan with the keys had to wait for now as we stood in front of a sadder one. "I don't know what to do, his life looks ready to leave his body, his heart might stop. ""Then we need help. "I wasn't sure what happened down here but I could see it on the boy's face, the unnatural paleness and drowsiness in his eyes. "Is there a doctor in here?We needed the help apparently but no one made any attempt to step in and offer it willingly. "Are you seriously just going to stand, all of you and watch a boy die like this?"They were far and close, the crowd just barked at each other, the sick guy smiled as she tried manually pumping his last attempt. "I can't keep doing this any longer. "And they switched places so someone could pump it at all time. She came and joined me in out attempt to subdue them for our help as they watched us instead clueless like sheep. "Come one already, we can't do it alone. ""Are you going to stand there and watch him die?Are you?"Look at him, he's just a human, like you and I and all of us. Don't let his life end, don't let him lose his only chance to experience life again. ""Looking down in shame won't help him live. "Despite that. Were they too afraid to try?Did something happen?Is he going to die?"My hands are getting tired. Already. "And another one of us came to pump it back. He came near me and joined, placing his timidity aside to cry for help. "Will you just stay there?Do something, you're not statues. None of you are. ""Please. "Even father came back, not saying a word, he shook his head as I asked him about the pills. I understood. He took Lucius's place and told us to focus on it instead, he could. No, he would handle on his own. The three of us, like a chorus, sang to them for help again as the impenetrable machine and its owner clapped and defined us below. "Please, help. "And the door opened, the wind got split in two by his entrance and so did the small group of people surrounding us. He didn't look anywhere, he didn't have to. I wanted to ask how he got in but there were more important. "Will. "But I wasn't able to finish my question as he answered me from the long distance from where he's spoken with me. It was almost as if the long path between us was silent, beyond everyone, we could hear and talk and no one could disturb us. "You can lay down now, I'll try saving him. "I could only nod my head despite being able to speak. "Let him pass. "My father said, making the entertainer and his smug set aside to leave him be. Somewhat different than before, the crowd changed from shocked and depressed into. It felt peaceful watching him come, despite being wet from the rain, dirty from the mud, the bandage used on him. He kept it. Just by he passed and didn't pay any attention to the main in the suit, by me he touched my shoulder and approached my father who kept pumping in. "Well, what happened?"He asked him and didn't need an answer after a look at the machine. The clock ready to stop, he turned, pulled and snatched some valves, replacing them with something he brought along. He saw something inside and covered his hand with a part of the bandages he saves. But what?What could it be inside the machine, that clearly was clogged. "Here, little bugger. "Up to his shoulder inside on one side whilst my father tried his best to keep his mate alive. Penelope, my mother came, appearing out of nowhere, assisting my father. "Come on already, you've heard them before. "As she spoke other finally decided and came to help him, bringing wet towels, giving him water to drink, making sure the life wouldn't go far off until he was done for. I got closer but not to him. "It's pointless, whoever you are, there's no way for you to be able to do so. To save him that is. ""Well, wait and see then. ""I shall. "That quick exchange didn't stop him, he started pulling out but it was stuck. "I need help"I heard him and got by his side, pulling along side of him, yet not enough as clearly, whatever he was pulling off. "It won't get out with only the two of us, come on already. "My mother nodded, and others joined him, pulling with us, hearing the sound that came out of the metal shaft he's taken out of the side that leads to one of the chambers. Clear sounds of something being rubbed against, his hand protected, whatever could it be?"There it's almost out, keep going. ""I can't stand here and watch you tear apart my machine. ""Don't move I said. I won't warn you again. "A quick distraction that was settled right away, he still didn't understand and neither did we. As. MY sudden pull ripped whatever part it was still stuck beyond, the last grip it had inside this dirty old machinery. I ripped it away and threw it on the side, scaring everyone away from the part and the parasite got splattered on the floor. "What. What is that?"They asked the first time they've seen it. And so have I, never even knowing how what to make out of the strange little being still moving on the floor. "Don't touch it. It will get stuck on you, mostly cold and tight places are its hunting ground, yet something it drains people out of their every liquid. ""Nonsense, this man is clearly a fraud, just look at him. He's most likely come to rip off all of us after breaking the machine. This whole thing was a setup if I stand to think about it. "The inside should've been cleaned, perhaps that's why I was sent here for, next to closing the gap back inside and setting as it should be. "Don't ignore me as I'm talking to you. "He had to be taught a lesson, I knew that the old man was busy as were my parents and the guards. "Then why don't you touch it and test it for yourself if you think it's a fraud?You said it yourself, that there's no way it could do that, ain't that right?""Don't tell him to do that girl, it's a human life you're talking about, whenever you're hating him or not. And so is the one of that child. Bring him in, I don't know how this machine works but I'll figure it out. "He stopped me from pointing at him and held me off, he got closer to doing it and smashed the small creature under his boot before the man even had his chance to try. "You. "He looked in fear now, after watching the seriousness of the old fella and how dangerous that small creature was. "You have to set the date on the panel then flip the crow before it could work. ""Thanks. "They brought him in but not after he helped us. "That's not how the machine works, it didn't work like that before. "Don't worry gal, I've made some minor adjustments whilst poking inside. If I played my cards right it should work. ""Please sir, I'll give you everything, just don't let my best friend die. Not. . ""I know, trust me, I know. "I comforted him on the shoulder and made his space lead the boy in. The panel wasn't complicated and I didn't have time for tests, especially with the grey hair and the falling nails he left behind before he was taken in. The man in the suit, the one that might've brought the machine. "Don't come. . ""Let him, he may know how to work this. It's all right. Show me how it works. "They let him pass to join me, we pressed the settings and he asked me. "Are you sure you want these settings to be made?I'm not sure this is how it works. ""Yes, I'm sure. "I stopped him from attempting to change him. "Fine, just flip the crow and it shall be done. "As that was done, everyone backed away as the excess amount of steam was enough to repel everyone from the area around us. "Will it work?"The kid had no idea, despite having her father and friend at her side, looking at me with the same worrying look. So violent that I strayed away from it too as flames seemed to be pumped out, a rod of metal got thrown and manage to almost came close to breaking the chandelier but ended up inside the ceiling. "Watch your step. "I told them as the more solid moustached guy got closer to stepping into the remains of the parasite. The remains of metal that jumped around consolidated what I've told him as he stepped just right. Deeply rooted inside the floor, I had no worry about it breaking apart, other than it being blown away from its position. "Come on, just work already. "Chaos erupted as everyone got into the panic, walking away and trying their best to dodge the remains of the device. "Watch out. "I jumped and threw the circus man on the ground, saving him from being impaled by his own doing. "Just keep getting away from it, I think it's almost over. "The panel was destroyed now, something went wrong, supposedly as it wasn't properly going. And then a glamour of silence and we were left with the room partially in a mist made out of dust after the steam made its way out of the open cathedral-like windows. The dust must've come through the small opening it was suddenly made as the hatch opened, most likely for the last time "Is he?" A voice came, asking for his friend. We were left there waiting for him to make a move, everyone expecting for him to be saved by the mysterious man, that came out of nowhere, dressing like a commoner, even acting like one too. He wasn't going to wait for the celebration that was certainly needed after what was done after and what came out of the now, not so functional machine. A burst of joy filled my father's face after seeing the life lit face of his friend, blooming in front of his very eyes. "Nathaniel, is that you?" He spoke with his soft voice, remembering my name, I came there, through the waves of dust and gloom that was left into the last breath the machine spilt. I hugged him again, and he did the same back to me, after so much time being reunited. "Leaving? Already?" The man was ready to go, after barely coming and being in everyone's attention. The small child suddenly and not for long got away from the lord and looked in our directions. "You're not staying?" He asked. So sudden and such an effect for such a shortcoming. "No, I was sent here to do something and. I guess, it's apparently over before it even began. "And he wasn't joking when he said we'd get to meet again on a short notice. "Well, it was nice to have you, sir. Wait, perhaps you could stay at least a bit more, we have to. We must repay you actually for the help you've to give. The hope you've given to us all. ""I don't need such a thing, prolonging my stay would most likely. Bring more pain that release from you. "The young man from before came closer, out of nowhere seemingly despite noticing him early on the side. "Here. "He gave me a key, rotten but still working, a nice crested owl on it with sprouting antlers, old for its kind. "We were supposed to bring this to you so you'd have a way to come in, but. We'll you've handled that pretty well, the trespassing. I mean, it's not trespassing, you were just trying to. "Something felt off as some distant vibes were sent around. I shouldn't worry them now, I'd rather act normal as before. "I understood, thanks. "In the mist of all of it, I almost forgot the problem I had with the lord and why. "I shouldn't have tried blackmailing you for that. It was wrong for me to do such a thing to your lordship. I. "He looked at his friend, at me, at his daughter and everyone around him, differently, of course, judging the actions and what has happened. "No, you don't have to excuse yourself. Despite not having the best of intentions. "He stood taller than before, a full man of himself again. "You've brought us all together and I don't think you'll eve be able to use the machine to ever harm anyone. Not in this state, neither if you wanted or not to do so. ""Wait, does that mean I get to live?" He asked the only one that hasn't had his chance to talk despite everything turning around him. "Yes, you do. "He thanked me even if I haven't played a big role in it, not here and not now. "I really have to leave. Apparently I've got something other. ""Wait, there must be something. Some way for us to convince you to stay with us. Your wounds. "She saw that again, reminded of the reason she decided to help me in the first place. "You could at least stay some more, we all want you here. "Everyone in the crowd looked at me in awe again with their glassy eyes and fabricated smiles. I knew better than to meddle. "Wait, what was that?" I felt it coming from somewhere, another one of the points I couldn't pinpoint at first, not so long ago it happened inside that room. "I didn't hear anything. "The woman standing near the moustache and the child said though she could feel too that something was wrong. Other than the mess made by the controlled destruction behind her. It was sudden and there was no way I could foresee it. A sudden wave of them came to warn them bu this time I was too slow, unable to turn around nor to alert them.

Midway stopped to see, I didn't listen to what they've said, it was harder to hear the sound of structural damage, the chandelier being broken. I ducked my way and something from above came. "Take cover." A yell came as it was already plunged inside, throwing the rest of the glass and falling debris onto all of us. The long pair of stairs and the rest of the grand palace got destroyed from our viewpoint below. The sound it left was deafening, I covered my ears, my eyes after as the air got muddy. Glory short lived as everyone was in a dire condition, standing at the edge of a broken home, nowhere to see as a pillar fell right in front of me, blocking a part of what I tried seeing after opening my eyes. My head burnt as a flash of light came, the metallic parts that lead the pillar were actually rusted, the whole palace shattered and above us, plunged right through. "No. No, no. No. No!" A sudden formation of words that became a cry then shouts of anger. A broken bar of metal from its top side, the attachment shouldn't have been possible, yet it was rotten and chopped right off. The wood was sturdy and strong enough to resist as the entire ship was rammed into the palace. I couldn't lift myself up nor speak yet. I had to warn them as we were all in imminent danger. Turn left, I said to myself but my head was stuck in an immovable pose. Rolling over to see, people were laying on the floor, some weren't lucky enough as part of the ceiling got crushed. "Gah." My first word came, I saw after rolling that one of the shards found its way inside the bandaged part of my body. I almost chuckled after pulling it out, the layer that laid around my stomach was too thick, it didn't get to pierce me, other than a small bruise. Supported on the fallen pillar, my back was slightly hurt, the place was running in flames and I didn't know what was going on. People were trying to pull themselves up and I still felt nothing yet, my senses being dulled by the tragedy so sudden occurring, still happening in front of my very eyes. The huge hole above all of us, still so dark outside, the stars have fallen victim to the crashing ship too, as none of them were around anymore. Hiding probably, what I should take the advice and do the same as they did. The power in my legs was still yielding. The door was open, just feet away from where I was. "Should I abandon them?" I asked out loud but no one heard me, from the sound of the crashing ship. I felt it as it was going to backpaddle to us and crush the gap between our points. But even worse was coming, I knew that somewhere inside, wanting to come out of it. Plotting and still not dead, despite having so many close calls, to both of us's demises. "Would you know it?" I laid another question at them disposal, hoping to find out, to know, if they'd hate or react at all. To my advantage, to my desire to escape, would they call it selfish or would I first? My feet were still shaking but I could stand just fine, the hit hasn't taken its full pledged toll on me, at least not as it did onto them. "I really thought. I changed." Using one of the rotten and broken part that came flying out of the chairs that laid onto the luscious and once plentiful table as a cane to walk, I kept going without looking back. Everything already came to me despite not asking for it. Their late squirms and attempt to rise, all too familiar as the famine was brought back with the fall. The machine broken and along with it the kid got covered by his old friend. I tried looking back, even if my vision was covered by the giant block of stone, the back side of the ship moving on its own and there was nothing to stop me from leaving. No way for me to stay longer and witness what it was going to do, the reason I got here was fulfilled and ruined at the same time. But out of the pile, near the pillar, the girl came bearing on her shoulder her partner. She anchored me to the point, again, the second time a child did this to me, made me care despite doing my best to keep my distance away from it. Everyone was too far and buried in the rubble, I felt people who made it outside but passed out, yet she still didn't know the fate of her father and him. "Come on, hurry up, it's going to fall back." I said and didn't announce her of any other, her chance was coming up and I wasn't going to ruin it anymore. Was it guilt that held me back, to wait for them, for my past failure? From where I stood, they resembled so much that I wasn't able to help it but walk towards and grab her friend by her side. Despite having my crane holding me back. "Come on now, faster. ""But what about my father, where is he?" "He must've made it outside, I'm sure of it. "Almost a broken neck, I felt something too, struck inside but she didn't notice, too blinded by the future grief she was going to feel. In a way that she didn't even notice or want to acknowledge the people who fell at the mercy of the battleship. For a moment, I was forced to look back and be scared, I felt a beating heart but it was only her father, not it. They ticked me off its tracks as I wasn't sure anymore, hearing more and more beating hearts from all directions, with no way of knowing who belong to whom. So many of them were still unharmed and well, despite the others having been sacrificed for their companions' safeties. "Move, faster. "After all this time, would I finally get to be granted redemption from my act so lungful committed, the same action? The same. "The same thing that brought me here. "Lead astray. "How could I forget how it works and where I am. What happens and how it acts. "I understood how much of a fool I was despite being so deeply informed about them and their actions, how they controlled their hosts and. "I don't understand but. ""Come on girl, I'll help you out then leave, a score needs to be settled. "After this act, it won't change anything, neither did his saving nor hers. How I of all could've been so blind towards the manipulation that was thrown against me?" "How was I such a fool?" "A tool to clean up the parasites that crawled their ways in its intestines. "You're starting to scare me, sir. ""Don't call me that girl. Actually don't try befriending me, you don't know the reason for which I'm being so hateful against so don't talk back to me. "She looked away, scared by my outburst. By now, I should've known better than to care or give them any interaction. Failing to follow my own advice, the door was close, the ashes flying through the gas air, I heard it and figured, even without. As all the hearts inside the halls got silenced behind us after something big jumped off the ship with no fear of it falling and crushing. "Go, now. After you're out don't stop and go sideways, never in front and the ship will go into a straight path. ""Wait, what? You can't leave us, especially now, what about my father too? I can't carry. ""Your father is dead girl, now go before you'll join him. "The blank expression as I told her as her heart got silenced too, shattering most likely and ready to fall into sorrow like no other would. "Don't you dare stop. "I pushed her along her friend and stood along as the atrocious sounds of the wood being rubbed against stone echoed inside the hall. "What are you planning to do now?" "I yelled and heard nothing in return, other than the beats getting slower and faster at time unknown. I yelled again soon after, this was bound to be our last confrontation if I was fair enough. "You know how our every encounter ended. Still, you decided to bring it here, again. Why won't you just fall down and never return?" "It jumped above the pillar showing me. I finally got to it as it carried the body of the boy in its arms, wrapped like a child. The pointed fingers were no longer, it was already done. Somewhere in the air, something must've happened, perhaps down here. The ship still slipping away from its place, ready to plunge itself. It showed me why its heart went slower then faster at moments and a metal rod found its way inside to get plunged into its heart. Having barely enough strength bleeding at last. "I know. You didn't end the life of that child. "Perhaps it didn't end the one of the latter as the ship couldn't be broken by its strength alone. "You're done for, either way, there's no turning back now. Not for you, neither for him. "It fell on its knees, shattering the parts, breaking in half, even the charred behind drew its last breath some time ago. "Are not you even going to try now?" "The whole place would certainly need a new decoration after the ship made its way outside but it wouldn't certainly be entirely broken, just plunged upon. I turned away and decided now. "I'm going to walk in peace now. Though, I do hope. "I turned back, still having enough to get out of its way. "I do hope we'll get to meet again. "The last bandage I thought about saving, I threw it away, close to its side. "I really do hope so. "A sprint, I burst out of the door, people took cover under trees, other in parts beyond the gates. I ran ahead, knowing that I couldn't get past the gate, taking my chances on the sides. Keeping it that way a jump was in order as the ship had sailed, cutting the land in half, leaving its mark and marching through the metal gates. The sounds it left as the broken winds and the cries of the people looking behind as their once loved ones have succumbed to pain and loss of their lives. "Where's my father?"I hear her keep asking, her friend supported at the trunk of a tree, the ship hasn't stopped yet, from the distance I saw it too well. The rest of the sides fell and half of the grand palace laid in ruin. We stared at each other, my side being one shattered and hers filled with pain. There were no words that had to be spoken, I saw the tears running out of her eyes. "Your father. "She nodded her head then told me. "No. "Her neck nor parched, leaving dire sounds of what occurred as I wasn't there, my poorly thought decision. This entire trip was a failure, my own failure. Though I would get to take my leave without having to face any of the consequences that could be held against me. She still decided to come and gave me her final speech before our ways got departed, I still had to go through and find out through the destroyed place if anything or anyone still remained unfinished. Alone as every other were either too hurt or too scared to come and ask me. Scorn by a woman and now by a girl?I would face no such thing, the first lip I heard from her, the second I'd leave her laying with her remaining friend and family. "What do you want girl?"Her hair was slightly burnt, not having the same shade as before, perhaps the moonlight lit it up from the angle I stood. That, if this place even had a moon to do such. She didn't take any closer to me, standing and mostly waiting for me to say a thing. "I'm leaving Gene. I'm leaving the girl and there's nothing more to say between us. "An escapee from my mind, which made me wonder, whatever happened to her after we parted ways. Probably the same thing that happened and will happen to the girl. "So you've come in front of me to say nothing?Well, I'll leave then. "As I turned my back to her, both, I heard her talk. "I wish you haven't come here in the first place!"She almost yelled but since her neck was so dry, it sounded more like a screech, even with that, I understood the idea and. "What did you say, girl?"I could see that she was intimidated, so much more different than what she looked like the first time we met in the station. No, behind the bars. "God damn it, it's all your damn fault it happened. If it weren't for your damn parade and walking through. "I looked the other way, knowing I was projecting, all because of this damn thing I must've been set on if it even worked the same way mine did. "It wasn't her fault, how dare you accuse her of that?She's was the only one who cared enough to bring you help and even risk making her father mad by bringing some strange inside. "The limped friend came too, crawling from the frays. "Is your other friend coming too I presume?" "Don't pick on him, he's done nothing to you, and as a matter of fact, neither of us did. Yet you're treating me, us all so poorly, why is that?"I should've known that the group would be reunited after hearing her speak, guiding her third friend back into the light among us. "I can defend myself Camy, you needn't worry about me""No explanation is needed, what's done is done and I had nothing to do with it. "But somehow I had to stand at the mouth of a damn jury made of children, to be trialled as if they were in some way worthy enough to judge me. Their breaths were cold, I was standing too close, an affront to my own comfort no less. "So, if you've got something to tell me, now, the last pair of phrases that will leave your mouths. Say it or shut your traps, I've got plenty of work to do until I'll find what's I'm looking for. Too many distractions, like this one, removed it from here. "I pointed at my own hand, I was slightly bleeding, a concussion is what I thought experts called it, but it was clear to me. "Do you say that often?"The silent once decided to start some banter, I realised as it came out of his mouth that I was expecting too much from them. So I turned around as the other two started speaking and decided to follow the trail, having something unexpected or, not so much happen to me. "You don't have to follow me, it may be dangerous. "She and the ones with a nicer suit got on both of my sides, followed by the other switching sides and being out of place. The place really got ruined, what used to be a forest got screwed to pieces. The metal pointy parts of the gates got thrown away too, being barely closed inside the earth. "So, where are we going?And who are you as a matter of fact. ""Why are you acting so friendly after what I've said, why are you even following me?You should be hating me, or at least try helping those laying on the ground. ""They're safe.

"Saying it as if she could've known each and everyone's condition. "You didn't mean it by the way, did you?""What?"I asked her back, despite being the only meaningful thing I've said to her. "That my father. He escaped, right?I mean, he was closer than me towards the exit and all other, that means you lied right?""If you already know the answer, why are you asking girl?And the two of you, why are you still trying to tail me, most people who do that either fall to the ground or end up missing. "They skulked, and misheard what I said, being here only as a backup for her. "I don't and, that's. ""Wait, there. "I noticed, the ship was long gone but how far?The trails should've lead here and the ship couldn't have set sail by itself on plain land. "So what are we trying to see?"One of the boys asked it was hard for me to hear them, being the farthest away from me now, both of them had dull looks on their faces. "Well, what do you see in front of you?""A trail made. "The silent one stopped being so silent, after getting tired of doing so for so long, getting tired of being ignored. Yet I had to do it for every obvious thing that would be said, by anyone of them. "Yes, obviously, but what else?""Oh, I know. "Said his companion with his raspy voice, looking up front, ready to say something useless nonetheless. "I can't see the ship. ""Yes, again thank you for being the second one pointing out the obvious. What about you dich?Find anything else obvious too?"I saw her lips biting themselves and I knew that something disgusting was going to come out, I wasted nothing after. "No one and none of the remains of the ship got left behind, just look, trees, the farthest reaching parts of the metal fence and nothing that belong to the ship. ""So, I don't understand. "Though I was going to explain it to her and them as it was easy to know. "I saw the ship being broken on its way down, there should've been parts of it laying on the ground. ""Ok, but what does that mean?""It means that you're all driving me insane. Go back already, we're still not far enough from them that you could just go back there and none would've felt your absence. ""You know I can't go back until you admit to me that my father is all right and nothing happened to him. ""You're in denial, I'm leaving. "They followed me after that too, determined despite how much I tried driving them away, despite having their persistence stab my senses and patience. The trees looked real enough, even as I took some of the rubble, it retained the texture one would have. There's no way it could replicate foliage at a state like that one, they must've been planned, either that or my senses dulled to the point of me not being able to tell otherwise. "Are we really going to follow it through such distance?I've never really gone outside my house. Quite strange now that I think about it. ""Yeah Camy, now that you mention it, we're. On the same boat there. ""I hate both of you. "I told them as there was no time for jokes, the ride that brought me here had to be found and taken care of. "Cheer up, it could be worse.

A lot worse as a matter of fact. ""How could it be worse, though? Her father's missing, my suit got ruined and we're following the trail of a missing ship. ""Calm down, I'm sure that he can take care of us, perhaps even give us a ride back home after he finishes whatever he has to do. "I couldn't care less of what she or any of them were thinking, something was lurking through the surroundings, something worse and faster, enough to leave pulses on the spots from which it already gone from. "Be as delusional as you may, though I hope it won't jump up to me after it's done with the three of you. "Taken as a laugh or not, he changed behaviour after she did, as now the only direction that came into her eyes was down. Could be jumping or not, I had to care, keeping a considerable direction from them despite none of them noticing it. And atop of that, I had to keep it unknown to them as baiting them to come close and give me another worry wouldn't be advisable. "Again, something moved. Keep calm and walk in straight lines, adjacent from one another. Act normal too, though I doubt it'd understand what we're saying. ""There, I saw it too. "At least I wasn't delusional too, though him being the one who called it out didn't really confirm nor deny any of it. Unyielding troublesome foes were sent but towards what point, and so were the companions. "How far are we going to go now? You said it yourself, we're in danger, perhaps we may never even get to walk out of this alive. That, if we stand a chance to even go back. "Her angst reflected through the muddy water we stepped in, making ripples bouncing from me and her. The tone, how she only refrained from looking any other way, to self-pity herself, came to her silent friend too. "I don't know why I'm even endorsing your behaviours, I should let you here in the middle of nowhere, waiting. "Is that a lantern strapped to a pole?" Am I seeing that right?" The light was blooming, making circles around, in the middle of the road it stood to unturn nor shattered. "Yeah, so?" My now cheerful pest asked, not being the most patient, nor fastest young man I've had the pleasure of encountering in my journey. "Well, since we're in a session, again. "And this could perhaps distract them from the everlasting presence of whoever dwelled into the floating piles of smoke around us. "Tell me, class, what did you notice from that lantern over there. ""Just tell us already, we know you're going to tell us anyway. I'm not in the mood anymore and. ""Listen, girl, I'm not in the mood of having to carry a bunch of war waging young people, again, that I may or may not have to care about later since they will most likely be dead. That has happened way too many times for me to count out or in. ""Then, why are you even doing this? If you're causing so much pain to others why are you still going on?" He flailed as a must and spoke from behind, unable to keep himself hidden anymore after deciding to confront me directly, in the middle of a road that might be dangerous to loom inside of. "Because I've got a duty to serve, something greater, and as I am unable to continue doing so. Well, just like my predecessor took care, my successor should've done so. Though he went missing, which bring me to why I have decided to come here in the first place. ""You do seem to have come from far away. "Just as the cheerful said, the presence that loomed around decided to make its whereabouts known once more, a long tail could be seen sprouting from far but it didn't matter. Long and squirmy, hidden in the smoke, pulling itself by another. "Two of them. ""What was that. "They both heard my whisper and I muttered to continue, slowly and I had a bad feeling that something was keeping a dire eye onto us, perhaps more. "Let's go, into the light. ""Wait a minute, slow down. "He didn't reach my arm, I pulled myself away. Walking faster but not running, I wouldn't disturb it from its constant creepy with my steps being on the tip of its disturbing attention. "Don't inhale and don't get close to anything. I think I may be able to understand what this smoke is. "And perhaps the ship wasn't just going by itself, the possibility of it being dragged away was viable too. "Ok, I think we could've figured that too on our own, don't breath in the smoke and don't. ""Don't get far away from me boy. That goes the same for you two too. Form a single line and follow it, don't look back now. ""Wait sir. "The boy asked from the back, showing some sort of respect despite not demanding it. The trip must've made him very talkative, or perhaps that's how he acted personally. "What about the people who were left behind?""Yeah, he's right, and my father too, he must've been with them, in the small encampment there. "I grabbed by her forearm without letting go, I've seen and heard enough to ignore the struggle, knowing that she wouldn't take the news too well. One way or the other, she had to know. "Wait, not so tight around my arm. ""Both of you, make sure she doesn't stop or try getting away. ""Wait, what's this all about?She just asked a question. ""I know and that's the point, the answer was already given before, despite her not choosing to believe it. But feel the wind for yourself. "We took a break as we couldn't walk anymore, under the lantern. "Damn insects inside the lamp. That sticky substance too. "Something was dripping from it so I moved away a few steps, still holding her from running. "You can release my hand now, I'm fine. ""You're not girl, answer me now, though, can you feel the wind and in which direction it's beating?""The encampment. "Her cheerful friend ruined the surprise, but more important the chance for her to figure it out on her own. "And the smoke got blow there too, where my father is. Let me go immediately. "She struggled to get out of my grip and do a rash thing. I was being taunted by the presence again, both of them, from side to side and their long tails got out, enough to throw some dirt around before getting back inside to begin again. They couldn't see it happen in I didn't want to alarm them yet, I could see it from their faces, both worried about this and that, of what was about to happen. Whatever was drooling inside them finally got away, leaving them clear headed for now. "Girl, I've said it again and I'm saying it now. "She hit me, flailing one arm and trying to do the same with the one I had in my possession. "You're lying, let me go now. You scum. You scum!Don't talk like that about my father or anyone else. ""Girl, look at me. Look at me!"I must've snapped out because I managed to silence both of them in a feat of common rage. The veins on my neck and hands could be visible seen even by me. "You can't go back to them unless you want to die. It's too late for your mother, for your father and everyone else that was in that mansion. It's your choice if you want to continue living and risk your life even more by following me, but I won't take care of another worry again, especially with. "I had to stop, everyone being too petrified to continue. My arm released hers as she began sobbing, I knew it well, they didn't have to point it out, I was harsh. They way that we were on, between the gaping walls of smokes lead to. "That damn ingrate. "I recognised the end of it, blowing the smokes from the sides, the ride that brought me here came back. And I could see that my hand would be forced by the enforcers it sent to bring me to it, no less. "Third, no fourth tail. "The whole block of smoke was most likely squirming with them, that if it wasn't just one with an enormity of gaping tails if they were tails to begin with. "I'm leaving, stay or come. I don't care. "No more pulses, perhaps I learned a tiny bit about being able to control them, even closer to the point of getting rid of the annoying ability at all. "Wait, I'm coming. "Her neck must've cleared up from being so dry, those tears must've rehydrated it after so much time. "We're coming too. It's getting quite dangerous here. ""Wait a second, just let me. "He took a phial that he carried with, despite being so silent, it turned out to be the most useful of them all. A bit of the liquid came into the bottle, followed by those insects. "Nice thinking"As we ran. "Don't look back, I'll do that for you even if it doesn't seem like I'm doing it. And stop flailing that phial boy, you're driving me. Bah"The distance between us and that was shorter and luckily for me, they followed, all of them. The door opened, waiting for me, I couldn't see it well but I thought it was a transporting machine despite those suckers that pulled me out. I could see it just barely being lit as I came for it, revealing the sides, the moving chairs that came from one compartment to another, shifting and going around. "What's that?" "There's no time to question it, girl, there's enough for that after we're in it. "The smokes now being thrown despite that not being plausible, their tails took small ounces of smoke clouds and threw them further away to reach us. "Don't breath it at all costs. "The more we approached it, the darker, purple the ground and the mud became of the sides, whatever was in the composition from which the gas was made, the chemical reaction affected the ground itself, killing the foliage around it. Sprouting vents out of the ground from the mud pumped even more of it, approaching us even more. The gaping gate was getting thinner then bigger, almost like a blow like motion to keep the gas away. "There, come in. "I stood on the side and pushed them in, side by side, ignoring the disgust they felt towards it, one of them just. "Gah, it touched me. ""It doesn't matter, just go. "I said to him after I pushed him, looking back, ready to push the next batch, seeing how the tails, rigged with gas, having vents of their own that they used to pucker and throw the gas away. "Hold your breath now. "I said before taking a deep breath of my own to keep it in, unfiltered air, the only clean one I would get as a dark cloud approached us. The next one pushed, her sides were filled with the clean version, I made sure there was no dim or eruption on her skin that would get to be infected, then proceeded into pushing her inside. The last one and the only time it would be appropriate for him to be silent, I checked his sides, his every single one. Not behind his ears, or near his wrists, not over his boots as nothing popped out of his skin. Before going in, ready to close it, I checked my sides too, afraid that I would be the unlucky one to get infected. "Gah" I released as no longer could I hold the air inside and jumped in, closing the gate and sealing inside, visibly in away as the dark cloud was ready to come inside and stricken me of all the clean skin I had. The small puff of smoke that managed to come in was annihilated in front of my eyes by another cloud that came out from the holes in the ceiling. It managed to almost catch on to us but I could feel it now, we were moving again. On my left, I saw their hands come and help me get back up. "Are you all right mister?" "My name is Phaer. "I didn't believe in superstition and certainly that it wouldn't end up the same with them too just because I lied about my name and listened to their feeble presentation either. Someone was still listening and his name I have forgotten, I passed the three of them and started walking towards the lit lamp, the same presentation from him, just as before but not at all. "I see that you're done, for now at least""Not because of your help anyway, you could've come sooner. I mean, well, at least closer. "He still kept his smirk, which annoyed me, too many arrogant people so far, but he was worse since there was nothing of great importance he was doing. "And I see that you've come with a pair of children too. And from the looks on their faces, it must've been a long trip to be had for them, and you of course. ""I wasn't planning on that but. You're kind of right about it, long trip indeed and something happened before I managed to come here. "He scratched his chin, the beard under it was thick and nasty from all the cigaret mutts he was chocking on before I came here to interrupt him. "I know. You weren't the only one who's seen the smoke risen from below. ""What is that?" I asked whilst still inside the transporter, unharmed, unexpectedly with the pair of children that I never asked for. Despite that, something inside my head told me to get out, abandon them and fill my lungs with the smoke at my peril. "Please try focusing, we don't have much to our last location. Now, care to play the game again, or perhaps the children might? ""Oh I like games, I'm really good at some. "The chubby child seemed to be interested and that could prove more useful that the stubborn man that laid in front of me. But all of the sudden his hand slammed on the table and he said.

"Listen, there's something important and these flashes are really getting to me. The ship, I saw it again, it got plunged into the palace you left me at and it destroyed it, almost completely after repairing the machine you sent me towards. "The look on his face was bizarre, he silenced the children despite the fact that they would've been silent anyways. On that note I was irresponsible sent on, I didn't notice. "Wait, what palace and what machine? That's not where I sent you towards!" He was getting serious, finally too. "Then, where did you send me?" I asked him in all seriousness, though I could see it on his face, the lamp flickering, he wasn't expecting that either. And understand too he did as he wasn't expecting me to lie at all, with no reason to be had by me or them as they confirmed, all three of them of what has happened after I was gone. He took the curtain off again and looked over, but when I tried, of the four of us standing at an equal distance. "Don't do that, you're not supposed to. "And I wasn't going to just go ahead and anger the man that had the ability to kick all of us out by sliding us with the floor itself as our companion.

"Damn, I should've known better. I even started saying that disgusting thing myself. Not going to lower myself to lying, but it's troublesome what you've said to me. ""Then, where. . ""Excuse me, but what are you going to do with us? Where exactly are we going?" "We? We're not going anywhere together, you're going to stay with him for now?" I told the toad face exactly where and what he should be doing, there was no place for kids in a place like this.

"You're not intending to leave them here with me, are you? That wasn't the deal, as a matter of fact, we have no deal that involves me having to give free rides to any passing comers you bring here with you. ""This doesn't involve you, though you're right. There's no deal that involves me having to take care of your damn problem and take your damn ride, especially since I. Since I almost forgot that I came here to get someone. "The girl decided to step in after hearing me say so. "Well, we're kind of involved in a way since my father's palace and his like was taken by a god damn giant boat being thrown at us. So, sorry If we're forced to take in your damn ride for once despite not asking for it, but you're not the only one here having to suffer the consequences. "I couldn't take any more people snapping around, especially since it only encouraged me to do so too. "Can we all just calm down? Well, we could take from his example, the quietest of us all, still. "The ride was stopped, abruptly and we almost got thrown on the floor, they grabbed and held the chairs or parts of the tables that were set so they wouldn't fall over. I grabbed the lamp that was thankfully plastered on the table and questioned why. "Did we stop like that, what's happening. "Though he didn't know what to say and after taking a look outside he said. "Oh no. ""Oh no what? What is the reason for us stopping so?" "There's something chewing on the tracks we're on, this isn't good. "I took a look outside too as he couldn't stop me, taking the curtain away to reveal the track. Overwhelmed for a second there as the first thing I looked below to see. "It's a huge way down there. "And the scenery, I could see the whole place, making me dazed. The smoke from the place we've been, the mansion I thought I saw from far away, at least one of many, if it even was the one from which I came from. And another place I thought I was before, in my childhood at least, a place of tales, someone was in there making a ruckus. "Focus, not below but on your left. I may need your help with this. Hey, stay not a step further children, this doesn't concern you in any way!" Frozen in their places, either by my command or my will alone. "Sorry. "He said before looking up, front, seeing what I saw, having the light shine up front. I doubt he could see any of the surrounding but he could see at least. "It's huge, overgrowing even. ""Yes, and it must've fallen here recently, judging by how it's pulsating and squirming. "I informed him of my finding, the liberation, though I wasn't expecting that my turn to be liberated would come. "So you want me to go there and get him?" "This does seem to be your task, with the small exceptions of the unknown places where you land, despite being sent towards different ones. ""Where's the exit then?" "Up front, there should be one opening, just make sure you'll give the wall a good rub and it should listen to you. ""Quite disgusting but I'll make sure I'll do that. By the way, you still owe me an explanation after I'm done with this. "I appeared pompous despite not feeling like it, after all, this could turn out to be even more dangerous than it seemed like before. Now that I've taken a second look and saw. "Wait, it isn't supposed to grow limbs, is it?" "No, it's not, it might be a side effect from the iron it's consuming. Go already before we fall down to our deaths. "I backed down after being turned on the offer for help, he'd stay and watch, thinking he'd have a better job giving orders rather than coming up. Then they were them. "Stay here with him. ""Wait, we can help. "The girl was the first one to offer her aid despite being too dangerous. "Out of my way, it's not a game, you could die if you come with me this time. ""And we could die if we decide to stay. "Her friend sobbed and temporarily refused to move out of the way as the situation seemed to be one of normal causality for him. "You'd better listen to him and do it fast, it's the line is getting thinner by the minute. "He inquired after telling us of his small observation which only meant. "Sharp teeth. ""Sharp teeth indeed, that could cut through iron. "I moved both of them away as the third one in their small party stood at one of the tables. "Wait. "Before going through I gave them a final warning. "Follow me and I'll throw you overboard and that goes for all of you. "The door closed, sealing the other compartments as he went further away, leaving us alone with the creepy man and his flickering lamp. "So, what are we going to do until he comes back?" I asked my friend even if he barely left second ago, both of them being fixed on the creepy guy so he wouldn't try anything with us. Lucie came near and whispered in my ear. "I don't like the looks of it, perhaps we should've tried harder and convinced him to take us with. ""Well, it's too late now. ""You realised it's quite rude to whisper about someone whilst in the same room with. "His voice echoes through the chamber, despite not looking directly at us by beyond the curtain. "We've done no such thing. ""Don't call me a liar in my own home, or you'll find yourself being thrown out of it. "He lashed and shouted, the whole room shook in fright of him as it wasn't just us. I held my mother's necklace inside my hand and prayed for him. For him to come back as fast as possible. The room where I was in shaken, most likely getting unstable from the tracks getting chewed away. "I really hope this works. "I rubbed my hand against the wall in front of me and saw a door slowly coming by, moving from the ceiling above, ready to get into position. Disgusting as the sides around were like visual waves inside the skin of the thing. It got into the right position, finally and opened up to my hand shaken. Shaking constantly with my grip on the sides, afraid to fall in the cracks and holes between the tracks. "Don't look down, that seems like the right choice. "And neither could I look above, too bright to see anything, either below and the terrifying fall. "And there's the two of us, just the two of us. "It didn't notice as it continued trying to consume, despite doing nothing but slightly sharpening its teeth. There wasn't anything on me to either defend or harm it, especially since it now had the upper hand, both in mobility and ability to hurt me more. Slightly overwhelmed by the situation I backed away ready to go back in but not before shouting. "You slime wretch!" But it didn't hear me I thought, still not having that far away with something developed. I checked my pockets, nothing to throw, if it managed to get through that thin track, the entire transporter could fall down with us, like that fool thought of. Back inside, I looked around, I burst through the door with no reckoning of the consequence I could've faced for harming his ride. The chair looked fair enough to use, heavy and ready to use, firm at sides and just the perfect blend of roundness and hardness to last. I Grabbed it with both of my hands and don't let got yet, back to it, I wasn't going to risk getting closer to it. Only a notice would suffice to keep it away from trying to ruin the system. I swung , almost like a whirlwind I threw it against it, smashing against its sharp teeth and having it ruined in front of my eyes. "I've got what I've bargained forth. "I said it, to both myself at to it, my will as it got away from rotting the iron. With its limbs, it started moving, almost like a rabid beast, despite not having ears to hear, nose to smell, it senses the water in my body, to my surprise that it hasn't happened sooner than I anticipated. "What now?"I asked, hoping that I'd get an answer from seemingly my partner in this whole situation. "Oh, this isn't going to go well. ""What, what's happening?"One of the children asked but I didn't care who was the one who's done so, they all sounded the same with their small boxes inside their chest, producing the same echoes through my chamber. "Don't look out, you're not allowed. With one exception. "I told them as one of them earned the right, standing at a table as silent as he was, he's done the right and let him so I did. "He can, the rest of you will have to wait, each of you at a table if you want to witness. But the beast isn't chewing on the tracks. ""Which tracks?" "Don't look, I'll know. ""But aren't you supposed to help him?You've done nothing so far but yell at us and watch through that damn curtain. ""Trust me, I'm doing much more than that. And certainly more than you children are doing. "Though I was getting afraid by the moment, as I felt him step in, I backed away with my whole body, making it go back too. And despite being in certainly separate and farther away chambers I could sense and hear him just well. And I heard him say. "It backed away?Look, I don't know if you can hear me or not but I think I've got a plan, we need to make it fall. I do know that it was because of you or might've been that, the reason for which it started moving the way it did. "But I grabbed the handle on the side, a bar was set, carried from another place for me to use. "Understood it. "I said before I was suddenly dismayed by the pair of teeth that penetrated the closed door. Longer than before but not enough to reach and harm me. I could see how much it hurt, the motion itself as it was impaled by them, shaking in front of me as that wasn't real wood. Even the bar got softer, following the example of the gate. Ripped apart a hole was made and spit outside. It had to eyes to see me but I could see that it was going to make its way inside, one way or another. "And it's not going to be through that small hole, I promise you that!"Though it didn't stop it from trying, pushing a portion of its body through, making me release the slowly disassembling holding object I had in order to avoid it from reaching me. The whole transporter was shaking again, mostly as we were heading back down instead of going farther away. A sudden motion happened and the small portion that managed to get it was decapitated from the rest of its body as the door managed to pull itself together. The chunk fell through and on the floor, squirming and trying its best to find some more. "It's not dead yet, neither of them. "A simple observation escaped out of my mouth, coming alive as I said it and unluckily for both of us, it was the chunk that had its teeth sprouting. Enough mass to roll over seeking for sustenance, I took the chance before it found it and crushed in under my foot. Twisting and almost like a cyclone I did my best to not reach the sharp teeth that grew inside. Impales on its own teeth from all that pressure, it died almost instantly before starting to dry up. Another one came out of my mouth after proudly having taken care of it. "At least they kept the same way of their life's end. Short and dry. "And my glory short lived, having to get outside and take care of the rest of its body, all the while whilst not knowing, not being sure if it was still following. At least my composure could be felt, standing tall, unmoved from the motion that was made. "Open the door again!"I yelled, hoping that'd hear me through the compartments. "That's not what I meant, are you insane. "I started moving to get through the next one as a sudden heaviness pushed itself into me. The whole compartment was about to get separated from the rest of them with me still in it. He had no care nor did he listen, I hurried, the door was eaten by a bigger gaping mouth and crushed with the teeth and that was only to the side behind me. I grabbed a chair to boost myself before throwing it behind to delay it. The door in front was opened with the courtesy of my executioner as he gave me only one second to jump through and grab hold of the pin that used to hold them together. All the same, as it was moving and the other left behind. "What in the name of?"I said in shock as the compartment deflated with that thing inside, shattering the bones that I was able to see through the hole that was left after I jumped through the open door. "You'll pay for this. "I barely muttered as I watch that beheaded. It had no head to begin with, the bigger maw filled with so many of them only sprouted because of its seeming incision made with the command of that fool. Picking myself up, I entered the second one just to be followed again as it sprinted on the rails at a decent speed, gaining of us despite us being linked to a slope going down. "It has a giant mouth. Bah. "I got closer to one of the windows inside and got off the curtains. And then I saw him on the other side, both of us did that just well. "Hey, is that the old man?""Kind of rude but that's not the worst thing on my mind right now. "He seemed angry at something and I couldn't blame it, with that parasite following and nurturing itself with the gas floating around, despite being in small doses. Thinking of that made me realise something dire, that I somehow missed before. "You ingrate, how dare you remove that damn part of your machine with me still inside it?Are you out of your damn mind?""Sorry about that. ""I don't want to hear, I need your help now that it won't fall, unless it will fall on us. "This way of communication wasn't going to last as we'd reach the point of having to release another one of them, with no warning as well, after not being able to figure out if the parasite could understand us or not. "We have bigger problems and at a top of that, my throat starts to hurt. "And I shook again, releasing another one of it. "Is he all right?"She asked, despite not being able to see, not having it earned yet. "Yes but he's quite. Busy at the time being, running ahead and jumping gaps you see. ""I still don't know what you're talking about. ""Neither do I. "Said the other, despite having one of their own standing near a window beyond the curtains. "And this already got boring, standing at the table, doing nothing more than wait. "Lucy was right, I couldn't speak for the rest but I felt useless being forced to wait for it. But there was nothing yet to do due our encounter having happened so sudden and strange. He looked at me strange from the other side of the table were we stood at. "What is it?"I asked to find out what suspicious he had. On my left too, he looked at us wanting to know as well, what got Lucy so rallied up, despite the man at the other side of the room being just as piled up as before. We both, despite being at separate ends of the portion we were on, muddled our ears and took out our attention to give it to Lucy. He said the following words, muttered and barely coming out. "We can't stay here any longer, we need to get out. "I looked directly into his eyes and noted the sincerity. Another one at my friend across the table, it somehow reminded me of my. The one I was supposed to. "It can wait. "I said and averted my eyes, afraid to think of what happened to him, if he shared the same fate as my parents. She was ashamed of something, hiding it from us, not wanting to know. He was clearly in pain too, even more, silent than usual, the ride we took could turn out to be the worst choice we've got to have so far. He wasn't helping a bit either, despite not turning to be like the host we had before. "Don't hit the end of the table or you'll end up being thrown away. "The child thought he'd be able to do whatever he wanted but it seemed like. It seemed like there wasn't any way for it to stop, jumping to yet another pin and travelling through yet another compartment hasn't seemed to slow it down by any meaning. "Just one more remains. "I came back at the window, being just at one aside. "This is the last one and it's not working, not to mention that you did it again with no warning. "He looked and both me and the following parasite, having a hard time maintaining eye contact, baffled by the situation he asked. "Then what do you? ""We burn this last one with it in it. ""Now, it seems to me like you're the one out of his mind. How exactly do you plan to set the whole room on fire with that parasite inside, especially when. ""The lamps!"I yelled but it falls apart as he said. "It's not lit by fire. "MY pockets, damn, empty after rechecking, with my lighter being stolen. "Wait, I've got a lighter. "He spoke silently but I heard the boy, just in time too, as he heard his voice from the short distance between us. "Perfect, we only need to get it inside and light it since it won't fall. ""You'll need to hurry up if that's your plan of doing. It isn't slowing down from the looks of it but neither are we. "I had enough of the fire, the constant cleansing but there wasn't any choice with my previous plan being obscured, not to mention dangerous to say the least. Right on time as my next ride was about to come from the likes of it. Though, having this plan did not go through, it burst through the door sooner than expected. Moving closer without any prior help, the door just opened behind. He watched us both, backing up and approaching with a lighter in his hand, too shocked to talk. At the same time, I had nothing to use on it, nothing to spread. "Head back. Now. "I said after it came down on us, those feet it had impaling the soft floor. He was the first to go back in and I followed, being grimly greeted by the rest. "IS it done?Are you okay?What now?"They asked too much that I couldn't count them anymore and someone rang at the door we just passed. "We need to go right now. "I said again, the music I heard in my head resonated with the vibrations and I knew there wasn't another way. Interrupting them before taking the lighter, I went by and left my announcement unhinged to him. "This includes you too, unfortunately, you'll have to leave the table and come with us. "A look was taken, seething rage as I forced them to come too after they didn't listen the first time. Pounded, the door in front was reinforced rather than the others and the previous compartment wasn't abandoned like the rest. "Come already, it will break in. You, next to me, do your thing and make it abandon the rest like the other ones. "I. Can't. "He saw through me and them as they bypassed me, having finally released his damn side of the curtain off his hand. Annoyed, I grabbed and violently tossed his lamp off the table, ripping apart what tied it there. "I'll rip you off next if you don't get up by yourself. ""I can't. "The children already went through, passing towards another one except for her, she seemed to wait despite not having much. "Go already, I'll follow once I'm damn ready for this one. "She understood and rightful so went in. Even after, he refused to move from his seat and followed them to safety. "You won't move and you won't release that side, it really seems to me like you want to die. ""I'm not able to release it. Take a god damn look at my legs you damn imbecile. "He yelled as nicks and rubble came out the door, being violently pounded instead of it trying to puncture through. The parasite was slightly getting more noticeable and I didn't get what he said, his reason for not doing something well for his saving. "What are you even talking about?"The table has his body covered, by a small mantle, I lifted it up to see. "You've got no legs. "His body was connected to everything. I got slightly confused and misguided. "What are you?"It doesn't matter, listen. Give me the lighter and lock the next door you pass through. I'll be able to take care of it on your own. Will you just listen to me for just once?"I must've gotten distracted by either the situation or his body because it was almost broken inside. The lighter was taken from my hand just as I took it from the child, moving away and giving no sigh. "I won't forget this. ""Trust me, you will want to forget this.

"He said as I passed by, seeing the parasite come through and head straight for him, the only source of liquid and sustenance. I slammed the door in my path and saw the mechanism that held it locked, the small window that was had by it left me and they have the image of the rest of the ride get separated, both compartments at a time. "Is he still there?"He asked but I gave no listen to him, I saw only a burst of light coming through and the deflating room that dissipated in the air with its own ashes. I backed away as the smoke came in and ashened the window, having it stopped thereTurned away, facing them with nothing to set aside, I informed them but they already knew the obvious as the flame was strong enough to thrust the head with us. "What now?"He asked the bigger one, followed by her question to prevent me from even answering the first. "Where are we heading?"And that was simple yet complicated to answer, to her, to him, to them any other in the tight room we had. With the window from my behind being unusable and this slot having no curtains nor anything but the insides and the iron shells through the sides, there wasn't any possible way for us to know what was ahead of us. "Can I at least open the door?Or am I going to have to be forced to stay inside?"The silent one had claustrophobia most likely, I could see it from the twitch of his hand, the motion of his head bent over the tight walls in the tight room we were in. The other too were nervous too, either for their friend of what happened. Both of the looked strangely at me as if I had something to do, yet. "It wasn't my fault so stop looking at me like that. "That should've made them look, one at the bottom, just like before and the other trying to comfort his skulking friend. It felt awkward being stuck with them, though there wasn't any way out, neither for me nor for them. The way ahead, despite being so crammed together by whatever those objects on the sides were, seemed locked, too much for us to break through, at least not without me trying. The light came from two small orifices that laid on distant sides, enough to keep this room lit. "Ironic huh?"I asked, slightly breaking the silence that was actually laid forth between us. "What was that?"I must've provoked him in some sort of way, that he was legitimately scared as I said so, reacting in a strange way, looking at me as if he saw a ghost or some sort. Though I couldn't leave either of them hanging nor waiting for me to explain myself. It almost gave me a laugh as I thought of it. "I said ironic, that. Before coming here, I threw his only source of light. And I can't do the same here because there is none. "I almost laughed saying it, the only genuine time I'd get to do so despite them thinking poorly of me soon after. "You're sick. "She said and I had to admit it, my dark sense of humour had no place here, in the tight space between the four of us. Her friend shared her opinion and most likely the other too if he wasn't busy fiercely exhaling and inhaling air. "I'm sorry, I shouldn't have said so, perhaps it was too soon. ""You really think that?Seriously?After a man just died, setting himself on fire for the sake of us. ""So what?"That hit the spot, something she awaited, perhaps it was the time for her to have a nervous breakdown and judging by it, the time for it was approaching. A tantrum would be a nice way to pass the time. "So what?"And a tantrum was about to start, ending in a way unexpected, that I could only hope for. "So what you ask?"He looked afraid to stop or to join her, mending to his friend as she was about to start it all. Perhaps it was a bad time for it, perhaps not but I asked nonetheless as we both came closer to one another. "So what was your name again girl?"Asking despite not wanting to know, the look on her face, looking as if it was one of disgust, hate, angst combined, one that seethed through me, even more, scorching than that flaming object we passed by. "Don't change the subject, I can't even believe you.

What you've said about my father then, about the man's life. You've got no consideration for neither one of us. If we all died right now, you wouldn't even bat an eye over, not one bit. "Again, she hasn't gone through yet, something had to push her, to tip her even farther onto the edge of all. "So what?" I said slowly, seeing my breath get all over her face and eyes, looking at her from above as her height was still slightly smaller than mine. "I know that you're not intimidated by me, I don't want you to be. I also don't need to have any care for neither one of you, that's not the reason I'm here, the same as there was no reason for me to be sent to the place you came from. "Shrivelled and cold from my clearly sanest point of view, her rage was setting up yet something was holding her from releasing it all.

Her hands almost tied over her body, no emotion shown so far, other than the angst thrust at me. Even with that going one, it was time for me to notice. Getting distracted away, though her friend's situation was progressing in a bad way, even more, obvious to me, made as it became. "That can wait, girl, for a minute at least. Or two. "I said whilst going by, she was annoyed but I wasn't expecting to become so worst. Despite what they thought. "I'm not completely devoid of emotion. "I shoved the other to make some room, he was standing on the ground, crawled like a ball, barely inhaling and going off. "Does any of you have some water?" I asked he nodded his head and she snarkily remarked at me. "What do you think? Plenty of it. ""I meant, search for some, those drawers have to have some inside of them, there's no other explanation for that parasite feasting on it as we went through. "She started searching, joined by him, all the while as I held the hand. Cold and the situation was worst, his complexion changed with it, spreading across the body. Darker and more panicked as it evolved. His other hand was wrapped around his head, having a headache barrage him even more by the likes of it. Close to the door, until they found it. "I'll have to leave you for now but I'll come back. "He didn't let go at first but right after the look on his face screamed of pain. "There's nothing in this one. ""Then search for me. "I said to her and subsequently to him. Momentarily stopped.

"Gah" I managed to hit my head on the ceiling after having our ride drive over something that laid under it. They looked fine, all three, with one exception, I resumed after rubbing it in. "Is everyone all right?" But received only a dull answer followed by a look that reflected the same mood that was being passed around by them. Now this was in my category, no pressure, just a door, though having not done such in a long time. Locked, no less, the knob wasn't turning, filled with rust, unmovable from the sides like the one previously encountered and no way to break it in.

"Are you planning to leave without us?" She came unannounced whilst still. "Isn't there something you should be doing right now?" Out of her pocket, something was hidden, perhaps something I could've used before or was needed. "A lockpick? How do you even have such a thing and right in this moment?" Handed to me right in time, I wasn't sure how much he was going to last down there either. Though the timing baffled me as in no way could it belong to her and with such a rust too, old and forgotten. "I stole it. "What?" From your back pocket when we were running beyond the lamp. I shouldn't give it to you after how badly you've been treating me. But my friend needs help. So here, do your thing, unless you found it somewhere and decided to carry this piece of garbage with you.

That would be bad. "I took it after not giving it a second look and gave her a nod of the head. Her friend soon to follow her call to arms and be ready into position, both of their strength would be needed in order to lift him up. "If I wasn't clearly in need of this, I would've punished this act. But I'm glad you've done so. "Saying it before turning towards the lock, especially since, with the hole inside my back pocket, there would've not been any to begin with. And it brought me back here. Towards me finding out the reason behind this door, despite all other, being so tightly locked. Before doing so, it did seem strange, how the whole chamber. "Can you please hurry up and start doing it?He's really having a hard time breathing in this room. ""Sorry for that. "Just like before, placing my head and hearing. Music notes. The mechanism shouldn't have been here, it was long abandoned after its effectiveness being judged as not well enough to be used as a defence mechanism. Though, it did help that I had experience into it, with a pick and vibrations coming by now. A ring came by at the first turn, just like a bell, bringing up some memories of the most pleasant kind. Thought the breathing kind of distracted me by a bit, and there was the other kind of distraction that I so previously daringly encountered. "Are you done yet?""I need silence for this. Both of you. Though I have just the story about a situation exactly like this one, you'd really enjoy hearing it. ""Spear us the details and just. Open it, please. "Neither of them was patient but it was enough. A thick, I turned the pick and heard a clang, something wasn't right. It should've been able to turn it but I couldn't. Backed away to take a look, the pick was out, leaving me to see, whatever was wrong in there. "What's the problem?Did you break it or what?""It's not that. "I answered the question, watching through and trying to figure out, the sound that should've been ringing, unlocking the next turn of the lock. "Damn thing won't budge and it should've, I've turned it the right way!"Almost getting close to shouting, I scared both of them, the third almost having passed out from the pressure inside the room, not to mention the tightness of the place. "Sorry for snapping like that but I'm afraid it's stuck. ""So what are now?Do we just wait for his condition to get worse?"He asked she approved, both of them were worse than the parasite saw before. I couldn't believe what I was thinking bout, even worse that I was going to apply it. "Perhaps. ""What?Come on, anything could help if it bring his condition to a better way. "She really seemed to genuinely care about it, with her nerves settles down and not angry anymore. "Wait here. "I said while heading towards where we came through. "What are you planning to do?"He barely muttered, even in his state, knowing that. Well, I've always been doing rash things that didn't make sense at the time of doing them and. "I'm not going to stop. "Said before fully opening the door and having all the wind and dust come through. I could see it faintly that his face brightened up after having the cold air replenish him and dismiss the hit. "We're still going. Wait here and don't open the door. "We were going on a curve, yet we were able to stay fine and not fall down, climbing towards something or somewhere. The door close behind and I held onto the bar set. "Damn, don't look down, a friendly reminder to myself again. "I repeated it after having it forgotten, having no apparent knowledge of how far we went through. Smoke was still rising up, covering a larger part of everything, none of my business so far, neither the effect that was being shoved inside everyone who came into contact with it. "Just don't look back. "After turning around, I was lucky that the screen shield, the window was still too dirty to see through, enough that I wouldn't get to see their faces starting to me whilst in the act. A fear of heights wasn't present, at least wouldn't have been if this wasn't too dangerous. With a part of my shirt ripped, I wrapped it around my head to cover a part of my eyes so I wouldn't concentrate on the light. With my other keeping me so I wouldn't fall, I started climbing, grabbing the edge above, not looking down and using my feet as intermediate on the metal to boost myself up. This was going to be hard to climb one, like scales the plaster over was enough for me to use and get over, yes, I could see the end that had something above. Too far to see but perhaps it was a hatch for me to enter and make a way for them. Still climbing and trying my best, I finally passed the edge and started grabbing the slab-like, almost like scale formations that were set, lifting themselves up for my comfort and necessity. I've almost forgotten where I was and what was its condition, being alive and well. Some fell off, the small fragments from the slabs that rested above me, despite the others having their well-being remain the same. A small leap but not enough to cause much of a commotion and I managed to dodge it before continuing my path, the one beyond the necessity the situation required me to take on. One slap highlighted another as I came into contact, the vibration didn't stop despite being useless at the point I was onto. Though not helpful as it seemed to me that the path towards where I wanted and where I needed to go was already being settled beyond my control. Even with the constant pressure of having to climb through such an abrupt curve, the light shining into my eyes and getting close to a blinding spot that would manage to get towards the darkest corners of my eyes, I still did my best to pull through. I couldn't stop it, though one thing bothered me, it wasn't the danger of the situation as slabs lowered, raised under my feet to give me support, it was. Beyond my sides and the only parts, I could visibly see were darkened by the raising smoke. Afraid that it would get to the point where it would force itself into my nostrils then lungs, I had to be even faster as that was needed. They waited and I had no way of knowing if they would do something rash like open the door as I did, I needed to do it. Swinging from raising slab to another one, I managed to pull through, even farther away by small leaps. "I don't know if you can hear me or not. I should be just. Above you. But hang on" I yelled at them, hoping that the shell, the ceiling I was just above wasn't thick enough that I wouldn't get to pass through. My voice and throat were clear and so was my perspective now, having the gap between the compartment and the head of the beast being close to both my reach and desire to know. "This can wait. "This time a whisper to myself and if it could hear me through, despite having my small hunches about it, I couldn't confirm it whilst still having shards of empathy pull through. I could see, though, the small hole and a place, wider yet not long enough. It was just enough to do the job, I jumped it after passing the gap, tied together, melted through. Swallowed through the section, it covered it the ceiling. Not enough to admire it, I rushed towards the door and started pulling the clear device, having a cog, more of them, impaled by wires and rods, no important. The key was already shut in, locked from inside, I watched around and there was no one here before to have locked himself inside unless he somehow got thrown out. "Come in fast. "I yelled at them and left the door open, with enough space for them to pass in and let him puke his guts all over the floor. "Bah, you should've warned me" I said, too late as both of my shoes were left dirty to root, stuck inside a room now with a slim opening that leads to nowhere. Visible changed were clearly seen on his face after the first seconds he was in. I didn't know why perhaps it had something to do with the small thick room we were in. And its hardened walls that protected the rest of its body. Certainly more space but a lot creepier to be in, the encryption on the walls made no sense, and the same could be told by its purpose. "Why does it all mean?" She asked, baffled just as me after trying to understand, soon to be joined by her friends. The room, if this was a living being should've had a nervous system yet there was none revealed unless it was set between the wall I faced and the rest of its face that laid beyond. No other door so it figured. "Our way out after it drives us where it's trying to. ""It will be the same from which we came from. "The silent prodigy spoke, being able to stand and talk on his own two feet, not feeling sorry at all for what's he's done. "Yes, and that's not the worse thing. "I've taken a look at both of them as I had no intention of asking that of him after what he's been through. "We need to take turns. "I took my time explaining that to them as I wanted to see the room more clear, almost like a strange form, made of others combined. Different sides held their place to different signs and scripts written on. "Damn. "I was distracted after checking myself for anything to write notes on. I saw words like those ones, on the way here. Before managing to make my way in, yet I've lost it in, the same way as I obtained it. Even if I did have one, there no doubt that it would happen the same to me again, to lose them before even having the chance to pass them to someone even more capable?"Turns for what?You haven't explained what. "One of them said, yet I didn't catch from who. "Turns to check the outside, open the door and see if it stopped. "She looked away and the toad faced didn't mutter anything fragrant this time. Avoiding the subject for some reason, as if something important has. "Wait, you're not going to avoid it. . . Just because that man died there, is it?Look, what's done is done and I need to know if I can count on you two or not, we can't spend the entire time in this room forever you know?"We're not intending to leave you like that. We've spoken before you see?"It happened just moments ago it seems, just as we were stuck inside. Just me and Lucy were standing there with nothing to check and nothing to use to help him. At the same time, he decided to leave us for nothing, standing in fear that he'd surrender to the temptation of leaving us. His breathing got harder by the minute but we managed to go over that just fine as every one of us made it just fine after. Afraid to go through outside, as we all watched him and a small piece of what laid outside, the fall that could've been twenty sizes of the palace in height alone, a fall that would've shattered all of us, despite our age and size of bodies. There was one thing that bothered and I could see it on my friend's faces too, another one than his fear of being stuck inside of the tight place and the phobia. It was the whispers. We all turned around and looked at the place where it would be and where we'd all look for our friend's salvation. Someone was clearly inside of there, chanting and spread sickly wretched words, giving me thoughts and feeling I've never had before. I looked at Lucy but I didn't recognise him, neither my friend, I could only think about what they felt, especially him after having his life previously so drained from him. Afraid that it might suddenly open and that the overwhelming presence would make itself clear to us. I was so afraid, seeing the tight room darken that we'd be lost in the dark. Yet a voice came from above and guided us, I recognised it and even if I didn't, I could feel it in my guts that it would, it was him. Guiding us through, getting closer towards the thing that made us cower. And after it opened and we could help him at last. The whispers were silenced as he opened. I looked at both of my friends and we made a pact in silence, a pact unspoken as we all knew that releasing the information we had would only bring even more questions and confusion, especially after not knowing what they went through. I, alone thought about not revealing anything to him, at least not in both of their presence. Another thought, other than the consent not given, is what would've happened if he. If he didn't start whispering at that point in time, what would've happened if he didn't come the first time?And now, he decided to ask, after seeing how I didn't want to say it anymore, rethinking something that would've been a mistake. "So, are you going to tell me or not?We still have some time we need to slay, and so far we've kind of failed to. "I said, knowing that, from the looks and from where we were heading, a long way indeed. "And there's something waiting for us. The four of us. ""What do you mean by waiting for us?"She asked, eagerly to find out what was going to happen next, the same as I was as I touched the letters on the tablets, felt the carvings and their depth. Whoever sculpted them inside, to achieve such levels, must've been the equivalent of a master. If only I could understand what it was written on them and what was written inside the many others inside the network of trails. "A room. "I said, after feeling the limitations, a hidden door that was still too early to open. Without knowing where it would lead. But my mouth ran before I could rethink it and the consequences would soon show. "A room to what?Or to where?Perhaps you're talking about our opportunity to go ahead and escape. A new way back. "They spoke in a choir, not melodic enough to get me away from having to find out. Yet they soon found themselves distracted by their own sparks that came out of their mouths. I couldn't complain since I felt it. Flying through the air around me, a flash was about to come and I couldn't have traced it without me. Either I was getting paranoid or it was about to happen. So rarely and the same could be said about its helpfulness, I could be wrong or not, yet I couldn't pass the opportunity. To see and understand, what was written, and the only second could last. Important or not, I had to know and find out what was written. I pushed both of my hand over the wall and prayed to myself that I could do and see. "Are you all right?" A silent whisper came, the only one addressed to me from the constant bicker that came from their side. "I need a second, that's all. "Perhaps it was a wall of silence that didn't last between the two of us. I couldn't focus on the voice and find out from whoever it came from. The only importance that it held with it is that it wanted me to. "Read the tablets. Out loud. "And none of them noticed, none other than me, reading past their banter and what not, knowing not do disturb me from my passion. I started reading, not loud despite not being able to read, hoping that I could, that I would be able to force it through everything. "Aghni Ibsa" I stuttered not being able to continue for the first time in a long awaited one, afraid I understood it wrong, what had to be done. That they'd consider me a fool, insane. Or perhaps that I would be that one. No, there wasn't a time to question it, as long as I kept doing it, there shouldn't be any doubt, that must've been the reason why so many others failed to me. Given into their own madness, driven by the celestial. I knew how it worked, how its creations did, yet I wasn't able to see what was laid forth in front of me, so clear yet distant. The text shook, it looked like it, despite me knowing that it wasn't possible, that it wasn't normal. Their now soft whispers, their tries to reach me failed. My hands sweaty and ready to slip off the wall, and again waiting for it to come. "Why can't I read it? Why? ""Calm now, none of us can. "It seemed strange to me now, that only their manuscript related comments could reach me and relentlessly push me to wonder. And finally, see, from their perspective and sides. I backed away, almost pushing myself through when I understood it, having to lash at them. The different sides, they didn't form words, I was wrong. Broken in so many different ways, stripped in sides, backed away, threw on sides. It was made for me and me only, a message I could understand alone. I had o look at the whole picture, from all sides, in all directions and stick them together in my head to understand its sweet lullaby. "Clever. "I said to myself, both mad and somehow release of the craziness that I felt. "What is it?" He asked, wanting to know, so simple yet none of them could figure it out. Seeing how the eviscerated notes came together to form, none of them were words to begin with. How could I have been so mad at myself from not figuring it out and misinterpreting it as a table with words? It wanted me to sing its lullaby, a composure of sorts, a test if I may. "And followed with the choir near me to help with the opening. "As they would get their answers and so would I get mine, after going so far from it. "Look, children, I need you to follow and repeat the notes I hum. "The strange thing is that, despite wanting to despise it and see it as a monster, I couldn't. Having reached a moment that would make me feel nostalgic for the class I used to have, at a time and place such as this. I should've known, even after having taken care of another one of its kind and knowing how it worked, I was still going to be overwhelmed. Such was the promise of it, all of them alas. I started humming the song and they followed, slower and a bit tingly at first but after a couple of repeats we. We went on with it, being short and tasteless, after repeat and repeat getting bitter in my mouth. Perhaps this song had a bitter taste or it was just me but I told them. "Lower down the volume. You should go a couple of notes lower than this if you want to. "Before joining them back inside, it had to be perfect, sang for the door that had no handle, that would've to lead us. That if only we could reach the perfect note, or close to it.

"Come on, we're almost there, I can see them better. "Their sparks came even more as they've hummed, the song was incomplete. I only needed. "This one flash to see the full song so we could get to see. "The beauty of it, being so importantly engraved on the rotten bones of the skull. So close to it, the notes, their voice, resonating, I could now see them resonating with each of the segments that were laid forth. I had no choice but wait until it came all of the sudden as they ritmic value increased after repeating the incomplete song so many times. Seeing it complete, uncovering in front of our very, my very eyes, the missing notes were everywhere, spread across the tablets and waiting to be revealed. Just enough that they would get to that part, I reached over and continued the song that had to be ended, making them follow. Our chant like hum, making the door close behind us by itself, having the sound only bounce more and follow the echo and reverb. It worked, I could see the dust being thrown away as the door that wasn't there, unopened seemed to be coming to fruition. "Keep going. "I had to encourage despite temporarily taking a second like break from it before joining it. They didn't lose and kept going, I either was a better professor than I thought of myself or they were too entranced to hear and see anything else. Guided only by my voice in the lead, I couldn't stop, even with my eyes hurting from staring long enough to see those notes, even if I'd get to suffer the repercussions of my actions, that could wait. "Open now. "I yelled as the song seemed to come to an end, right as one door closed, another opportunity arose. Ready to reveal yet another unknown place. The set of rails was getting to an end, at the end of all of them, as we reached the grim destination. "This took long enough. "Not questioning anymore as there was none to answer my question, just as well as there was none to help them. Their own cemetery of dead, I recognised their parts of bodies, solidified. It stopped, they weren't completely aware of what was happening, still entranced by the melody they hummed with me inside. Well timed, I just walked from its mouth, directly stepping on the ground as the tracks were there. So many of them, either slain or long rotten, the dirty ground from the smoke, it left them weeping down with solidified bodies, unable to deflate. Again, left alone to stray from their paths and occupy the system that was once set in place. I bowed down as if for a prayer and grabbed a fragment left from its shattered rib, throwing the mud and the liquid that used to run through it away.

"Useless" Came right about throwing it away, after seeing how it cracked from my simple touch. Something that should've been heavy and strong enough to protect the body managed to get, to become so frail. The same, all of the had to share their position and state of being, the many I saw. The much more that laid around spread through a lane full of their dead bodies waiting. I knew I was sent there but the one that had to guide me died. Perhaps this wasn't what he expected either, the same as his reaction betrayed him the last time we've spoken. The last time he was alive. "What is this place?" Awaken, they followed me as I wasn't that far, at least not enough into the cemetery. Though, afraid of what could be coming as I doubted that those were the only parasite I'd get to encounter. I had to pressure them to come and. "Don't take a second off, I know you're tired but it's not safe. "The flat land we stood on had, at least some support as we didn't just fall through. "The land bleeds as you can say and it's only joined by their as their fall was hard. Don't let it down in yours too. "Attention at least, now that they weren't frenzied anymore and there was nothing there to slow them down. "Let's go. "One of them said as he helped the other slowly overcome the small gap between the opened door and the land. She was the first one to approach despite hearing me well and knowing that we still had a long way. "Why are you in such a. . " "You don't understand, I can't stop anymore. I wasted too much, even with those lousy breaks, I wouldn't be able to forgive myself if I stopped now after getting so close. ""To the one you're looking for?"She asked as if she understood beyond me what it happened. Yet, she and they were so clueless, I didn't want to spend the time of explaining what I thought and. I was getting too tired of having to yell and get into fights with them. "I'm sorry but. . "Interrupted, I looked away as I saw he was going to start speaking. "I know where we are. "He said, which surprised me, in a way that I had to turn back and understand what he was talking about. "Where?If you really are sure of what you're claiming it to be. Perhaps we could. "I stopped, not wanting to give it all away, having, getting close to measuring everything inside, almost as a map inside the head. Hearing and seeing the vibrations coming from under their graves, agreeing with me almost as if they were alive. Either my thoughts were heard or something was happening, I turned back and said to both of them. "You can tell us whilst walking, the path ahead looks quite straight forwards with those others being too occupied by the piles of bodies. "Too blunt but it was enough for them to understand, even if they didn't notice at first. As we went, I realised, for each and every one of them, there had to be a conductor and passengers, all of them having been ended up here, to their last resting place. All except the one that brought. Almost scared, the children backed away from my sudden turn. I didn't watch but every one of the bodies had their, where the face would be crushed, no remains of their skull or materials. Looking back I saw it back away from the distance already as it wasn't deceased as of yet, covered in darkness and with its pair of eyes glancing at me from the distance. The same look that I, somewhere and at a point in time thought I saw before. "What did you see?"They asked, but they were too slow and it backed away already, leaving without a trace of its presence, almost as if it never came. Its track leading down, we were so high above. "I saw it too. "She said, surprisingly but she knew where to look and notice how, what once brought us here disappeared, leaving the hollowness behind. "Come on, you'll both have enough time after. "Arm to arm they helped each other in their time of need. She stood near my right side as if to learn, directly from the source, she asked. "We're not going to get back home, are we?"It's quite late for that, isn't it?"I said, barely, with a thought stored for someone. Though, it wasn't too late for him, even. As I looked at my hand having cracks and being slightly cut, realising that whatever got into my skin back there was merely delayed. I hid my hand away, as well as the spots that I could clearly see being infested. Even if it was too late for me. "Ok, the three of you go first. "I spit inside my hand since I needed the friction. "Eww. ""Don't mind it, kid, you'll thank me later. "I said as I lifted one of the larger. "Streetlamp?In a place like this one?"Yes, I told you I've seen it before, I know where we are. "Again, full of surprises, he'd have a lot to explain of this place but after we were done with the cemetery. "And the house down here with us. It seems we'll have to pass through it as it's our only way. "I told him after seeing more of the place. One after one having followed and went through. "Gah. Bah. Faster please, I can't hold for much longer. "There and it was time for me to go through after they came, just like some rats. Or knights in some cases. It was time for me to follow and let it fall down right after. "Ghaaaa. "I yelled, after being the last one to pass through and the rubble and dirty fall. Somehow a rusty nail found its way and cut a portion of the skin off my hand. "Oh no. ""Are you fine?Wait, I still have some bandages left. "She said before pulling some out. "Saved again from the girl, at least from a common infection, I was all set. That, after having to painfully wait for her to roll it out and just cover it as she had nothing to prevent it from going further. "You don't have to. That's enough, leave me alone. "I snapped, unwillingly for no reason despite not being the time nor the damn place for it. It was followed by a bunch of coughs as the dust that came with the nail got, slightly into my lungs. "Fine, you don't need to act this way, we're just trying to help. ""We all are. "Jard said, at least he wasn't bitter about him, or mad like Lucius. He took out his bottle, the one that that flickering insect was carried with, not that it was needed with the shining light that was coming from above. Yet. "It's getting dark. "The old man said with no grace, again acting his age, full of bitter and remorse most likely. Yet his was licking his wounds the same way a house cat would, it wasn't the right time but that amused me. "Hey look. "He pointed it out, probably the last I'll get to hear in a long while to come, after. Taking my spite and spit inside I cleared my throat and said, trying my best to not get it wrong. His name, that is. "Phaer. "I stopped a second to see it from his face, right or wrong. Nothing came, no confirmation nor did he deny. Yet, I had to support my friend and what he saw. "The house there, are you sure it's safe to go inside?What if there's something, like some of those things inside of it?"I asked, after glancing again at the sky, strange that it was slightly flickering, the forever burning ember above. "Well we ain't got another way out, nor a way back as you see. "He started making his way after he was done with taking care of mending his arm. My friends looked okay though I knew that their condition wasn't. Approaching for a whisper I said. "Lucy, what's wrong?If it's about not being able to go back. ""No, Cam, listen. "He didn't go with the nickname usually give, which meant he was serious, I didn't enjoy that and. The feeling in my stomach told me that neither did he. Even with that in mind and my other parts, I knew that we had to trust one another, regardless of what he was about to say. "We need to stay close, take care of our own kind, you know?""What are you on about Lucius?If you're talking about the. . ""No. "He stopped me from almost letting a yell out, revealing to our dear man in the lead of what we thought about him. Looking around to watch over us, despite the place being already being abandoned. I could see it in my friend's eyes, the one that wasn't following the other now, that he was bearing awful thoughts about. Unsure, I couldn't entirely defend him, not being sure about what and how I should feel. Just as confused as him most likely. "He's not like us and I'm not talking just about the way he's dressed. ""Again, I don't think I like what you're trying to say about the man who saved us so far. ""Saved us from what?Before he came to us, how come we were living so peacefully?And our plans before that?The same one that we got to the point of having to abandon them after he came?"He almost shouted alerting them, I told him to keep it down as it was extremely rude to talk about such one in his own presence. "Look, it's not as if we had a chance to do so. "Though, the sweetness of the dreams. A tremor could be felt inside just as I thought about it, visiting the big city, living in it with my friends. "Wait a second. ""What is it?"I managed to alert him from the constant seemingly out of place scavenging he was doing. "I know this may sound crazy but just hear me out. "I really needed this and I couldn't wait anymore to share it with them. Especially after what happened. And even if the dirty rags that I was wearing were getting to me. "I know where we can go next, just hear my idea. "And they came near me, almost in a circle to witness the resurrection of an idea long forgotten. "If it's an idea related with how. ""Just wait a minute now, Phaer. "Hah, I managed to say it again without having to suffer any repercussions from saying his name. "It's important since there's no doubt that there's a library, an old one. The scrolls and written papers in it must have recollections of everything that happened before and there's no doubt of what happened now. "He was browsing his stuffy eyebrows, eating what I was feeding him, the knowledge I was so kindly sharing. "Go on, thought, it's the strangest point in time when you decided to share this with me. ""Don't you worry. Same goes for you. Both of you. "I had to say it out loud as, judging from their faces, they weren't too happy, knowing what I was going to propose despite having been spoken about from years ago. But before I could do that, I took a small break. Enough to inhale some air, after talking so much and thinking it, even more, I was exhausted. "So?" He asked, having no patience even if his age required of him. "The library. ""Yes, it may have records in there. ""About what?" Jard asked, supporting me with the plan and the reveal that might be coming. "About the one that Phaer is looking for. "As that came out of her mouth, not knowing what he was talking about, I got closer and grabbed her by the necktie. "You may want to be careful about what you're saying, girl," Looking through her eyes as she was explaining. "It's important for me to get to him before it's too late if you have anything, any news or any information. You'd better tell me right now. Same goes for the place you've tried describing. ""I'm. Ehm. "She coughed and I released, her lap dogs were ready to jump at my throat any second now. "Sorry about that. ""I know, this journey. Had the worst brought out of us. Jard, Lucy, don't worry I'm fine, I'm perfectly able to take care of myself. "He didn't grab me violently, thought I understood more than he let us know. "If your friend managed to find his way, somewhere around these parts of farther away from them, the library should have documents on his arrival. Especially if he came before him. ""And if he didn't? ""Well, it's worth a shot, isn't it? "The place intrigued me, more than anything, especially since I was lost as of now. Which brought me back. "Jard was it? Keep that light shining, I've got a bad feeling about the dying light above. Listen, once we find ourselves back into the bottom of this, we'll go there, all right?" "Understood. "A strange moment and place to find a smile on her face, and even worse as it was contagious. Perhaps even more than the gas, as it jumped on the other two too. "Now, that you all seem. Decent for some reason or another. I'd really hate spoiling the smile that you're all sharing on your faces but we still need to open that door. "And the sign that had written, no. It seemed to have been used for something before but someone carved, with something pointy and full of cinder, the words that read. "Enter. ""Did you just notice this?" "No kid, but I was busy making sure there wasn't anything to jump on us when we weren't looking ahead. No need to patronise me by the way. "He had an innocent look on his wide face despite knowing what he's said and done. "I didn't mean it that way. Any idea what could've done it?" And no manners either. "I don't know but it looks as if it was done a long time ago. "No scratches on the door and the windows were cracked, not to mention to them what was already unclear behind them. "I'll go first and. What are you doing now?" They started ripping chunks and pointy sticks, doing something that seemed childish and unworking, it hurt me to see them act like that, especially in a serious situation just like this one. "Weapons, isn't it obvious?" At least the one that was holding the light had still some mind left inside his head refusing to play their plain game. "Remember that parasite that tried coming for us?" I asked, despite knowing, almost entirely that only one of them witnessed, or that's what I thought about. "No. Yes. "And then another no, confirming my small theory. Though, in case they weren't aware. "That thing was soft and still, there was no stick nor small broken pipe made out of a weak alloy that could even get close to hurting it. Throw that junk away. ""No, I won't abandon my only hope, you may think and say whatever you want but I won't feel safe without. ""Listen. . ""It's Lucius in case you forgot. ""Fine, listen, Lucius, that was a simple example. Whatever had enough strength and generated heat to carve through that metal plated sign was at least, three times stronger than that. ""Your point being?" He still didn't understand and she only did it to make her friend feel better, despite not knowing. "Again, fine! Do whatever you want but if it slows you down and you'll get hurt because you've decided to be stubborn, It won't be my fault. And neither will it be my responsibility to come back and rescue you once more.

"Another countless time, too irregular now, I went and passed the silent Jard, and opened the door since neither one of them had the initiative of starting it. After opening, I revealed the room, full of the membrane left and the fragments of the rib cage that were still attached. "Exactly what I needed, another one of those. "I sighed, despite this one not being one of the regulars, none of the others had visible muscles just being slapped on the walls. Despite being so strange and Jard, near me, providing the light. "We need to go through this?" "Unfortunately, kid, again. You go first. "I warned him before giving him a helping hand to push him in, though not too forced as I didn't want to force it either and drop the phial he was carrying around. "Come on already and try breathing through your mouths. "I said after making them signs, they came in and gave no mind, except for once and another. "Bah, the smell is disgusting. "She said, despite my previous warning being ignored, he did the same but in spite of what I said rather than doing it on his own will alone. "The smell will pass, but cover your mouths, don't let any of the wretches come into contact. We now tread on dangerous lands it seems. "It closed itself, knowing we were in its presence. "Just let me take care of this. "I said as it seemed to me that they were all panicking of the problem ahead. "The walls are closing onto us, we'll all get crushed. "Said the boy named Jard despite nothing being changed at all, in front of my eyes, and neither in hers or his. "Though I want to see. "I lowered the slip and left some place for it to touch with my rubber hand, with the condition and contraption around, it sounded like a good idea for me to touch and spread it around. A small test for myself to find out and find out I will. They were distracted, all three, trying to talk to one another whilst I checked it well. "I'm sorry if you can fill any of this but you don't seem to have another way out for us. Pitty. "I said as I touched an area with the skin that had pox like forms around my wrist. "Amazing, it spreads exactly like a disease. "They didn't take note until swellings formed around the entire structure, getting even the bones in check. ""What's this?"She lifted herself and checked it all as spreading around, seeing it all envelop and devour the formation. It punctured itself in front of our eyes, boiling, swellings pushing themselves to make holes, forming and continuing the eruptions. "Stand down and don't look. "Lucius said and was followed by his friend, as now bits of the walls were violently thrown around, trying to get their share of everything. They didn't notice but I was prepared to go forward, knowing that the path was about to reveal itself, making enough space for us to pass through. It wouldn't deflate, contrary, it would all be thrown on the outside, covering my wrist back so they wouldn't notice, ready to show them the path to be taken. The walls ahead formed like waves, they made a hole before melting on the sides, buried in the swollen chunks that were forming around. Some thick liquid could be seen inside of them and it wasn't going to take long until they noticed it too. "I'm not staying here any longer. "Lucius was the first to go and abandon his friend in his run for safety and fear. "Go on, pursue your friend, I'm right behind. "They noted and followed, despite suffering from the atrocity one called fear of tight places and the girl that couldn't understand. The bones shattered started flying, making them dodge despite none of them being able to get to me. Walking into the path ahead and seeing how to the upper side of the ceiling was melting away, ready to cover the tracks that we were ever here. "And what's this?"I asked them loudly as I was the last one to see and note. "Another one of those, It seems. "And we reached the plain and empty, the flat land uncovered but only a set of mouths waiting in the middle of nowhere. All along as the light was about to die on us and let us sink into darkness. "What is this and what's with the heat?"As an expert now, in the system for travelling apparently, I could do my best and explain it to them. "It's simple my dear. It's a set of mouths, all leading towards the same place, a long neck that will,

with no doubt lead us towards a grin and dirty place. Thought there was no doubt in my mind that another flash would come to be triggered and make me suffer for even more from the deceit that's constantly being thrown inside my mouth. Opening by themselves as they felt out presence. I opened it too as yelled. "Back down, don't enter yet. "As a gust of smoke got momentarily thrown out of them, second ahead from being infected. "Just wait for all of it to be thrown out before we go in. I've got a bad feeling, though, about what's waiting for us at the bottom. "I stopped there, knowing that the shock would be big and they would so rudely and predictably interrupt me. "Wait, you want us to go into there?" And the response would be affirmative considering how the alternatives were. "Waiting here to die since there's no way for us to go back now, or jump off one of the many edges towards the abyss that would break us. ""That's really unpleasant. "And wasn't she right on point with the deduction, a perfect one too. Thought, not wanting to admit, I was kind of scared of the depth this tunnel had, having the previous one in the mansion be just slightly deeper, this one could be. "Enough to break our bones, or at least the ones of the first one to go and fall through. And not to mention what waits for us there. "And in time, the smoke stopped being spat out, and our cue was up. "I'm not going through. ""Well Jard, we've got no choice from the likes of it. "He looked over her shoulder and took a deep breath, just in case of it, and jumped inside the mouth without even think otherwise nor of the consequences at hand. "Damn girl, at least you could've waited. "I said before seeing the second rash attempt at the own life of the one doing so, having followed by his friend, they both jumped, at opposite ends, leaving me to go through the last. That if they weren't unlucky and got stuck in the throat. "I hope I won't get to see another one of them. "My boots clenched and sore from the banter we had, I was the last, closing my eyes as it got harder with every try, having to go avoiding the teeth it held inside. The rust fell off and rubbed on my clothes as I, the last one to do so jumped in and saw the light run off as it closed the mouths they held open for so long. The light vanished both below and above, the echoes of their screams as they were scared after being stuck in the continuous fall were the only indications I had of them and their location. Quite soothing, hearing it from above and having shards of their pain come to me, knowing what they felt on their backs as they weren't as prepared as I was. The second pair of clothes underneath, being carried below through the slightly moving vents, ready to fall at any moment now. I couldn't move my hands around as the place was too tight for me to do anything. "AAAh. Gahhh. "And a bah. "Damn. "A slight possible concussion as I hit my head on a side, knocking me on the opposite part, having me fall over and get thrown around across one wall then towards the other. May fall was about to end once again after ending on the bottom of an. "Blgrrr. "Inside of me, reaching the stomach, after being in its throat for so long. My eyes were slightly covered and it must've gotten into my lungs, I started swimming, doing my best to reach. To get. Air. I needed air. I couldn't breathe. Water and too shallow to see around, my skin was blistering inside, even worse, the algae were coming near me trying to strangle. A light, not far. Above, I saw the image of something holding it. I nervously beat it with my legs, trying to do my best to keep going and prevent further. "Hhhh"I gasped for air as I got thrown out with the help of my feet, my eyes read and the skin on my hand being both red and pale at the same time. "There, he's still alive. "She noted after seeing me breath. Still in shock, I stood in the middle of it, still trying to breathe and suddenly. "Get out of the water, now, it's infected with them. "Even more panicked, I looked in every direction, not being able to see, through when I turned I got scared as I saw the giant tentacle, no, its limb moving around, penetrating the blocked encampment we were in, getting as much water inside of it. I saw, desperately and said no word, trying to clear my head and get some of the pain that I felt inside my chest and head away. I jumped on the land after they made some space for me to fall on and spat out the remaining gulp of water that was thrown inside of me. "Are""I. "Gasping for more, leaving it to fall over through my mouth, avoiding my teeth. "I almost drowned. "I left out a bark, a growl, spitting at her and them, filled with repulsion after being forced to swim with that thing now flailing around. My feet were covered in the algae, dirty and musty, I threw it off and thought about what was needed. "So, was this part of the plan?""No, but if you don't stop flickering that light in front of my face, the next part of my plan would be shoving it inside your skull. "A bit off the edges but having enough water in my lungs to change my perspective didn't leave much for else to be added. "Sorry. "Thought. I couldn't help it, I was scared. My hand was shaking as so did the phial, seeing how it was either running out or the thing that lived inside was. And certainly. That giant tentacle didn't help mend the situation we were in. "It. ""Go on, speak already, there's no time to be in doubt kid, especially since both of your friends over there understood it and mobilised already. "I hadn't noticed that they weren't at my side. But he was right. They were both search on the sides for anything that could help, for a way ahead despite being so shallow and dark in here. "You look like you're about to cry, is that so?"He asked, despite not being like that. He wasn't going to get the best of me like he did with them. "No. I'm just.

""Just what?I've been dragging myself to help you out to get to a point where we're standing in the middle of nowhere, not to mention again. But now, in immediate threat and you're damn shaking in your boots. ""But I. The lighter"He had to remember that I tried helping him. They certainly didn't, going around, searching through the dead dust around. "So what?That's no excuse. Especially now. "He turned around, I saw it too, with the shallow water barely sticking onto the giant tentacle. "With this enormous problem, we have to deal with. ""Why?"I asked, trying to. To avoid his quarrel and the pain he wanted to spare me through. "Because this is the reason I've been sent here. And. Perhaps you as well. "I thought about what he said way back as I made my way to search for anything like they did. Not knowing what to think, searching for a way out or something to prevent his anger would be beneficial anyway. Damn thing won't stop flickering now. "Wait, don't open it. It will fly away. "He came and reached my hand before I could do it. "I didn't mean it. "He's always been a good friend, even in situations that weren't that great. I knew I could trust Luc, he wouldn't do anything to harm me. Even if that wasn't a concern best to be saved for later. "Keep searching, it won't reach us not unless it can manage to go through that swampy wetness. "The children were busy, I made sure of that, they couldn't help me, just as much as I couldn't do that for them. Metal on the sides, at least past the thing it penetrated. The neck was one way too with no return unless the water had a way to raise up to the point of almost drowning us, in the worst case that is. "A damn sink is what we're in and I'm not sure there's any way out, other than. ""What is it?"He asked after having his part of the search done. "Did you find anything?You're the only one who has any source of light and it's running out, just like everything else above of us. ""No, there's no way out. ""And we couldn't find anything either. "Empty handed she returned, back to the spectrum to join us as we heard the big feeler it carried with, the strikes below. "What about it?""Good question, it can't get water anymore it seems. Perhaps we even have the job done for us to begin with if you understand what I'm implying. "His hands were dirty, both his and hers after being done with searching the dirty floor. "You're. . ""Hold that thought. "I paused him from continuing and sat down on my back, looking at the plants that grew some time ago. "What are you doing?"She asked, confused, I didn't want to waste too much with them, especially now. Though

I really needed it. "A break. "Momentarily from everything, with the small ounces of water, even shallow as it was, reaching the tip of my hair. I was tired, beyond the physical realm. "You're not giving up, are you?" They asked the same question, all three of them but phrased differently. I wasn't. "Planning to, I just can't continue without one, that's all. It's been long since the last one. "So long that I couldn't remember when it happened, nor the reason behind, though it must've been important, for a reason beyond me. "What about that thing?" "Don't worry, it won't reach us" "Are you sure of it?" She asked, after coming down to the same level, trying to see what I was seeing above. "I would've bet my life on it, if it was worth something, but it's not. It's not really anything anymore. "Her friend sat down, the other followed with the lamp standing down too, at our discretion. "Even if the light may die on us?" "Then release it and leave it be. "I gave the uprise hoping they would stop talking, leaving me be where I stood. "I hope you're right about it. "He opened the phial leaving it fly, so big from the perspective I've seen it. I whispered unheard, seeing it in a flash. "Haha. Ha. How it even managed to fit in the jar. Surprised me. "It flew, keeping its wings shuttering around and spreading light as they lifted the rest of its body in the air. They were amazed, standing on the ground as if nothing happened, with no worries, ignoring the sounds as something bigger than we tried going through the metal plate. Above it reached and stopped itself there. Lighting and awakening all the other dormant of its kind. The light made by it and its beauty could be seen across the entire ceiling as the yellow tint rubbed off everything, standing and living across and near the plants. Those that weren't doing so were now sliding down but still tied to them, almost wrapped in them, ready to finally leave the plants that were confused by us as if they were their beds. "Amazing. "She said I looked at the girl seeing how the light shined into her eyes and then back at them. "You. You could say that. Again. "He was now supporting himself on his two hands, trying to get a better look. Still children, choosing to ignore everything that happened, either from the shock or. I didn't know. Why was I bothering trying to understand them instead of doing the natural thing and enjoy the scene, that's the reason I took. The reason why I decided to take the break in the first place. "Aren't you enjoying this sir?" Eloquent as before, now that he didn't have a spike shoved by me inside of his back. But I didn't respond. I wanted to be able to forget it, perhaps even stop where I stood, knowing that at least if I tried, it was all enough. Where others stopped and sacrifices were made in a long way here, even if it seemed too unreal at times. The one that I wanted to see me try took a note of what I did. Yet, I kept trying, still not fully understanding why I kept doing so if it was the manipulation still making me do so. Or if that was an excuse. "I'm doing more than that. Jard. "They were living above, which is more than what I could've said about everything and everyone below. Perhaps even more than everyone I met before reaching the point that leads me here. "Still thinking about that someone in particular?" "No Genevie. "I bit my lips, which hasn't happened in a while, the same could be said about me making a mistake, unheard and unchecked. "Sorry for calling you so. It's the age and I'm getting ill. "Both in mind and body, thinking about them, her and everyone else, having to care again about people disturbed me beyond reason and any explanation. "You've still got time. "She said, despite being so easy for her to speak in such a manner, especially with both the age on her and how she was already used to living in the condition we passed. "Well I've had enough of this, all this sitting around and doing nothing. Waiting and umm. Being placed in even more danger from standing. ""Settle down kid, you've got no reason to be afraid, I've already told you so and explained my reasoning. I should be resting in a bed right now, in my house with someone else to take over the pursuit. Instead, I'm tirelessly running in circles, rather in squares instead of doing so. "He didn't understand without knowing nor seeing. Though, seeing how some flew away, a hole not so far, inside the ceiling, I thought, perhaps there'd be the small chance that it would reach her. A single one managed to pass through all of them as they all stacked, trying their best to go through and failing on their own weight and small bodies. It must've flown right outside with no care, beyond the fading light and away from the parasites. Along the way on a reverse, travelling above my every passed road and into the swallowing small labyrinth with no one to see nor to record it anymore. Away from the reach of metal hand to grab and crush it, going and not stopping, a light that was making its way back. Back to the recovering place as it finally settled down, with no smoke left from the fire as it was long extinguished after the settlers started, finally rebuilding from their small dabbling and unworthy rebellion. "It's quite rare to see such a thing, isn't it?" "Especially at a time like this Vintus, perhaps it's a sign from above. I'm telling you, why else could such an exalted creature come here. To visit our small dally too. ""You're way too superstitious. Ehm, cover up, someone's coming. "His hands were on the pride, covering with a blanket. "Citizens. "A group of guards came and passed, all along as if nothing happened. Vintus knocked his head and ventured my attention on their backs as they passed by. "Blue scarfs, tied on their waist down. "I hoped they didn't hear, not that it was a direct threat. "They must've been lower ones, those who hadn't even got the chance to take part inside of it. " Couldn't overlook the fact that they were still part of the problem and neither could he, seeing how he was looking at them, hopefully, it wouldn't get to the point where he'd get even more violent against them. "Well, be glad that we managed to survive this burning nightmare. "That and the praying I was holding so they wouldn't turn to pillage and rob us in in such a time of need of reconciliation. "Not thanks to you. ""Well, you did technically stay in my house and we did manage to get unharmed because it was reinforced. "Though, with the mere stroke of luck, we managed to get out of it alive, less than well yet still breathing. "You think there are others that made it? Half of the entire section of our town got smashed. ""Well, this is the reason we're packing right now, I'm not trusting enough in what's to come and what they're intending to do with us. ""Who?" "Good question Vicky, whoever decided to engage with those bastards up above must've got something thickening off of them. "Just as I said it, I threw a clock inside, despite having the place almost being drowned by them, it didn't hurt to have provisions. "So where are we going now?" "I don't know, though. I'm thinking that we should try our luck above. ""Just like them? The whole conflict started because of them and now. ""No, my hot-headed friend, don't let the heat get the best of you. We're heading ever higher than them. "Even if we had to go through the ruins, couldn't be worse than what they had to face up there. And down here. "Well my bag is ready, come on now, you don't want to be the last one to come. "He smiled before taking initiative and leading the way, no one to rob and no one in sight of the need for help. I wish I could've said goodbye to my neighbours, the ones that were still alive but I didn't want to wait for yet another gate for another conflict to come. "Wait for me, it was my idea. "And in the distance, with my bag behind my back and yet still over my shoulder, I could still see the bug flying away making a lead towards where we were going. "Which brought us to you. As the one set in control after the previous captain being killed, I judge you to be guilty of the crimes committed against your higher ups. Anything to say before you're being. ""Curse you damn pig. "He said, the last rebel to be caught and punished. There wasn't any council for me to trust into nor anyone to help me with my decision. My past fellow guards stared at me as I received the grand excuse to be in power, at a price and duty I did not ask for. Assuming the mantle came with more than I asked for, still unsure of what the verdict over them should be. "Remind me again. "I asked forth one of them for an answer I needed. "Yes, chief in command. ""Are. "I stopped and thought, looking around at the desecrated homes, they were escorted from.

"My previous rulers had no care for those below and what did that lead us towards?Tell me. "He was just like me some time ago, minus the armour. I merely took the charge on a command given by him, only to be bettered by the task of having to decide their cursed punishment for something driven. "Wait, don't answer yet. We're all thinking it, can't we oppose the customs we've grown with?We've seen what they brought us to. ""Will all due respect, we've been cornering them and postponing their judgement for hours. ""I don't need your respect, I don't need to be the chief. "I only knew that the spear got a lot heavier in my hands, too heavy to be held anymore. "We've all accepted you as one, knowing that you'd be the best, the one to take the lead in time of the great weep. ""But it's never been done before, I'm merely a guard, raised and trained like one, as you and everyone here was. Unbound all of the rope from gagging them, we won't punish them. ""Are you completely gone off?Have you seen how many of them were slain down there and even up here?Not to mention how much time it will take rebuilding this. ""I won't hear it.

They're. Combatants. Just like us and they've lost just as much as we did unless you count the settlers as being higher than it. "I circled around him, finally getting to something after so many hours passed. Continuing soon after, as he wanted a leader not expecting it to come back to him. "And where are they now?Hiding away as we're supposed to stay and butcher every single one of them. We do not know if they were the cause of this. ""Yes we do, how many times do I have to present it to you?"He lowered his helmet and threw it away as he asked, ready to do it once more. Ready to dishonour himself in public just to prove a point to me and the others. "You don't want to listen to anything but your own narrative. It didn't just happen that they came here to attack us as the big coming of fire came and ravished under and above. We've lost too much, enough that the time for us to go back and regain everything would be too enormous to even consider having to deal with another attack. ""We won't have to deal with another if we strike peace with them, or else our conflict will never end. How long do you think it will take until it will come to us, ourselves and the others to turn their backs on our brothers just because they were sent below?""But we've pledged ourselves and now what?Are we supposed to betray the survivors that barely made it through this?And, are we supposed to turn our backs to our rich history and traditions that shaped us to what we are right now?""Don't turn your words and stare at them at me, you're the one who placed me in charge of all of it so have some responsibility in all of this!"My constant yells and attempts at his person got the attention on a flying visitor. And those of the armour breeders from the locked caged, almost driven to a rage as they've noticed the light that was coming out of the body. "In such a time?""A sign. ""The sign. ""It must be. ""That's the sign. "They said, seeing it, shine right through the locked tight vision through the latched helmet that was stuck in their heads. "What are they talking about?"Finally having the bonds over my mouth released, I asked my fellow standing next to me, as I remained unable to question the frozen guard that was staring onto the small floating sky. It seemed to have landed on top of a fragmented side of one of the houses that were destroyed. "I don't know but as long as they don't turn on us. ""Shh, don't let him hear us. "I shove my head on the sides and made him take note of the guard standing just feet away from us. He didn't notice us yet, still standing there mesmerised by that thing. If only it travelled here as we taken the point of the revolution, perhaps we would've stood a chance, now it wasn't the time for licking the wounds. "We need to snick and alert the others. "I was close enough for them not to hear any of what was said between us. Our legs weren't tied, they were getting sloppier, it quite made me wonder how they even got us in the first place. Though. "And how do you intend?" And their almost yell like praises. "The time for a change. ""Change. ""It's coming, the sign was shown. "I wasn't sure what they were talking about but I couldn't trust how much they were enchanted by it, especially judging by their power and number. We still had forces waiting for us, guarding below. If only I had an opening to get out of it. Too late for the others as some of the guards had their hands over their shoulders, keeping tabs on them at all time. Unknowing on who managed to get below, to escape or who failed to fall back, I was the only hope we had to be able to retaliate now. Even as they were distracted, speaking with themselves, I managed to reach deeper into my cuffs and grab a hold of a small knife that was resting itself, being held in place by a simply undoable knot. All that remained was to cut my tidings and hope I they wouldn't chuck their spears into the long distance. I wasn't going to risk it away and speak again with my friend since all of their eyes were standing onto us now, the ones that weren't distracted, luckily for him, he saw it too. Those two were talking about something, arguing about what to do with us, despite having hours passed which lead us to nowhere, just delaying it all. The one that was now the leader without a crown, most likely the one with a silver strain of hair and the moustache, yet still younger than the one next to him. "Listen. "He said, having now judged us of treason against the higher-ups, most likely the crime we all knew we'd be named guilty of in case of the failure, even from before the start of the rebellion. Just above of him, from the point of ours and the side we were on, he was just under the resting light ball, having the support of the praising members of both his guardianship and the flying thing. It seemed like a fairy tale like his stand down to his presence and position of power. He continued as he pleased, ready to end it already as all of us were getting unresting from all the standing. "This has come to a conclusion or at least to a delay. "His friend, the other so-called guard left his side carrying a face of disgust from the decision of his fellow comrade. Despite being the situation I and they were in, I managed to finally feel comfortable in my place after seeing him starting to throw parts of his armour off to the grounds for maggots to crawl in. And it wasn't long until they came, with their many legs and desperate songs of the deep, finding themselves refuge under the once worn shoulders despite not being long passed. "As the proclaimed leader of you all, name the one that should've actually been called. I demand that they. "We all look in shock as he said it, in sort of way that I dropped the small blade I was holding. How did this happen, first the gags and now he asked for all of us to be released. I didn't speak nor did they as we waited for our entire so-called judgement to be offered. "And so they shall return from where they came from and in return, they shall send someone in order for the upcoming negotiation. "He said as the other people guarding us and all around, and those that soon joined as the higher settlers were called out of their hiding place after hearing the final verdict thrown. "Why is he saying this?""After all that happened how did this come to happen?""Has he betrayed us after this long wait?"Were fractions of their constant bicker, waiting for hours only to hear and find ourselves here. To the point of being like sheep, staring blandly at him. "Enough. "His voice finally livened up after so much time of being silenced by them. The only man, guard, chief, leader or whatever they named him, with no name that was written. "This decision is far beyond and above us. You may not be able to see it, perhaps neither will I in its entirety and message but understand this. It came flying, from somewhere below, from the same scorched nightmare that was about to devour us all, regardless of who and what we did. It's time for the change between all of us, especially as there is no one to lead us anymore. "He grabbed the so called badge he was given with those awful bloody clogs strained on it and threw it away along with the chest area of his armour. "I wasn't born into and refuse to assume this role, at least not until you decide to heed my call and listen. If we decide to slay them like this, to this type of dishonour instead of having them fallen in battle, the conflict will never end. "Not being used to being in power, it must've gotten too far up his head, no wonder why he decided to get rid of it.

A fellow guard thought. "That's why I say. "Ready to yell he next said so. "We need no ruler and nothing of that sort! Ever since we've gotten the rule from the first so-called mayor, the corruption ran rampant. All but we, the loyal and never ending vigilant guards and so did our ancestors before us, even since this place was a nothing more but rubble and lifted spires of stones, now covered by trinkets and wildlife. "As he said other noted and started undoing our bindings, finally letting us stand and to my surprise, none of those freed gave any forceful attempt. We all stood and listened to the beacon of light that was speaking through him. Though what he did not understand was. . "We were not raised and born to be ruled over and even if we were. None deserved to be spat upon like they were, living under the rocks, even lower than the breeders we're making our armour from. Even they are feed better, looked upon with more and waited upon their end of life until we could harvest their armour and thank for their service. Do they not deserve the same just because our so called leader decided against it? Does our tradition bid ourselves more than that?" I looked around after being released myself and saw all of the nod and cheer for him. He refused to call himself a leader but this was exactly what he was implying, acting like one, trying to consolidate it and gain our trust. I couldn't trust him games but only observe, knowing that after what's been said and done, in no way possible could our sins be forgotten. At this point his armour was no more, wearing nothing but the common wears under, even less than ours, made of cotton, stained and old, perhaps even towards the levels of those unable to afford better and more decent ones. "Is this the future you're looking for? To be like them?" I asked, the one man in the crowd who dared speak, even if I wasn't shackled anymore, they would've been more than enough to overpower me. "Or to be like us?" He didn't stare nor burst of rage, instead, he kept removing what was left of him, with no regard and no intention of picking it up anymore. "No. "I looked around and everyone started basking in the same condition as him. "Are you all going to abandon it?" I asked, trying to see and understand, what was the plot of their doing, were they messing with us just before they were getting ready to land the final blow?" "We're not abandoning anything but instead we're breaking the whole order as its entirety has come to an end. There's nothing left to defend now that most of who mattered are dead. Just look around, this whole place is about to fall down at any moment now. "Acting like an ambassador for them, we. Were both placed in a position unwanted. "Then you've got another reason to hate us, to want our harm. It just doesn't make any sense, you've stared us down for hours after defeating us so easily just to let us go and abandon your posts? Just because of a flying insect that just came?" "No. "Again he silenced me, all of us with just one word as if it should've been enough. "You may have said so. Perhaps that's what you think. It doesn't matter who won in reality, nor who makes the rules or gives order anymore since there's no one to give them. Everything that matters now is ending the conflict so no more people would die in the future. We've got the chance to get rid of the whole system that tried drowning us in, the guards, the settlers and your rebellion too. And start once again. ""And what makes you think that. . ""Of course, no one will forget what happened in case you're reminiscing about. But we won't be remembering those for dying but the sacrifices and what lead us into. "A new age said so and thought. Just as the setting sun decided to settle no more and fly away towards higher places. The light deciding to move on, the same as us, the same way we did after their release. And in no way would it come back, though there was no need for it to come, as they all understood, peacefully what had to be done. We let them go after on a strange note, watching ourselves from the distance and trying to furtherly get those who weren't fortunate enough to safety. "The bottoms shouldn't be so bad." Said one of them, with a bag on his back, making way and moving away with the rest. I looked back, despite having them released, all of them from the place that they once called home, unstable and ready to fall. It wasn't long until it would start crumbling, then shaking and falling down. Burying whatever was left. The resources that were still available were carried on the backs of the breeders as we couldn't abandon them to death. I looked even more beyond and saw him stay, alone, knowing the dangers, looking as if he was going to sob over the pile of armours. Waving back at him to make sure he'd come, to at least attempt but he gave me no top of the day, standing as the last guard despite wearing none of it. He didn't wave back. And neither did we get the chance, unfortunately, to see their snicking places and from where they arrive at us. Though, I knew they'd return as it wasn't over, as long and no pact, bond nor deal was struck. The time for rebuilding has come. At least for us, doing something we haven't done, helping the rest that was settling below, now joined by us. "Amusing." I said as I bent down, grabbing a small blade that was dropped, yet again, a stump not too far tied over the wall. It did make me wonder, though. How far it went, down, the stairs of the pole, the made elevating force that brought them before us. Now in reverse. Arriving back home, below everything. The men and the women were tired, after such an attempt, barely moving, arriving after what could've been possible hours of going down. We were embraced and welcomed back to the so-called secret headquarters though I had no doubt that by now they all knew and glanced where we went. They've seen only sad faces and disappointment as our reports brought them nothing to understand. "Drop your weapons, there won't be any need for them anymore." Was one of the voices saying out loud as it was over, they surrendered despite having us defeated. We achieved but I couldn't see anyone having the guts to tell them what really happened, only that we needed to negotiate now and finally move out of the small holes we were hanging, hiding no longer. So many of us grew here. I was left alone wandering through the amassing crowd, seeing them abandoned the weapons crafted for war at even the first whisper of peace. They weren't fighters and asked for nothing of that sort, even those trinket and clock makers were long gone, most likely before it even started. The posts unchecked, no one in sight to watch over them. One person was in, or should've been, I started looking, trying to find at least one thing that could've bettered my day. Where was she? "Where could she be?" I even asked out loud, doing my best to look for her, through every corner of the place and every visible hall. I ignored their cheers and wonders as they tried to get above as fast as possible. I couldn't see any trace of her nor any notice that she could've seen me. There wasn't any open nor closed place, not to mention a reason for her hiding away. The traces on the ground and there was also mud brought from somewhere above, not belonging to this place. The last place I thought of looking and going through, despite not being able to see anyone near to open the door in case something went wrong. A trail of brought mud looked as if it would lead to it. There was no way for her to get through without leaving it anywhere else, not even a chance for her to get lost through any other part of this small encampment and its lower sections. Unsure of it, there could've been a risk for someone else inside to have come and stayed inside, someone other than her. The inscription changed, and as I read it. "I understood." What had to be done, with nothing more to said. A risk worth taking despite being the possibility of not being able to return back after. Away from the confusion they all brought, I couldn't stand seeing them betrayed and possibly backstabbed by those so called friends of ours, turning their back on what they did. A bunch of liars, just as bad as the ones looking above of us with their morals. Yet, even with that way, I couldn't stop but say it with a laugh. "Heh, even darker than usual. "Looming as I opened the door, getting rusty and old, having a crank run off as being opened. No time to leave a note for someone to get some oil, I doubted that any of them would be spared again or chose to go back. Before going on, I used my other hand to dust my hair off some dust that just befell on my hair. "Heavy movement above. "Even more than usual that even more dust fell on my hair and shoulder, they reached where they wanted to come, soon to be followed by our people. "Pfff, join them if you want but I won't. Don't worry. "I said as the light started fading, the door slowly closing behind. "I won't run away from you anymore. "And a slam finally came down and I could hear below, the sign slightly being moved. And finally again. The keyhole being. Removed. The noise from both our midsts and the events happening above could be heard. A celebration was in order as we all started coming, many of us with not only peace of mind. Materials, resources and tools of grandeur were carried with us, among, even the children had something to add and see. The paths, many in number didn't slow us down, neither did it matter which one of it we took as they all lead towards the same place. "A celebration's in order for our accomplishment" Said a goaty man with a loaf bigger than his arm, I couldn't see my sister nor my brother, they must've been lost in the crowd. "Wait, don't push that much. Have you seen my brother? Have you seen my sister?" I asked whilst cramming around, trying to check and see, they could've been anywhere and even above already. "I've just had them in sight a second ago. "And now's a miss. "Come on little girl, why did you stop? Can't you see that there's no other lap for us to go back?" The moustached asked me and didn't know well either, where they went and how did I lose them. He knew us, even welcomed at a sight, I never asked how many he and they invited down to pass. "I'm afraid I can't return even though I might have to, there's too much of a space abandoned there and I don't think they decided to go there. ""Don't worry little girl, I saw them ahead. "He rubbed his belly full of mead as he said it, making me doubt what he saw. Having to be sure, I asked again. "Are you sure you saw them ahead? They can't really be left unchecked. "At least not unless they want to wake up with another fire on their hands, the last one got quite rough. "Yes, I'm sure. Wait. "He took a break to remember what he saw. Both him and I had our sides and shoulders slightly tilted by the many people trying to keep going. "We need to go either way so. . ""Wait, little girl. How many brothers and sister did you say you have?" That was enough, I let out a sigh and passed by him, they could've been above by now, searching for me too. On the road, I yelled about, trying to check and see, to hear and notice, any sign of them and their hum. A glimpse of the fading light above us, a door was opened, just seconds, the road I was on lead towards the fastest, hopefully, I'd get to slip away among the cheers and make forth the surface. "I can't wait, I heard stories about them and their style of living. Hopefully, it wasn't damaged enough for us to live in. ""No gander, I worry that those who already call it a home still have some problems, not only the others. ""You worry too much for yer own good, just have a sip. "Passing the fellow conversation. "Damn you almost made me spill it. "She said as I almost tipped it down, some of the drops made their way on my face, giving the scent a go. "Gah, I don't need to smell like that. "I said at the same time as I tried brushing it away from my face, not getting caught was a top priority at the moment since not everyone fully recognised who I was and from where I came. "Sorry for that. ""Watch it. ""Hey, you don't leave it like that. "And the unfortunate case, I didn't have time to make up for the fallen basket, the food rolling. Cabbage and some carrots, rolling down the stairs, grouping together and leaving it for others to take them from the grounds. "Have you seen my brother and sister?" I asked again before I passed another. "Yes, just above honey. ""Thanks. "I said after getting even faster, pushing myself off the roots that were overgrown over the walls. One was rotten over the years, I had to find out on my own skin after almost falling over, broken by my carelessness. "No. "But I was stopped, both from falling and almost releasing a scream. "But you're. . "I almost said but couldn't finish before suddenly getting pulled back on my feet. And the break was suddenly over. "Do you think it made it far?""What are you talking about?""That one that managed to fly away. "The break and standing on his back must've taken a small toll over, as I wasn't sure what he was talking about. "Can we please find a way to get rid of that?"She pointed at it despite the fact that I could just as well see it with my own eyes, doing more than a violent flail, now becoming a thrust. "Well, this is new. "Back onto my own feet, with the help of the light coming from the ceiling, I could fully see and understand its every motion. "It's trying to break in it seems, even more than it tried before. "Which meant that the enormous part of it that tried absorbing the water was just a fraction of its full size. "That means. ""Yes Luc, if it breaks in, it could crush us since they can sense water. ""I didn't know that. "And he didn't have to, more importantly, was that. "Go, in the back, as far as you can. "A giant thrust leads to enlarging the hole it passed through, making it go past, past the small lake, crashing the whole system from which we came from, the metallic neck that was on the side with no effort whatsoever. With another motion, a sea became lit with hundreds of lights drowning after being fully struck by it. A rage with no end, it kept making itself space to create more pressure and strength. "What now?""How can we escape?""One at a time please, we need to wait and see, perhaps we can dodge it. "I didn't want to give them false hope but it was seeking water, something that wasn't shallow. "I've got a bad feeling about this. "She said, with a hushed tone, almost as if she knew me and what I was intending to propose. "You and me both. But for now, wait and see, there's no reason to rush it. ""But that's what you said before and look at what it lead us to!"He was almost enraged, like lumber to the stove, yet he failed to see what was really in front of him. "It's stuck now and I doubt it's going to be able to push farther. ""But so are we!"Jard exclaimed back. "Not for long, it's time to act now. "I rubbed off without noticing but now, turning around and with the help of light. "Metal. Can you feel it?"They started doing the same as I did. "Yes, I can. "Followed by the same answer from both of them too, as the order which they said it from didn't really matter. "I'm surprised you haven't felt it before, perhaps you haven't searched the place and thoroughly as I thought of"Too late to scold them over now that we found ourselves deeper in the conundrum. "It's not important, just focus on finding any opening or any slightly tilted part on the wall, anything that could be opened for us to get out. ""Wait, you're not just planning to abandon it, are you?"She asked with a glimmer in her eyes, shaking from the cold like the rest of us. The water splashed, the shallow and dirty could almost reach our feet and from the looks given to the land behind us, we. "Don't have the proper tools or weapons if you may deal with this. So to answer your question, we are going to abandon it. ""But, what if there will be consequences for doing this?""Like what?Or perhaps you think the whole contraption might grow large enough to swallow the world?Don't be silly. "I left out a laugh, loud enough so it could hear me. "I've got an even better one, that it might doom itself from the start. "They all stopped from rubbing the wall, again a confusion given by me towards them. Understandable from what was judged before. "Let me explain. Look how much it's struggling and can't replenish itself with the shallow water. We need only to make it trap itself inside and it will dehydrate itself to anguish. "Hopefully, it hadn't evolved from that, if so, perhaps it would come to be considered a threat after all, but none of what it did and how it acted upon seemed different. "I don't know how much of the light we'll get any more so come on, find an exit faster. "They were being driven away by the looks of it, hiding and making curls on the ceiling, afraid of being smashed as the previous one on the side that tentacle was. "Fine, though you could've asked nicer rather the bursty way you said it. ""We can argue later about that, for now. "I thought I felt something. Almost scraping a layer of skin off my finger, I managed to find it. "Here, you can stop looking for. "I only need to. I mean we only need to find a way through and we'll be all set. "A funny look that it didn't last, I saw how they stared and the conflict in their eyes. "Don't look at me that way, you know I'm trying to do my best for you. And for now, that best is getting all three of you to safety. ""To be attacked again?"She asked, with such a nerve, without the support of her friends for once, since I suspected that for once, they might've received a will of their own. "I don't know. ""Can you assure us safety?" "I can't do that either, listen. What's your point?"Another mistake, I should've have done it, I suspected of the possibility of them wanting to run off, like everyone who notices the path I'm on. "Wait, girl. Before you say it, I'd like to mention one small thing. There's no safe place anymore and. Well, most of those who chose to deflect from my side ended up deceased or worse. "Those were. "Two points really if you think about it. ""No one likes it when's a brassy folling around Jard. ""Though he's quite right if you think about it. ""Enough with you too girl, we can try resolving our problems. How about after we get away from the giant. "I turned and saw it turn too near silenced. "What. . ""Shh for a second. "I lifted my hand and signalled them to wait, it was near the soil, standing, barely above the water not moving. "Somethin's happening. "I said, with a daring perception to check and see. "Don't do it. "We were all whispering, she was almost shouting, even if it couldn't hear it, I wasn't going to risk it. I needed my attention, even the vibrations though they weren't here with me at this time. Walking towards it to check. "You're risking a lot more than your life here. "He tried to warn me, even pull my back so I wouldn't make it. With barely a blush, I pushed his hand back and kept going, to see the reason from which we wasted our time here, not to mention our only escape. I looked above even as I approached, to see any chance or movement from those small flying bulbs, they should've senses better than I could do if it was still alive. "Same position. "There was the high possibility that it was still alive and well, ready to shatter and break my presence as a whole. I notice some of the suckers on it, not shaking either, too big to penetrate me and strangely with no teeth attached to them. Almost there in my small walk, behind I could hear them whisper to each other but afraid of something that could happen to them if they approached. No move whatsoever from it. I knew it wasn't dead either, visible changes, like drying up should've been noticeable, especially since the time since its last drainage has long passed on. Again, raising my hand to let them know. Thought it ended up being not necessary as I said back to them. "It's okay. "Even if their eyes widened, I covered mine, something was an array. A flash came almost sparking, especially with the layer of light coming from above, it travelled through my eyes so fast, right near my skull. Pain. "Gah. Why here?Mgmm. . Why now?"With one hand holding my eyes and the other the part of the skull that felt shards inside. I couldn't see nor focus where I was shaking my body, nor what I've seen before. "There move. Move there. There move. Move there. "They kept yelling it for no reason, each time sounding different, I couldn't understand the other phrases they desperately tried spilling out, nor could I do what they asked. I was thrown on my knees from the insupportable pain and it just lasted until they approached me. Someone did. A could touch on my head, something tried pulling me off. I shifted my hands, now both on my head, rubbing and trying to ignore, the indescribable yells that were near. After opening my eyes I saw them but still couldn't hear, all three tried pulling me over. Back on my feet, I pulled myself away just to find myself with my back against a wall, both solid and soft at the same time. The sound finally settle, bells finally stopped, returning to see and hear. "It's still alive. "Face to the membrane, it lifted itself, leaving me only seconds to realise how lucky I was because of the bandages that I wasn't bonded to its sticky skin. The smaller hands came from behind, trying to drag me but we were too close to its reach. Before coming down, right as they didn't have enough time either, it stopped again. Shaking violently, getting close to changing colour, the whole room was shaken with it. I held my composure and stood unshaken, though, the impact towards it was clearly worse than how it felt to us. Noises from beyond it could be heard, of skin and body being crushed, something else was taking care of it. All of the sudden, after getting close to the point of falling onto us, slightly dried. It retraced with a speed unseen, getting butchered as the bulked thick lump that it grew in the back got smashed over the wall. Something pulled it back. Leaving the remains of it to fall into the shallow water it refused to get reach off. The hole of light that came through made a notice, all of those flying bulbs soon to follow that call. I came in front of him flailing my arms to see if he was able to understand. "Hey, Phaer, can you hear me?We need to go before it comes back to tear us apart""I heard you girl. "He said, still rubbing his head, yet not realising yet how fast my heart was beating and the closely heart attack was acting like. "Ghhha. "He left out another pain screech, something looked as if it was shoved inside. Jard saw it too and intervened without even waiting to be asked to any help whatsoever, by me or him. "Here, let me help. "A jump and he grabbed it, more pain as it retracted. Something shoved inside his head. "I couldn't see it before if it wasn't for this action of his. "He had something in his head and the extraction knocked him out, the pain being too much to take. "Oh no, what have you done?"I didn't notice his stupid mistake, but he started bleeding after the sharp object was removed. "What do we do?"Lucius started panicking again whilst looking everywhere for something to cover it with. "Wait, I didn't mean to do that. Cam is there. Is there. Do you still have those bandages with you?""No, I used the last ones before, can't you remember?"The blood was already visibly running down his hair, perhaps nothing else would do. "Quick, help me remove those. "I had to act with ease and think it straight, ignoring those disturbing noises from outside and everything flying above. "Stop running around and help us, we need your help too you know?""I'm sorry. What to do then?"We gathered as in front of a fire after I got closer and lifted his shirt?"Wait, you can't strip him, he'll get cold. ""I'm not stripping him you, idiot. We need those bandages. ""But they're dirty and could hold even a more festering infection. "Said Jard but I was already started on undoing them. "Don't you think I know that?But we're out of options, he's bleeding fast. "I couldn't hope much but for those that were tied to him some time ago to not be infected by the shallow and disgusting water we all fell into. "Almost done, the knot. I need you to take that. "Just a thick rub and it should. "Now roll it over, I'll lift him up. "I said after keeping his torso slightly above, feeling awkward doing it in front of them but I hadn't any other possibility. "Come on already, we can't tilt him for much more. ""Done. ""All right, come on now. "He was right, slightly wet and a darker colour of the cotton, whatever was in that wound, I couldn't see anything more than it being close to healed. He wasn't going to need it on his torso any longer for that thing. Now it remained. "The head, come on. "I told him after to hold it up as I prepared it. No water and nothing to slightly cleaned it, I ripped one of the layers of cotton and threw it away. "Hey, don't do that, we're supposed to put it on him not to throw it away!" "I'm trying to reduce the possibility of an infection, give me a break already. "His head into position, the bandages as clean as they could be, I wrapped around without a notice and said so after. "You can lower him now, like that. That's fine. "Under a small made bed of dirt that I took from his sides, I left some room for comfort. And to be certain of it, I place my fingers just above. "What are you doing now?" "Shh, let her see. "I felt a cold, barely feelable gust of air coming out, he was still alive. "At least for now, thought we need to find a way out. ""what about that hole?" Lucy said whilst pointing out towards the same one from which the tentacle came out from, it didn't seem like, some time ago we were in danger, now to be trapped again. "What's that by the way?" I asked Jard, changing my focus point to that small shard it landed inside the head of Phaer. "Oh, I haven't realised I've been holding it. Haha. Sorry about that. "A small reflection came as some light bounced from it, the hole from the wall was still trying to get our attention. "Could you just lower it? It's gleaming right into my eye, the light too. ""Sorry about that. So whatcha think it is?" "I don't know Jard but perhaps you shouldn't be holding it, you know since it's been lodged inside his skull. "He said whilst pointing at it, thought what he failed to notice was that whatever ounce of blood that would've normally stayed on it wasn't there, it all fell off. And I knew that Jard hasn't washed nor wipe it, some of the blood that once came out was on his fingers. Luckily for him he didn't have any wound on his fingers or else he would've been in a lot of trouble. "Cam, why are you still staring at it?" "I wasn't staring, I was merely thinking. ""Well, so were we, at least some of us. Now, can we focus on getting out?" He was being quite annoying, even more than his usual, thought I had to give it to him when he was right. "Wait, before we go there to check. "Jard stopped me. "What should we do with the shard?" "Just pack it inside like the rest of your things, we might need an explanation for so he won't think we just bashed his head with a rock when he wasn't looking. ""Good thinking. ""Sure. "The water was swimmable at least for me and there was certainly no need for all of us to go. "I'm going alone, you two stay here and take care of him. ""Wait, who made you the leader?" "Well, maybe, taking care of our friend here so he wouldn't bleed to death more than qualified me for the post. In case you were wondering. "I started going in the water without checking at first to see if it was cold or not even with his intangible and inaudible words he muttered before doing so. "Show off. "And other insults, if this wasn't an important task, I would've shown him. And I would have shown her too. "But she went off too fast before having to face my might. And now, we're stuck with him. "I wish I'd get the chance to pay him off for what he said, she wouldn't notice, she's already too far to see with her back turned and hands busy. The only problem was that Jard was a tattletale, who would most likely tell on my without a second thought. Stuck here with nothing to do but wait on her, perhaps it wouldn't have been that bad if it weren't for the snoring. "So Jard, what do you suppose we do until she comes back? Wander around? I mean there's this spot I've found, it's really nice and haven't gotten the chance to show it off. ""We can't. Listen, let's just stay here and wait for her to return, okay? We've done enough already. "I wasn't sure why he was acting this way, saddened by a little. "Mistake, that's all, she can't hear us now, nor guilt trips you for doing that. I mean, look at the bright side of this. If it weren't for you, he would've still had that thing shoved inside his head, causing, even more, the damage I think. ""You really think so?" "Of course, I do. "I almost knocked him with a palm on the back, he was standing rigid as it were. "She's almost there, can you see her?" "Yeah, how do you suppose she'll lift herself up to the hole in the wall? It seems quite high. ""She'll just grab it by the edges and lift up her head to the eyes level, she's just trying to see not jump over. ""I knew that. "Saying so after picking up a rock and throwing it in the water. "It's sure a shame, isn't it?""What?""The way we came through being smashed. Listen, just stay here, I can't really stand it anymore, I'll go search for another exit before she's done. "An awkward way to finish our small talk but I couldn't help it if I was getting bored by standing and doing nothing, I wasn't a mere watcher meant to do nothing. "Fine, I'll stay with him alone I presume. "He did mention about a way out when he was still awake, I just needed to uncover it and become their hero. "Looks like we're the only ones left. And I doubt you can hear me in any way, now that my friends both left me to search for an exit. "I turned around, both ways, it felt silent. They were both too far to hear, to notice. "They can't hear me I'm sure of it. Not that they're hearing me even when I'm speaking. "She was deep sea diving but this wasn't a sea, nor was it clean enough to justify why she did it. He searched the wall, despite knowing that it didn't help much, Phaer was the one who found that door after we wasted the time going on a wild chase. The shard, still in my hand, I've taken too much time speaking with them and still haven't stored it. The phial didn't seem to have anything in use for since the water was too dirty to drink, it would make a perfect spot for the shard to be sat inside. It even made a cling noise, almost like a bell after it bounced on the bottom of it. "Are you awake?"He moved, I thought I saw it. "Hey. "I thought about calling but I wasn't intending on repeating it twice since Lucius would've been the only one who could hear me. His help wasn't needed. Though I am mostly sure of it, but what caused his move?I was staring through the phial right at him and thought even more about it. What if the small shard that was thrown out made him move some of the muscles of his face?Too much, I was thinking too much ahead. And I wouldn't want to flush it away as I did inside with the lighter, a mistake that remained on me. Despite how much I tried forgetting it. "Any progress on our sleeping beauty over there?"He yelled from across the room, loud enough that she could've heard it too, that if she decided to come back up for some air. "No. "Back at him as he resumed it, slightly alarming it after forgetting about. I looked at the water, all around the area, up on my feet. She got back for some air before going back to her swim, instead of deciding to go directly over. "Lucius, is something wrong with Cam?"I asked, unable to notice if he heard me either, I had to leave our sleeping and hurt friend for now that she seemed to be in trouble. "What do you mean?"He came back, bored as ever, I stored the phial before he even managed to see where I hid it. Not that I didn't trust him, I wasn't even sure If I could be honest about that even to myself. But. "She's acting. Strange. ""I don't see anything different, well more different than her usual. ""Right. Same as in which cell was hidden the key back in the mansion?"I gasped for air as that was a mouth full from saying it, making even a sign for him to leave me some seconds before going on. "As if you could've found it. Easier. ""Yeah. . "A silent break for both of us, looking forth our friend. "Listen, Jard. "His voice softened now right after the sudden break from everyone took place. "What is it?"I suspected something was happening between him and what occurred before, in no way could he be ignoring what's happening with the same jolly look and the attitude he had with him. "Actually, it's. "He couldn't say it, no matter how much he tried it, I could see his mouth shaken but no word nor warning coming out. "Wait, what's she doing?"He might've added, I wasn't sure after focusing on the lake itself again. "Okay, we really need to pull her out. "I grabbed by the shoulder, after not letting me finish, realising that he wanted to just plunge into it just to avoid talking to me again. "Wait, has something happened, is that the reason behind your strange act?"He seemed even more repulsed to even give a second thought about our small discussion. "No, it's. Can't it wait?I'm sure we'll have time for it later. ""No, we won't. Why are you acting like a stranger to me? And so rudely to the only man who tried helping us too. None of us did anything wrong nor intend to get on your bad side, yet. ""Yet what?" He pulled away, with his feet now standing in the muddy water. "I'm sick of all of you treating me that way, especially him. So don't lecture me. Do not lecture me about acting rude to him or. ""I don't understand what you're trying to say, we're not acting any different to you, none other than how we did before. You're getting sad and acting strange at a time over nothing but small fights. "He didn't dare look me in the eyes, strangely especially since I was more than willingly to do so myself. And I couldn't keep it like this, especially since we needed to act as a team with him on board too. "Then. Could you please just talk to me so we could. So we could pass on? Listen, at least if you're going to ignore me. "And in a way, he did more than that, approaching only made him slightly moving away in the water, with its effects being so strange now. "Tell me, why are you even planning to help her, hasn't she offended you too?" "I'm not trying to help her, I'm only trying to get as far away from you if it means getting in the pool and getting as confused as she is. "It felt as a low blow, realising how mean he could be, a friend acting like that. "And you're wondering why I'm choosing to stay silent most of the time, don't you. "I yelled and backed away, trying to hide my face as I went deeper in the back. I couldn't see if he turned back nor hear if he cared about it. He said what he had to, and I did the same. Yet it didn't make anything better, just worse. "It's all your fault. "Now I wished I could kick him and neither of them could see it. He wouldn't be able to find out either, it could even pay off the debt he left when he first came. "And now we didn't get to do anything but. Switch places, for what? To be dragged away from everything we liked, from our normal lives? Perhaps you needed to ask us first before you decided to. To. To kidnap us from there. "I wasn't doing anything by yelling at the corpse in front of me. I wasn't doing anything with the fight. Looking back at him and seeing him do nothing made me say all of the sudden. "I'm going in, wait for me here. "Strange how I turned so fast without being able to see if he heard it. I wasn't a good swimmer, especially as I tried plunging in that disgusting water, the first drop made me take a good amount in my mouth and nose. And inside the water, I heard he whispers. "Cam. "More water came inside, so I got outside seeing how she also got above it and kept steady. She couldn't have been the one whispering. "Could she?" I got closer and watched her as she turned, she must've seen me throw huge blocks of water with my lousy technique, not sure of what was the proper way. Ignoring whatever wanted to whisper despite freaking me out. "Cam, are you all right?" She had a blank stare and she stared. Floating without moving her arms whilst I had to flail mine to keep my height. "Cam!" I yelled again, in her ear, so she could hear, the way out wasn't far, that's why she decided to go close but the brightness made sure I wouldn't get to be close. Grabbing her by the arm and flailing with only one arm left me surprised that I wasn't falling to the bottom like a rock. "Camilla, Lucius! Come on!" He did it, managing to grab her and set the course. We were all scared, all of the sudden. Even her face showed a sign or noticed, the gate moved, welcoming us to come. I yelled back to let them know. "There's a way out, come on already. "My throat was getting sore of all the yelling and I couldn't wait, grabbing Phaer and placing him right above my shoulder, slowly advancing ahead. I couldn't abandon them though, despite what was being said, they were still my friends, even as. The hole got covered, the light slaughtered, I thought I saw a head but couldn't believe it, bending the steel around and crushing it without a sound. I was scared, I couldn't lie, afraid of what would've happened if any of them managed to get close and over that hole in the wall. The size of the hand, it didn't belong to a human nor to any of those monsters. The only light now left for us, came from one small hole we've all forgotten. With none of those small things trying to crowd themselves inside of it. "Come on already, I can't carry him alone. "I told her after seeing how she was tilted, the only person I could rely on for now. "Yeah. Right away. "Grabbing him both of us as we started walking, it seemed like, from the moans like he was going to wake up too. Before we'd say anything or explain, he boosted himself back up on both of our heads. "He's awake, wait. "She was dazed, we all were. "Wait, Jard, didn't you notice?"She asked, but what did I miss?I couldn't ask her, my tongue was getting bigger by the second, impairing my speech. "The fungus. "As soon as she said it, I looked everywhere on the ground, all smashed, small clouds popping out. "Wem Gott"We needed to get out, I wasn't able to say it out loud. Places on my knees, pushing myself over. "The water, it's. The water's fault I say. "There was a gate, somewhere if I could remember, I hadn't any luck finding it out. I followed their lead, they seemed to know the lead. With my two hands, unable to see where they were, if they were still attached, I grabbed by her robe and followed in her footsteps. "Lead the way Cam"I said after grabbing the reins of the lead. "Get off of me, you'll slow us. You will slow us down. ""Wurma the"He didn't make sense either. None of the room made, too dark to see, to confined to be. What happened after, as a cue. However, we got towards, it baffled me to even think, hurting my head even worse. It left us on us knees, covering what was seen or close to being remembered. "What now?"I asked, just to be answered by Phaer, fear made him fully regain, the room, the hall, the giant place. It all revealed in front of my eyes. I stopped the kids now that I was fine, what was left in front I left out loud. "Torture!"I said, after grasping my throat, a hall of a thousand sirens, made out of bronze and shallow inside. Smaller ones on the corner, too far to be seen with crippled eyes but not so with the pulses that travelled to me. The whole entire stage felt overwhelmingly huge, even more so with the help of the yellow light coming from the endless above. A fanfare or possibilities, all ending in a worse way than the other. To awaken after a slight sleep was frustrating and repulsing. "Don't move, any of you, don't make any sound"I turned to say it then back where originally facing. Something was scratching some of them from far away. Long bony fingers I could feel them as they touched one of the sirens near them, scratching and perforating through their already deformed faces. It triggered one of the sirens after leaving its presence, making it change position to face another, let rust and small fragments fall off. So old yet still moving, the vibrations weren't the only disturbing condition, the sound made by the siren after opening her mouths, the big one and the smaller one near her check was deafening and repulsing. So loud yet so silent, I could see it on their faces, unaffected by the violent thrust on my ears. I realised then that something has happened too, I felt a couple of bandages and couldn't find out. After signalling again for them to shut up. "But. . ""Shut up. "I seemed desperate, my tone was filled with blood and seething disgust after hearing again, footsteps on the floor. Seeing, barely how it moved, yet I couldn't see its entire body between the many standing sirens. "There, move. "The only thing that they should've understood and remembered, listening to me and to my affairs. Those weren't tails but large fingers, I could see them being dragged on the floor. So weak they must've been, forced to. "Bah"Having to cover my ears yet again, they were useless, moving through and barely stopping from falling over. Another one was scratched, from a different end, I watch to notice, to see where it was and what it was doing, from the position of my standing I should've seen it. The whole gargantuan room was slightly tilted towards my working arm, slightly tilting us too. "A"She covered her face and grabbed one of the statues near, to prevent her fall. It turned onto us and made a clinging sound, shaking and moving its faces around. Her eyes shallow and so was the depth inside her mouth, the emptiness inside she held inside was trying to get out. "Don't touch any of them. "I said the other child covered his mouth too, unable to control himself otherwise. They were many, almost visibly seeing them. So fast yet careful, the way we went through left us able to see and them as well. Those fingers, being dragged, they were crawling around yet able to twist themselves in order to prevent the slightest touch on those bells. "Stop. "I said before leaving out some breath to be taken inside and look around, even more after not being able to see. It was no maze nor it was too clear, we couldn't see the next exist that laid somewhere. Such a moment, with no guide, it reminded me of the mistake that came from the choice I've made. With that small object in mind to add even more of an insult to the injury dealt with both my person and the current companions. Scared, they stared and didn't know, couldn't know what to do in such a forced situation. Nor could I question, being in the situation, what happened before getting here. The face staring now at me, triggered by her temptation and lack of attention, reminded me of something related to my choice. It could wait, even written on a note after getting away from the entire room. Being picked and linked, I heard one coming from far behind. I started running in front, noticing how farther I was from it, the more could I avoid the pain I felt, despite not being to avoid those tremors altogether. Looking around, the vision was altered, afraid of flashes that might come that would let me. "Don't get close to them. You may start them over too. "I stopped him just in time, his buffy hands and fingers were getting close, fear ran through, helping me point out how close he was to make it sing. Bronze but black, whatever coloured that way wasn't my concern, nor how I realised it. They were now tilting the halls, from one point to the other. "We can't stay like this, we need. We need to switch. "I struggled to say, unaware of how badly I sounded, my throat split in half among my tongue. They nodded, afraid of whatever left my mouth. Unable to think straight, from all those shaken sirens scratching directly inside my skull and ears, the thought of having to cut them off become ever so more pleasant. "Bah, just move, come. Gah. Make it stop. "We took a turn and. We took a turn. Right of left. The side seemed tight, leaving enough. Enough space for. "One at a time. "I couldn't close my eyes, I had to be vigilant about my surrounding and where my mandible was at all time. Their scent itself, flagrant and swelling through the air, the figure, dark and bold, carrying those large hands, almost like a human but couldn't conclude anything more than their taunting. It noticed me standing and staring, that, with a slight move of the finger, refusing to twist it beyond one of the sirens, it activated it shamelessly. "Left, now. "I said and we each took individual lefts as we passed enough of them to have the space needed for such a command. I had to avoid falling down and waking up to another peculiar situation just like this one has felt like. The light body and feet under made me nimble, enough. "Enough. "To slightly stop but remember. "Bah, the sound is unerving, I didn't mean for you to stop. Gah. "I yelled at them, both angry and distracted, we had to go faster before we could get to the point of finding out the real meaning of those dormant objects in our every surrounding. I felt something too big and far despite that I shouldn't be able to. Yet I didn't choose, it was already chosen, the decision to not share with them. "Stop, all of you now. "In the most awkward break, we were almost ready to fall over, all of us looking in different directions. We all saw and watched over as the figures, dark both in number and act, moved around, trying to surround us, another siren ran. "Just. Stop. "I covered my ears, both annoyed and in pain, closer to us than anticipated, making that blasted cried up to the point of a full turn to face a different way. It was facing to the south, its many sisters unawakened by their cry. "We need to spread. Each of you takes a different direction and don't touch any. "They looked confused, perhaps they didn't hear me well enough. I shouted in their years. "We spread, now! Take a damn different direction!""But. . ""Don't shout girl, I can't stand another one of those by now and my ears are shaking harder than them and me. ""We can't spread, I can't abandon them. ""Listen, we need to get out. To be able to do so, we need to be alive. I can't take care and. "I was distracted, feeling that step and it stopped too. It changed position to take a turn and a break too from the constant commotion it was spreading. One alone as the other kept running around, many of them, perhaps less, I couldn't be sure, seeing how they reacted to our stops. I couldn't risk it anymore. "Move, differently or in groups of two. I'm not trusting you to be left alone, girl, stay with him. I'm coming with the silent one. ""Fine, but promise. . "She heard it too, some harder steps, I thought I heard something even farther away in the infinite hallway but just as one of them was about to start its wail. Its head was crushed by something, a hand, I felt it, too far to fully understand, it resonated with the others and almost stopped completely. The information not fully delivered, perhaps a divine intervention was given. "Now's the chance, come.

"I said and started moving in a different direction than them, both them and those crawling pests. A calculated choice only explained by a poor excuse, I knew he'd be silent enough to minimise the damage that went through my ears. "Stop again. "I saw, almost having the sight of the other group long gone, no wail and nothing in place. Something wasn't right and at the same time, something was approaching. Conflicting thoughts that left me blind in the middle of nowhere as it all looked the same. I couldn't believe what I was thinking, the blessing in disguise that was disabled, I needed it to find a way out. "We're just throwing ourselves aimlessly. "To be worse, the way below was unprovoked, unable to bounce and crash through. I bashed in with my foot, surprisingly strong as the cinders flew from the ground. "Twenty meters below, made only of cement, possibly. There's no other way for us but to. Stay sharp, they're coming. "The shades flew and in their split made circles, from the distance. The group, nowhere to be seen, from no point could they witness what we were dealing with, nor could they help us. "Stay close and remember, don't touch them. "Afraid, I walked, trading one direction for another, trying to see any way out. Three, four, even more than that, throwing nothing but an attempt, with their long fingers managing to reach the tip of our toes from great distances. The light flickering but only the one above, the one that used to slightly point at us. "We're watched, keep going, don't you stop until I tell you to do so boy. "He wasn't even daring, but he slipped. I turned around and watched in fear, the tremors finally disappearing. A small gap between stood between his fingers and a touch that would've triggered her. I landed a hand and grabbed whilst walking, giving no excuse nor a chance for them to run over us. "It's good, it's reset. "Though, I didn't know and wasn't sure for how long. "Wait, do you hear that too?"I asked, and he, quickly to answer got rash and touched one of them. "No!"I shouted before ducking down, with both of my hands over my ears, stuffing them to the point of breaking through my skull with them. Standing there for seconds before I managed to get up and see. It wasn't the only one doing so. "No sound but how could this be?"My body was making whirlwinds and couldn't stop at the sight of all of them, thousands of them, more than that. They all started turning without any sound nor notice. "They're not the ones moving, look below. "He pointed out what I couldn't see, I had to take a moment to regain my composure before managing to see what he was talking about. The ground shaking, the hall tilting again on its own weight, it wasn't them what was being moved but the ground under, round and distinct from the other portion of the whole terrain. "Quick, look there. "Again, he remained sharp whilst I was still dealing with the confusion and the blows previously dealt with me. "You're a brilliant boy, have I ever told you that?"Though not fully grasping, I was given the opportunity to see, by a child

nonetheless, his point of view, the sirens that we or they touched, they were left solid and. "There. We need to get away from that direction. "Despite not seeing in with my eyes, I heard another one being stopped from the constant turn, another head crushed under a hand, something other than those long ones. Even they seemed scared by what was approaching. "Wait, what about my friends?"The man seemed distracted and profoundly terrified as was I, but could they be right about him?Were they planning on leaving us?"We have to separate from them, we can't risk going after them. ""But they went in that direction, the one you're pointing from. We can't leave them to go there. "Slightly moving away, my hand was hit, the speed of their spins was getting ridiculous, almost the same as his strange proposal. "Go, kid, if you manage to find a way out before I do or. If you get into deep trouble, just yell at the top of your lungs and I'll be able to pinpoint your location. "He shook my hand after a small hop over the few centimetres between us. "All right. "And I shook my head, he turned me around as I did it and told me so. "Move that, the take a right after a fourth siren. Whatever you do, don't go directly from the source of sound coming from the smashed metal, do you understand?"Understood. Wait, but what if you'll find the exit before us?"I wasn't ready, nor could I risk getting abandoned again, not. "After everything that happened and what brought us to you?"I can't risk my life for everyone's problems. If I'll find the exit, I will yell, now I trust you to do the same. "He finally shook mine with no spat inside, we had to trust one another, hopefully from the glares traded we did. I watched him start walking, hoping he'd get to the point of being guided. "Wait, boy, behind. . "He didn't hear, he went too fast. One of them passed in front of me, behind his back, beyond my warning. "Of all the moments of your decision to reappear. "Again they started blazing through, trying to flank me from the sides. I couldn't move that fast anymore, they were so fast now, almost like screws getting removed, moving at a speed that left me not even a chance to place my hand over and take it back unharmed. "I ain't going to stop. "The spets getting heaveir, both my and the pest approaching, despite not being able to feel it. Something else came to mind. And its enormity was looming from beyond the hall we all stood in. That I could feel, as a faint. Something else surprised me, other than the fact that, as I kept going, none of them were into another state than refusal to harm me in any way possible. "Why are you here if not to harm me?"I shouted and saw them, getting so close yet far. In the trail and the small fingers that clapped after managing to get close, yet again to my feet. A small bell rang. "Again?"Almost like a wakeup call, yet uncalled for. I quickly remember, how could I forget?"Of all that happened, this one I wasn't going to forget at all. "I said it loud, to myself and them, it didn't happen long ago, though it changed the fear and confusion. I wondered if hearing the bell before brought me towards the very spot, wandering through this endless nightmare. "To come to a stop. "I needed to believe that I was able to turn back to the normality, just enough so I'd get a clear road towards him. And to abandon even my life If it came to it. "Where are you?"It wasn't far, I heard it, at my reach but not yet. Nothing stood in my way, nothing could unless. I heard it again and my proposition and thought continued, they were. Perhaps they were linked. Following those crawling fingers spread as three slender anchors to the ground, to avoid the sirens. Not even one slowed down, perhaps I had the time, even with my exhaustion, I followed the trail left behind, with my eyes to see and notice. Where they'd get, where they'd move, until I noticed a pattern. And where they were leading me. Towards the same place I've sent that boy towards, the point that was approaching, so dire that it made me think if it was coming directly for me and neither other. "I can't go there. "I said to them, hoping for an understanding, not know what to think of them, whenever they were, remaining as my foes or my friend, even with my lack of any.

They didn't give me any sign that they understood, nor did they touch or trip me as I walked, leaving me with the choice. "No, I refuse to do so. You either hand me the. The gate, that bell, or I'll find a way out by myself. "And even if it came to it, to abandon them, something that I had now come to terms of accepting it, regardless of what I tried and decided, it always came to it. I went to the opposite direction and heard the metal keep getting crushed. Looking back and seeing nothing from the constant motion that was disturbing the air and the image itself in the constant twirl. Before noticing, the turns and the twist, belonging to me that I haven't even thought of, not being focused on them myself. . I found myself in front of it. A weeping siren, standing unmoved. "You're. "It couldn't hear me, it was an object, my approach would've been insignificant, I thought whilst passing it, thought I understood. Reaching the point from far away, the point from which I was being driven from. We stopped then, or I did. With me, making me repeat the same thing after first coming it, scrolling around to see them active. "They switched spots. "I said, seeing it whilst still having my great removal, how, from not so afar, one took their places and started the solitary whirlwind. Amid annoyance as it produced sound, it threw it on sides as it bounced on others. Small fragments of sounds came from around, triggering others. At a low frequency, though I was afraid it would get worse as the others once did. Stricken of senses, I didn't lift myself from the ground. Seeing how it slightly helped, having to crawl my way and cover my ears, I was placed into an impairment position. Forced to be lowered than their dirty hands, to avoid the crippling sounds at all costs. They came now to form a blockade, still away, with a finger laid atop of another, I couldn't go forth, unable to jump nor climb the tight wall made in front. A right and no, the left was taken too. The wounds, clearly many in number laid all over my elbows after the constant pressure and forced impact over. The small breaks are taken to see felt divine, or almost that way if it weren't for the constant wails and the blocks. The flickering light and the bolts of sounds thrown around at no pace. I've taken the course given by them, have no choice, other than the peril of going back to face whatever was coming for me. "It's coming. "I said as I realised, unable to cover those violent noises with neither my voice nor my will. It was coming and at the direst of speed. Its enormity growling through the entire space it travelled through. And what would happen after?"I need to gain distance. "I said, again trying at the midst of it to cover some patches, but to my avail, it fails again. Moving, and taking care, slowly with the turns so I wouldn't touch them with my feet, in no way did I have the strength nor the bones to stand and walk on my knees. I'd get to falling apart, wailing at the sight, failing to move after. A blast could be heard from somewhere and it baffled me how. "How are we going to get out now?"Luckily that he found us, at the small point, deliberately place inside. Like a square for us to stay inside. "Oh, I remembered. He told us, he'd yell if he finds a way out. And we should to the same in return. ""Well, have you heard any of it then?"Neither have I Lucius, that's not important, I'm afraid we're in danger. Shh, lay down. "She saw something before us, approaching, overwhelming and heavy. Something that would well describe the feeling and the look she had in her eyes, a look that wasn't seen before. The desolation around made it hard for us to seek for hiding places and succeeding in not being seen. "What's that thing?"She whispered, her eyes changed, a small reflection in her eyes, something was bouncing over the ground and back on. We were standing so close, all three of us, that we should've been able to feel our breaths. I did feel his, going over my cheeks and not hers, she was holding it inside. Following with her eyes, it almost took the living colour out of her. We were almost lucky as the flickering light was slightly away, leaving our spot slightly darker too. "Can we turn?"I whispered, trying to find out, Lucius afraid too, after seeing her face, he didn't do it either. We waited for he to say anything but nothing did come. I asked her again, this time, her eyes circled through, enough to reach me and nod her head. She wasn't able to answer my question, truly afraid, not of what she saw. But. "What would happen if I turned?" I asked her another question but she violently shook her head after lifting it up. She covered my face with her hand for a second, then his. I told him after, doing my best to understand what she meant. "Hold your breath. "Even though it could've heard me, I followed her silent wish and kept it inside. I have shaken soon after. "Grl. "I had to cover my mouth, as, the fact that it came from nowhere scared me the most. I couldn't see who it was but something was smashed, making a cracking noise, followed by something soft being butchered inside, the type you'd hear in the kitchen. She switched, nervously, and I had no doubt, if we weren't standing, I'd get slapped. The steps that managed to reach the ground sounded like hooves, galloping over the land and watching us come over its territory. I removed my gag and whispered to her. "We need to go. "Not sure, if they would start again or even if. A second coming from the lack of awareness. I touched one of them after proposing what we should do. The answer came as it slowly activated. We saw it turn and heard the cracks, he heard it too no doubt as we got up and started running. "Don't take a break. "She said, running in a straight line with her, watching Lucius over, hearing dire sound behind. The ground almost crushed, others were smashed in the way, the sound echoed as the metal case after metal case being crushed. "Whatever you do, don't look behind. And spread, don't follow!" She ended with a shout, disregarding her own advice, looking behind to see and check, whatever she saw left he unhinged. I took a left to be sure, both farther away from him and her. All of were heading, I wasn't sure of what would. "We need to go. ""No. "I didn't want to but I interrupted her, my legs already hurt from all the running. Intentionally touching one of the passed ones, hopefully it would slow. Enough to gain some time to be spoken with her. "I can't lose you again. Both of you. "And this time. We were in danger of not finding each other after. They both stood near my left and right, running in straight lines. Not afraid because they haven't seen, I didn't wish for them a better fate if I had to. "Whatever you do, don't look back, understood?" I've taken a distant yet close look at both them and me. "Why?" My good friend Lucius asked, yet I wasn't going to. "When I tell you to do it, go to the right and never stop running in the direction until you find and exit. Same goes for you Jard, but the opposite direction. ""Wait, Camilla, don't do anything rash. "He was slowing down, both were, walking with limps, almost, but with no cranes in their hands. "Before it's too. ""Late. "We switched the last words but it was too late. It flew through, taking the metal and crushing it with its hands, it managed to reach and grab both her and him and stop immediately. I watched whilst running not able to stop nor help. "Nooooooooo" I shouted but it didn't help, with tears in my eyes and my throat sore, I kept bashing and hitting. Going in every direction. My heart was pounding but not as much as it was going to beat after. All those would be active when I'd be done. Screaming and yelling, almost getting sick of tasting the salt from the tears, I went in different directions, changed places and finally fell on both my knees. The couple of them standing around didn't stop turning near. I stood there unable to move. My feet were hurt, my eyes were hurt and my friends were. "Recycled. "I said after seeing my doll-like hands dance, just in a pond of the small pond made out of my tears, now a black substance. The reflection near, I saw through, looking back at me. Taller and more fearsome, it came from behind, after having everything before smashed. Both my friends seemed knocked down and left over the shoulder. And once again. Everything was silenced. "Gah, it finally stopped. "My elbows were hurt enough and I couldn't stand it. They abandoned me and started moving away, most likely in search of the place from which the crippling sound came from. Almost deaf in one ear, I felt it come, closer than ever. No sign for an exit and none of those children in sight, the way I was facing was left almost desecrated as those old sirens met their end after all this time. "Is it over then?" I asked, whoever could listen to me and whoever would care. I didn't hear anything anymore, no steps no children and no screaming sirens to disturb my call. All that remained. My body moved to face, the direction from which was coming, now that, close than enough, perhaps not as much as I wanted to. Though now, I could see it, in all the might, the light almost shining the place from which it was about to come. I wasn't able but now I saw, in all its might, the infinite above, a height unrivalled by anything I've ever seen. Even more so consolidated, and I had no idea why none of the depth above was used for. "Drops of water. "An amusing thought as I was left slightly thirsty. They were dropping from the ceiling, from a height so enormous that it wouldn't surprise me if we stood under another great lake. "The perfect setting for a storm" And all the sirens waited with me, all those who ran across and over me did not go too. On the side, still beyond, I saw it finally come. The impact was so great and couldn't come at a better time, I kindly thought to myself. I felt so much pain in my chest from it, everything felt as if it was trying to impale me through. But looking at it, safely from it, and just from inches. The magnitude of it, the broken tiles and singing finches that came through on its arrival. It destroyed, passed through as if it was cutting through butter or less, with no care nor any sign of stopping. Like a pendulum, it came back to me, destroying the walls of the confinement. It cut the blackest smoke array and wasn't even slow, the ship has settled to this next shore. First seconds went slow, I barely realised it, my ears were now deaf, probably from the ravished stone or metal, whatever was made of. It fell below as it was barely plunged, I couldn't see anything but the deck, remaining unharmed, the fire long extinguished. Though slightly damaged, it wasn't alone, I saw the parts being torn apart and flung on the sirens. All of them were active, no doubt scared of what was happening, forced to keep wailing with no sound. I watched and waited, looking carefully, as with everything going on so slowly, waiting to see. It happened faster than what I could see, yet he was nowhere to be seen, neither of them. Suddenly, I ducked, as the whole room tilted, almost broken in half from the falling chunks of stone, metal and rubble, close to the middle of the room, or at least a shallow side. I wasn't careful, though I should've been, whatever laid with me in the room, other than this upcoming attraction. I looked around, it was never to be seen. The ship sailed and I remembered, yelling, more into a shout, at the top of my lungs. "Nimble!" I couldn't remember, either the reason of me forgetting nor his name. The memory of him passing, it felt bitter, almost the same as the damage done to the entire room as it was crushed inside. The long bar that was once plunged, I couldn't see, but I was holding onto one of the sirens so I wouldn't fall off and find out. Strange, how we looked at each other, both confused, despite not being alive, it somehow brought something in me, holding onto her and not letting go. I had to look down as there was nowhere else to go, the ship and those chunks, laid waste and anchored on the ground. Small gusts of smoke, I should've known. "Damn it. "I changed my mind after seeing it, the mistake I've done came back. Still turning, I had to wait, to climb and to see any other path to take and when it came, I jumped onto the one that laid not so dormant anymore at the top of my head. Something not in mind. As looking back at it, the ship and everything else, it seemed to be its last top. Bigger parts of stone and metal fell from above, even bigger than the ship, uncalled and something I couldn't prevent, it was crushed and destroyed. Over my eyes, slightly distracting, the source of that dark gust finally gotten rid of. I was so shaken that I forgot to move, no progress was done to further myself from the falling debris. And it seemed to me, as the feeling started leaving my arm. "This is the end of my ride, isn't it?" Nobody heard me, no one cared at all, though. Their whisper felt. Unknown. "Malicious. You're called forth. "It whispered, one mouth, followed by the other, the siren spoke feastly and didn't spin like the others. Holding by my hand, it promised to protect and lead me away, as the room was following to be swallow away. "Oh, Malicious. We must. "Another spoke, waiting for an answer to be had. I looked around to see the other, and I saw none other do the same, other than the one that crawled on the tilted floor, their long fingers rotting the bottom of the floor to reach farther above. "Where are you taking me? And what about those children?" "They're safe. "I heard a whisper, no siren insight to be whispered from, which made me question what I heard. I should've focused but I didn't. I couldn't in the midst of the chaos, swallowing itself, suffocating on its own breath. "Fine, take me to it. "I said, daringly, out of place too, with no knowledge of them being or not part or in relations with. Though, it had to be done even before I managed to come and land in here. It started moving and others made it place, the once stable floor got ruined, with the falling parts of it joining in the rubble. So tight, holding to my hand as if it wasn't made of flesh and bone, no swear ran through but I could still feel something sodden standing between. I held no regrets and couldn't watch, nor did I know if it lied to me. "Where are you going?" I asked, before hearing its sharpen tongue, melted and its vibrant yet flustered voice, as if it went through multiple instruments, all rusted, coming from rotten voice chords. "Where you asked forth. Malicious one. "It called me that way and at this moment I didn't dare question in, in regard of not wanting to hear, the malicious voice run clear. It felt so strange, seeing how now parts of it started falling, the bronze, the dark metal was being shattered. Would I witness, could I avoid it? My other hand, and without the use of my legs, I started climbing over to avoid having my arm broken. Other parts started falling over, from different sides and near me, other sirens were crushed, even more soon. I thought to be deaf, but I heard her voice if it didn't end up being in my head at all. And then, I heard it again, we were getting closer. I asked her, without being sure. "Am I the only one hearing that bell rung?" "No, malicious one. Slayer of thee. "It said, with a grin voice, as more of its shell fell. There wasn't a doubt of my intention nor about my intention to question it but it was going too far. I had to know. What they contained, their metal prison, or so did I question before seeing it. "You're one of them. "I saw its malignant body pulsate and blow itself out of proportions, unable to grow nor do anything of the sort. And immediately after, looking below, a network of water drainage built under, they were being force fed, yet prevented from evolving. I couldn't see any mark, nor any side from which a pair of mouths could start, not membrane nor legs. Though carried away I almost ignored the most important factor, just as I attempted to remove myself from it. "You can speak. "And it could also respond. "Yes, malicious one. "And not only that, I was trapped, I had to be on my toes, not knowing until now that. At any point, it could snap. It showed no sign, though or resisting, of protesting my attempt, to remove my hand from the damp hole it was in. Without realising that it wasn't the hands that we were holding, the worst came to mind, despite not feeling it. The water could be drained from my body as it was on me. Everything around, slowly falling apart, even other shells of the sirens, with their part of the floor, they fell and got smashed with them all. "Malicious one. Stop resisting. "It said and despite doing my best, I hadn't had the strength nor the will to remove myself from it. "You won't bring me to it, damn liar. You'll pay for this, don't worry, if I get the change, I won't hesitate to bite whatever matter that brought you the ability to speak. ""You must be unbent. Just as we malicious one. "It kept calling me that way, whilst still attempting to get rid of the cage holding it, even with the strident turns taken, it failed to remove the other parts, other than the one facing me. Perhaps given to me as a way to end its existence it case it attempted to do the same with mine. The bell rang again and it seemed to me as if. "If you know the exit, we won't get there it time. "It didn't listen, doing nothing but dragging me towards the next falling block of stone that would crush both of us. There weren't any results from what I tried doing so far, making it seem impossible to reason. Whatever I said, did, attempted meant nothing to it, a testament to my dismissal. "Just let go of me, I'll find it myself. "But the siren was silent to me now, no malicious or anything of the sort, the name calling ended. The reins should've been somewhere, I was so sure. "Bah. "My breath slightly was taken as something almost crush. Several sirens barely fell near us, scarping the sides and taken them on the way down. My hand still was taken by it and locked under it, thought its shell was still decaying. "That's it. "I yelled, risking everything, plunging my hand, through its soft skin. After so many years of having it imprisoned, forced into a metal wall, weakened it past a redemption. Making me pass through, lifting my hand just to ascent it towards where its brain should be. And making it say. "Ye, malicious one, slayer of thee. Be gone off me now. "I didn't answer as it did to me until I managed to see and feel. The room still shattering, many falling to their doom, the entire chamber was about to fall into the drain and drown the entire place whilst falling. "I'm done with listening to you. "And then as I said it, words came forth before making my discovery, they felt like strings, almost pulverised, dissipated after my simple touch. It screamed but I couldn't hear, not in its entirety. "That won't work on me now. "It was shaken and my hand felt softer too, about to be released. Perhaps if I continued doing it. Another string that was followed by more, to be taken, I knew they would lead to something, not knowing yet to what. "How dare yee. "And it didn't say, whatever was crushed before stored the word spoken like that. I had to be careful so it wouldn't drop me, to become a mindless beast. "Just a little deeper. "I said to it and myself as I reached more and more into it, shoving my hand just to feel. "So this is what it lead up to, all those string and information stored. I squeezed it and made it stop, releasing my hand and almost being left to drop. "Aaaaaaagh. "I said unexpectedly as I watched below, seeing the stone break and the land under their weight. I should've known and cared, leave alone only at the mercy of what I was holding on, the small and oily organ, breeder of the strings that were filled. So shoved inside and stuck there, it acted as its skull, breeder of thoughts and anchor for my hand. "Another. "I said whilst seeing it approach, it left a place and felt welcoming, as mine was broken and ready to let go. Whilst holding tight, I slowly lowered and started swinging, before it was too late, I managed to jump and grasp onto the other just in time. With both my hands and will, I held as it started turning. "This is better. "It left me space and the invite to stand on it instead of being held, it recognised, as it saw its fellow siren fall, but before. A small organ, oily and stringless fell from where its head should've been. The rest of the metal crushed on itself and it started to decompose. "Come on, move faster. "I said whilst using it, seeing an array of dark smoke and water coming from below. And then a third time, the bell rang, this time calling for me, beyond their silence and shock. I couldn't wait and dared to question what I saw. A stair of them, the ones that stood. In the time, I jumped and managed to barely grab and hold onto another one of them and the one before was crushed seconds before I landed. The ceiling, far above, almost lost too in the infinity of the place, the lights were long gone and I could almost clearly see. Its body with no shell, repulsing and enormous and I realised too, why the bell, as it called to me. "Fine, I'll come to you now. "I yelled, knowing how it would hear me, despite being so far, it should've had knowledge of its realm. "Keep turning. "I commanded and it responded with the silence. "Yes, malicious one. "Something that I slightly missed after the death of the last one, the first of many. "Keep going, It's not safe yet to make the jump. "I informed and kept watching, trying to predict, from which place and where the next one would fall. Everything in motion, everything in a shift, collapsing on its own and there was no doubt now. That everything was controlled, or at least the ship, the trigger that started. "The shattering stone. "I jumped and managed to avoid another of them, they were getting harder to avoid, as it got close to crushing my leg, making me unable to move. "We're lifting up, there must be another way out. Tell me, in that little mind of yours and that stored information, is there another way out written inside?"I asked and didn't expect for an answer. Yet something was written, I was sure. "Yes, Malicious one. Yee, need to. "And it couldn't finish, a faster rock came by and plunged itself into the body above, crushing whatever remained. My fingers touched and not lightly, I felt the pain as the rock was set onto it, pushing it to do as was I. "Damn it. "I said, doing my best to take them back, avoiding the rising dust filled with smoke particles, that cemetery of the damned. "Would you. Just. Let go!"My hand was stuck between. And there wasn't any way to get it out, just one as the other was free. "I can't get out. "I flailed and tried pushing with both my legs and my hand, forcing it and risking to fall before it. With no choice, either to be crushed under or wait for the fall. I yelled as we were both slowly pulled down, pushed under the heaviness of what was happening. "Why are you forcing me to remember?"I shouted, asking without being able nor sure if it could hear me. My legs, the bones felt like breaking as I forced them into the black bronze. With no way out, I did something worse. Driven by it. "Fine, if you won't let go of me, then have it. "Instead, I pushed even harder, though with no intention to get out anymore. Just my legs alone on that, my hand was grabbing, a shard fell. "So this is what must be done. "It came in time, brought from above, slightly distracted, I saw inside, the reflection. "It's me. "The cold air felt so sharp yet in such a way that it didn't even get to blur the shard. "Trying to catch him. "And failing to do so, seeing from another perspective. Once again, failing to catch the cable. I was confused again, unable to figure out, why the memory was returned. The bell inside my ear felt even louder than before and ever. The entirety of the place felt like it was moments from falling under its own weight, despite my every attempt. To prevent it and prevent me from it. "The bell?"We slowed down, just towards the place of its fall. I closed my eyes expecting nothing else to happen. The shards, it was whispering, what I said, what she said, what he said after. The last recorded memory of him pushed itself harder into my skin, I couldn't see any blood coming out. I dropped it like the rest of everything as I felt my lungs suddenly be lifted and filled with gas. "Gah. Gah"I coughed, being left alone with a ringing noise inside my ears. "No. "I opened my eyes and spat it all out. A hand came forth and grabbed me, pulling me back. Blood and tears came out of my throats and the only way I could look was down. My hand slit, it fell like the rest of them, the pain was the least. The other one had a big slit from the sides and I watched, the cemetery made of all the sirens, all wailing for one last time before they succumbed to their end. My waist held, looking as if whatever was holding onto me was specifically made for it, mending and such of myself. So much blood lost and I felt as if the world's weight took much more than a simple toll from me. Everything swallowed, every further. From the broken shores below came a vortex made of wind and water, the rest of the platform bending at the will. The rest started sinking soon after, the water now black, drowning them in the abyss. Under us, my belief is shaken, that we'd get the chance to get out. One of the fingers, too much pressure, it shattered into dust by the part that held it attached to the rest of the hand. I saw it fall and drown with the rest of them. There wasn't any way out, I told myself that before, yet I couldn't grasp it until now. With my hand broken and the second one following soon after. I was hanging at the thread of a hand before. Before I couldn't even speak anymore, hitting myself and bouncing even harder. The hit to the stomach as I fell onto another siren made me sick. Even sicker after seeing everything around from the distance. As I fell down and didn't, couldn't reach for anything to hold onto. Back into the smoke and water, I came, diving deep with nothing to cover my eyes. Nor could I see very well, being pulled down despite my senseless attempt to resist the current. No stone and no metal, I couldn't feel any object, to touch or attempt to hold onto. I wasn't sure if I couldn't hold my breath any longer, after seeing the one hand left extending before it got removed from the rest of the body, whoever wanting to help me. It was long gone. My air, the one held into my lungs was getting begrimed, as the dark bubbles coming out joined the rest. The dark sea didn't give me anything to grab on. Yet thrust by the current, I was plunged into the broken ship. A sole cabin, floating and being pulled, I held onto so I wouldn't be solitary. In the reflection, despite being dark, I saw my reflection and I didn't like it. A broken face of a broken man, less than a human that wasn't me. I once saw blisters and skin but now they disappeared, there was nothing that resembled that, not even close. Yet, even with me accepting that, what I've become and what I was forced into. I couldn't stop it, the water from coming in, air leaving my lungs. My senseless flail and anger came, I hit the part of the boat with the arm with no hand and felt meaningless pain as if it would count now. The end or not, I felt misery, something that in a long time, I forgot what it felt like. In that moment I felt, heard a heartbeat. Without thinking, I tried looking around, with my instincts taking over, nothing was there. Water kept coming into my lungs and I was almost distracted as I thought and figured it out. Those heartbeats were mine. I let go without being able to keep on anymore. Something spanned across the land. The manner was silent. People were starting to feel fine, including the manner we were in. It seemed like a bad dream, seeing everything burn and everyone go mad. And all of the sudden, it stopped. The sound of people laughing, life suddenly springing back, even the land following it. We were replenished. Even beyond, the sky and the stars were just as alive as us.

"Are you going to stay out there and write all day? It's a beautiful day to be had. "He didn't understand what my reason was, nor what happened. I told him to wait. "In a minute now. ""All right. "The last things that had to be written, in the small notebook I've created. And in the end, I wondered, what happened to the liberator. Coming from somewhere beyond us, none asked him for help. I had the pleasure to meet and set his path straight and then he left. With no point and no intent to meet and know us, he had his path straightened and kept hidden, not revealing who he was nor what he intended to do after. His life, his everything now a mystery. "Are you done now?" "I think I am. "Though, I couldn't finish writing, leaving the note by the tree, what was left of it anyway. "Hurry up. "A natural disaster happened somewhere else, though rebuilding started after. Men and women alike, building and bringing back. "Shame it had to be done. "Though the land had known of fear and distorted, everywhere as it felt to be shattered. A palace built of stone and gold, being mended by bronze and sewn. I found my place back home and it felt as if nothing happened. "Father!" I yelled as I saw him, though I couldn't run to land him a proper greeting. Both my parents were closing by, as my parents watched. "Camilla. "They both yelled, gloriously as they rushed through, seeing how tears came straightened to my eyes. "I knew you were fine. "A shock to both them and me. Though as I hugged them, I couldn't shake the bleak feeling they gave to me after. Nor could I explain to me nor to my friends

how we managed to get back home. Past them and their hug was given, the machine placed, in the middle of the room to be rebuilt, though. Nothing has happened to it. I turned around and watched the wrecked gate. "Honey, where are you going?" I told them not to follow, I wanted to see for myself, what laid forth beyond what was left of the once wall of smoke. They both wanted to join me, despite my dismissals. Yet. "How about we each go into a different direction?" I proposed, with a slight sign of disgust. "Like the last time?" Jard had a scared look on his face and I wasn't sure what he saw through. "One way or another, we'll have to find the truth about this world of ours. "He sounded so silly, ever since he started talking. Even with his lavished suit, clean and. At the same time dirty. "I think I'll stay. If you don't wish for me to follow. "He said with no intent to come further. "Why?" She asked, not knowing why it happened all of the sudden. Though her scream, both of theirs was still in my mind every time they've spoken. I've seen more than them and still thought, what lead them to the decision of leaving. "Well, someone need to take care of them right? After all, none of them saw anything of what we've seen. "It made them both grin, a sad one. He left in a direction and so did she, without saying anything to me. And to me, it felt as if. "Everything might just come back to normal. "To them, it felt like reality was copied, which I had nothing against. And further away, past the blocked road, mightier in the air. A city left unattended and untouched by anything that occurred. High an innocent, hanging by the many built hands from above, the mouths from which they came from still open. The clouds were breath and still standing near them, just passing by the platforms they were on. None of the above was broken, nor shattered, nor did it have any thought of having the water fall over it. The black smoke, achieving its purpose was long gone before it even managed to get close. Far beyond whatever laid inside. Just as the glowing ones decided to come back to their grounds. The path still twisted, another passer having just reached beyond the maze, with a singing box being held in his hands. So far. Yet something was pulled, before it managed to see what was laid outside. It breathes air, pumping the lungs long forth, the water dissipating from them and dying away. Pulled with one arm, still working, so were the eyes, the heart and everything else. An insight received but for far enough. "No. "I yelled, almost getting my lungs full of water. Receiving the boost, as the choice being done. I wouldn't just choose to become a watcher forth what everyone else has done. Struggling beyond the broken deck, the parts of the ship, I saw an opening through the wall, draining away. Not enough to get out but to get some air, I swam and dared to push the limits beyond. The turns, the leaps, the working lungs pushed me farther away. No more sounds, my ears were already ringing from the water that managed to find its way through and come inside even more. "Blaaaarg. "I couldn't speak, the water was still sinking in, the second chance ready to be laid to waste, I kept swimming, whilst seeing only parts of what happened beyond, or at least what I thought I saw. Life close to being extinguished, dying with the last remnants of the smoke that entered my lungs. Driven by the currents, yet fighting back, I was struck directly into the hole of the cell, managing to only keep my head outside. Barely above the stream of water, I breathe again. My lungs filled with air, a never-ending grasp came soon after, taking as much as it could inside to never let go. My eyes were red and my throat still sinking, the stream that fell outside didn't seem as if it would end that way. The bars were rusted from the water and I couldn't look below. Barely holding myself with one hand, hoping to see something in the air. Both my mouth and nose were shaking as was I, the cold and being so close to having it drown. A bleak sensation to be had, spitting out the water only to see it fall away over my eyes and forehead. Accompanied by blood that came out, I was left wordless from anything to be said. The pain I felt through my hand was nothing over what I felt sinking in. The water pushed me into a direction, stopping from the long pull towards the bottom. Too tight, the bars held it from leaving an escape, I could merely just feel their every surrounding with the tip of my arm. A day, something that I've not seen in a while, being stuck in what seemed to be a tower from what I could see but nowhere near the bottom and the rest of the land. I waited there, in my own side of the tower, watching the clouds pass and hoping not rain. Before I could even lay my eyes even more onto the flying small blimps filled with candles. Something came from behind and immediately wrapped itself around my waist. I couldn't see without plunging my face back into the stream, I couldn't stand another swim. I couldn't see anything, I was too busy draining as much air as I couldn't. The wrap tightened itself over and held me like that I would not get, here again, the burning sensation through my nose, feeling it get farther. Bashing, with my arm, whatever part was, despite being hurt and steadily even more damaged as my entire body soaked inside the dark sea. Nonetheless of what was happening, I kept myself above, to breath. Even faster as I realised, it slowly tried pulling me down with the rest of them. With my legs, I couldn't wrap them around the bars so I kicked with them, the body of water behind. I wouldn't let go, regardless of what it tried, no matter how tight it pulled or forced the air to go away from my lungs. Panic rushed through me with the sudden fluctuations caused by the anchored one, the drops of water that found their way inside my nose and mouth made me sick. I was forcibly pushing the air, after feeling it almost drag me away. There was no way to resist and I knew that with the strength of the current, there wasn't another way for me to come back after it dragged me there. A deep breath, the last one, I had to reach the bottom at all cost, whatever and wherever the drainage had to be. A chance that wouldn't be lost. I felt his hand start shattering, the pull he tried didn't make sense either, his attempt, the desperation he had. Even if it failed, my arms were getting tired, so was I of trying. At the same time, as I finally took all the air I could muster, his hand shattered, broken by the tide, we both let go and started being dragged. In the vortex, in different directions, I didn't know, even harder to see, not from the lack of a light to reveal but of all the rubble and broken parts flying everywhere. I kept swimming, there was no way up, instead focusing everything on going below towards where and what called us. I could hear again after so long, though barely and only whispers. All their, their dying breaths calling me as I kept swimming. Nowhere, they were nowhere on the sides, I could see none yet I could hear them call me. "Malicious one. "Taker of lives. The contact it had with my body left nothing to be had in case I managed to get out. With of hand and the other barely pushing me farther, I avoided, however, I could and got smashed into objects as I went. None touched, only scraped me as I went with the current, pushing a quarter of a breath at a time. I couldn't look anymore, my eyes being hurt by the fragments coming into my eyes. I was to be guided only by the current, feeling the repercussions as I kept going. Pulled down by whatever could and dragged me for a short time before their hand shattered. I felt hopeless, going through a dark place, not being able to see. Yet. As the last fragments of air seemed to run out of air again. Off the side something was broken, the wall ravished, I felt it through and through as I was pulled and thrown outside by the merely formed waterfall. I opened my eyes and saw my escape, it seemed to leave to a larger pond, to life, flourishing, only for seconds I saw before being stopped. Grabbed again by the hand, my fall was stopped. With my lungs unfilled, with enough space to breath and vocal cords active. I yelled at it. "Let go of me. "He had taken my hand at kept at the broken side of the tower, preventing my escape. With the disfigured face and wretched holes instead of eyes, its olive skin, leaving nothing but more water to fall over from them. "I've paid for what I've done, let go of me already. I won't become a servant of your master!"The shouting didn't work, I knew his hands wouldn't do either, none of them seemed to be like that. They wanted to grab me down and die, I knew he wanted too, especially as being one of them, seeing how one of his other arms was missing, it attempted to do it too. "Your hand will shatter, it's pointless to try. "My snort came out and the water drops that landed aside, he couldn't speak, his tongue was taken. My every attempt to reason with him has lonely failed. "Just end your suffering already like the rest of them and let go already. "It was pointless and how could he not understand, his bony fingers, I could see how they were starting to slip away, the skin and membrane sliding from there. "That's it, not for long. "It was going to be followed by a long fall and I couldn't wait, instead of trying to escape, I held tighter too. With both my legs against the wall, I pushed and threw both of us over the edge towards the big fall. "AAAAAAAh"I yelled, being thrown against all sides, having water push us both, he still held onto me and dragged me down, being heavier that I was. His body slim, I couldn't see what he was wearing. It wasn't long till we both fell inside the pond, finally getting realised though not from him. Despite being shackled, I managed to get to the edge of the land and finally find hard ground to rest on. A hand that was extended was followed by his body that still laid in water. I was standing on my back, having long since needed and deserved a rest, though he did not let me. "Let go of me already, it's over. "His body lifted itself, his hand still gripping, he had no way to hurt me, nor drag me over. "It's over already, just look around. "It wasn't a concern anymore, getting distracted from his persona, above us. "The tower, it's about to fall. "I said to him before starting the sprint. "Come on already. "There wasn't anything else that had to be added, with him or without, no care about how much the grip or what was holding him together, I ran way with him, dragging the extra weight. The mighty fell and I couldn't look behind anymore without interrupting. Yet with every step, with every sign of life that I felt, still pure, seemingly untouched as if no one has ever passed through, I crushed under my leg. The dust couldn't be felt and the remaining day was thrown at my feet, crushing everything under. I knew, I saw how tall that tower was and knowing so that I couldn't make a daring stop. "At least you could stop making it harder for me!"I shouted, not knowing what I said out loud and what left my mouth full of dirt. The feeling the heavy attachment that refused to let go and delay my escape made its way up to becoming obnoxious. "We need to run astray!"I continued, as I started walking in a different direction, doing my best to stay away from a straight line. The ravished wildlife around died upon my touch, the propelled dust particles went straight through the grass and the plants as if they were projectiles. My legs were fine, without knowing why I thought of being its fault, blocking and misdirecting the remaining ones that would've hit me. A wave of water, it blew already, having it manage to reach my feet and their level. A bigger one on the way and judging by the side and level, it was coming up soon. He felt so light as we both kept going, almost like a kite with a lack of flight, yet the hand with those longs fingers that extended to the soil, now swamp, it ploughed right through it. I looked back and stopped. As were the remains of the broken tower. We both did, standing there. Past him were the remains of the tower, destroyed parts and some of the sirens standing there in the black water, tying them together. The wind finally settled, leaving nothing but a grim image as the once running gust of wind and water froze solid into chunks. I sat, almost down and started vomiting. Feeling how it forced itself out of my lungs, covered in blood, lumps of them, disgustingly covered in red. Absorbed away, past the disfigured barely achieved companion, I look closely at the escaped prison. The would've been a tomb of mine. And laughed. "Ahahahahaha"And barely couldn't stop. I couldn't believe it. "Finally,

I've beaten it, everything. "I realised, with no one to force me to get rid of those parasitic, with those lumps out of my body, seeming too good to be real, I had no care of that sort. "Can you believe it either? I've just received a free pass now, to search and warn. "But I stopped. Looking down, following my realisation. Not realising how much has passed, the trip, the many times being going away since we've met. So glad to be alive, it got close to distracting me. So did the vision granted whilst getting close to drowning. "He left, hasn't he?" A long time ago too. The hand that kept itself tied, shattered, its remains finally releasing my hand. His body remained dismembered, only to stay and stare as he had no tongue to speak. "You've gone through a lot too, haven't you? But so did I and now. Now. . Now. . "Now I didn't know anything. I wasn't being lead towards my disciple, of getting anywhere, the path that should've lead me stopped. "The way up, it's blocked now, isn't it?" He turned around his body frail but with a small hunchback, scorned by the water with small lumps having grown on it. "I thought so too. "The way down would've just encased and killed me in seconds to spare. "It wanted to get rid of me once I did its dirty work, didn't it?" Though it failed, not entirely, leaving us stranded in the middle of nowhere. "Come on, let's not waste any more time here. "I called for a pursued and it decided to heed my call. I grabbed his hand, surpassingly light to carry, having something to deconstruct as we went. Such strange appearance and it couldn't talk, I was already used to it by now. With dirty robes, broken bones, bloody rags, I was still going on somehow. "You don't mind if I'll take this, do you? Thought so. "I kept going, my body feeling less human by the second, perhaps the reason why I refused to judge and look at it different, I had no way of knowing if I was much more different than it by now. My hand was broken and removed just like he had, how long was it until. Until, I wondered, when I was on the road of becoming just like him, in appearance and. A sound. "What is this?" Something came out of his hand, the palm. I set aside the fingers that were covering it, just as he decided to lay on a near trunk, over a pair of singing trees. No instance could be spent on listening to it as something else had my attention set on it. So close, they resonated to one another, the hand with the body. Yet, I uncovered what laid on the palm, a few holes, quite deep in nature, yet not as deep as where his eyes should've been. They weren't corresponding, its anatomy was strange, yet I heard it again. Buzzing through the holed. I knew that the normality and any sane mind would've asked me to. To not do it. I placed it to my ears nonetheless and heard something. Sounds that I thought came from there but they didn't. It came from him, standing there, a voice, slowly forming. Unintelligible at first but coming to be. I saw some, managing to notice as my focus was on the hand, it extended below and found itself a way into the earth, not knowing how deep it went through or to what purpose was it made for. "Glughu Arrath Nkku "I heard, I noticed every pronunciation, quickly on my toes to hear more, still, no language that I held to my knowledge, nor something that I could hold near a candle and read it. "What are you trying to say? I can't understand your language and I doubt that you understand mine, right?" Or am I wrong?" "Hello, can you hear me?" A voice came out, one of a child. I looked petrified at the decomposing body with a strange voice, was it? Was it really a child? Are you. . "But stopped, it spoke before I could. "Into the holes please" He said it and I was too distracted to understand at first, having to wait for my attention to be taken again from him. "Would you mind speaking through the holes in the hand?" He asked and I had to present my, please. "Yeah. Sorry. "I looked down as I was saying, my vision being transitioned, split in half. The holes set lit and I finally saw the texture. They weren't covered in skin nor made of bone, clearly, I saw through that guise. It was made, no, it belong. It seemed as if the long hand was only one belonging to the three-headed system that brought me here, yet the connection that was held wasn't really clear. Other than proving a way to communicate. I've spoken to it and it heard me after, as simple as it seemed, I had a hard time speaking through, after hearing the voice. "Who are you. ""Oh, you don't recognise me by now? You seemed to know everything before, having made your way through with a clear goal in mind. "It spoke so softly and fluent yet there was no tongue, there was no move of the lips, nor teeth to balance it out. The lack of vocal chords was clear and it seemed to me, just as its hand was a way to communicate through for me, his body acted the same way for it. "Who are you? You're not a child, you're not him. ""What was his name again?" I didn't respond, nor did I heed to the taunts given. "Just tell me who you are and what do you want from me. "The grip grew tighter, just like before, yet I was the one holding it, a strange turn of events. Yet, as I kept circling it, I question the very thing I said to myself. Want from me. Having to do the dirty tasks given, those parasites landing me through. "You're a celestial, aren't you. "Annoyed by my, seemingly to it, a remark despite not being intended to seem that way, it surged back at me. "Don't call me that name, an antique. Disgusting and wretched. You don't even know what you said. ""What did I say wrong? That's how the other made me, I thought that's what you were all called. "A silence came as if a ponder had been given, I had no prior knowledge apparently as I was about to question some of what was said to me before. The voice shifted back to unintelligible and it continued saying those strange words. Stubborn, I should've known, nothing more to expect from such a thing like it was. I pulled it out of the ground and made no attempt to look back. The body was left to rot there and feed the already ravished soil, to whatever purpose could it be helpful in replenishing it. I carried the hand with me, deciding to keep it as a reminder. Though not needing it anymore, I knew too well, those. "Aren't could. "Spoken into the hand, without being able to know or tell if I was heard with no connection to the ground. "The sky is made by you, I know it. "As I kept walking, past the corruption that was spread through the ground, the black and blue, ravished soil and wood became a lustful green with wet grass despite no rain. I stopped to remember myself, the reason it all ran like that. But before I could understand, I was distracted again, but for what purpose? Another one of them, with no hands either, standing there, not so far. Shaken as it saw me, trying to pull me over. I looked behind despite my previous attempt and it was still there. "What the?" Two of them, almost in the same state as before, I didn't turn back though and pleased its invitation to be. "What do you want?" Spoken again as I waited for an answer, is still told me nothing of the sort. Other than the broken sounds that came out. I yelled again. "Tell me what do you want?" And it silenced me with another question, ignoring any part or any attempt for a reconciliation. "What do you want?" Asked back, as if it'd grant me a request, some water coming out of the broken body's mouth, clearing the throat and the slimy malfunction. I did not know, I wasn't sure, was it me or not who spoke back to me?" What did you say? Repeat what you said again. Bah. "Close to shouting, I dared restrain myself from that, with no thought of hurting it anymore. With a kick to it, I was sure. It wasn't dead, I could still see a small part of his belly moving, yet the mouth was stuck, almost drown on land. "There must be another one. "A look on the sides and managed to see a road leading to the lushful place I was left in. "Could it be?" Back at the hand, despite the way it could communicate back to me not working. "If you could grant me anything, any favour of any sort. For everything, I was in, for the trouble. "I came to be and kept going, desperately searching for another one left behind. The road was inviting but in no way would it leave one of them inside like that, abandoned to be broken there. Broken plants, I ravished small tents of grass, I couldn't see anything behind. Yet I continued, even if I wasn't sure of it, of what would happen. I knew it heard me now, it had to. "For everything I've done for you, to get rid of any of the chores and impurities. I've done even more without getting asked for. I need only one thing. "Too much gone and this was my chance, to make my voice heard to it, the only chance I would get. The only one that mattered now. For me anyway. "If you could only send him back if you haven't. I promise I'll spend however I've got left getting rid of the pestilence that haunts you. I need to know, I've never been so unsure in my life. "Careful before saying, I left it enough time to plug itself to the ground or at least appear as if to me. "Or else my life's work, everything I've done so far. Everything may have been in vain otherwise. You can't let that happen!" I yelled, full of rage despite the fact I should've have acted that sort of way. "There. "I noticed, barely hid inside, fallen on the side from the stump it was set on before. I ripped and fell. "No. "I looked in shock after falling over. I look above the broken hand. "No!" I yelled at the shattered pieces of the hand, they all lined apart. I was left on my knees, with those pieces falling over from the remains that were being held in my hands. Slowly, I got up, after throwing it away with the rest. Approaching it seemed pointless but I turned the fallen head to see. "You're broken too, aren't you?" The head was shattered, someone was here before of me. I left out a sigh before taking away. I was looking down the whole way, looking at nothing but the stubborn road. Everything seemed dragged away and I wasn't entirely sure why that happened. But then, someone unexpectedly came. A carriage came from behind, not entirely unexpected as I was able to hear the sounds of the horse and wooden wheels hit the ground. The lantern just barely above, the man driving the carriage with his white beard, dressed just as such. Elegant for such a person. It stopped just not far from me but I didn't pay much attention, despite this being the first animal I could remember seeing in a long time. The door opened, just ahead. I walked to it as I waited. I grabbed it after getting closer and as it was, my eyes widened and I wasn't able to stop the banter. "You?" I asked before seeing the invitation to come and join. On the other side, a pair of bones were waiting too, just with enough space for another person to sit. "Heh. "I chuckled at the sight before deciding to join the ride. Despite my questions remaining unanswered and with my plea. I was left to explore whatever is to be.

Dyotoromus

'It's been a while since the last time I've spoken of this. Time has a habit of following what I do. I'd even wager it developed a liking into it. Though you may need to excuse my banter, for I have longed for that too, in the long time left behind, since the last time, you see. But, then again, I dare not waste your time, nor mine, you didn't come here to hear me blabber and cry about unforeseen things and silly adventures in my grandfather's old yard. You've come here to ask me about.' A burst came from the kitchen, the steam left quite an impact on them, the timing was just right to soothe the air and take a peek at their curiosity some more. 'You've come here.' The voice said as he was on his way to stop the fire, but mid-way, at a hinge he stopped. To hear about the celestials. 'And so were the three agents, wearing their garments and dark clothes, following in the footsteps, just enough to not intrude, and asked. 'So you can confirm you know about their existence?' One of them asked, making sure he was aligned, a wall that blocked the space where a door should've been, making sure there'd be no escape, from within. 'I know more than that.' A flicker then followed and the fire was gone. There was no grain left on the man's face as he knew too much already. Too soon. His thoughts were still trying to figure them out, he hadn't been sure if he could trust them yet. 'And what more would you be willing to share?' 'Hopefully, The Great Argus, was it? Well, Argus, we do hope you won't decide to hide this knowledge from us. Else, quite frankly, we'd be more than disappointed, wouldn't we?' They all had their buttons unclogged and under their fashioned leather of utmost veiled dark, revealed the sharp hooked tendons. Such an application was quite unseen, even rare, though it was a conceived weapon after all, deadly, untraceable and Argus knew that one scratch at the tip would be more than enough to leave him paralysed. They must be quite old if they retained such pieces attached, though. Despite pretending to stop the fire and momentarily tend to the tea, he reminded himself of the most important thing. None of them was immune to their own venom. And, it was quite the surprise that, out of all people who could possibly come, they were the first to come through the door. The visit was due to an end and they have already revealed their stings. None of them managed to avoid, nor have they detected, though Argus turned and threw the overboiled tea at which they were standing too close to be able to avoid such a strike. The gag reflex followed as the shock made two of them sting themselves and fall on the ground, with severe burns and foaming in the mouth. Which left the only agent shaking on the ground, in pain. 'Noo.' It was no scream but it was sudden, so sudden that it made Argus stopped. As he was left there on the ground, seeing his fellow companion foaming from his mouth in front of him, trying to fight the toxin. He dragged himself farther away, unable to run from the pain. This is when he stepped and took no break. Which is exactly what made him smash his knee with the still simmering hit teakettle, just to be sure he'd be no threat to him anymore. This way he'd not run away nor could he get close enough to reveal the sting. Shouts diminished as Argus said. 'If you don't close your mouth, I will take your other knee.' It was a serious tone and he could see that the man wasn't messing around. Further away than where he stood, someone was entertained, witnessing the events go on. The agent was broken there, both physically and psychologically. Oh, what did they expect? Argus thought, though his curiosity peaked. How did they survive for so long? Most of them should've been abandoned a long time ago. 'And yet you're still here. In three exemplars to be more precise. Why is that? That such antiquities such as yourselves are here in this time and age? And how come you have heard of my research? Answer me or I will not hold back this time.' The agent just stood there and said no word, he waited for Argus to do something worth of a spell. Just.. Closer. Come, come. In reach. The eyes were flickering with rage, though he showed no emotion, nor any sign any more of feeling the pain. The broken knee was still twitching for seconds, then it stopped. 'Don't try anything funny or I will breathe your other leg.' Argus observed at first, waiting for an answer, knowing that by now, the toxic was already spread inside their bodies, leaving them as nothing more than shells. I need an answer fast, then to get out. 'Say something man, I've killed two of your friend and I'm about to kill you.' He smiled, after seeing Argus suddenly burst in anger. 'They were not my friend.' The speech could barely come out, as the lower lip was slightly melted, the pain caused must've been too much to take. Yet, even with that, he didn't show any sign of pain. He's planning something, I'm sure of it. Though. Argus grew impatient and approached, it was a sudden mistake, only that he heard. 'Come closer and I'll reveal everything.' And so he started approaching, only because he saw him stand on the arm with had the sting. Surely he couldn't attack me from such a position, no leg to stand on, and barely holding himself after seeing them die. Though, mid-way bent and the agent threw himself at him, stretching his arm close to being in an arc, aiming the sting at him, with nothing more than an open chance. Which he took, as Argus was not a fool. Annoyed, his right hand, stronger and faster than a desperate attempt grabbed the elbow, preventing the man from jumping ahead. For a few seconds he stood there, gazing at one another, and now he saw fear. Which he did not feel the pain that came from the boiled tea, it came now from him. Slow breaths, Argus felt them reach him. Slowly he did too, starting to squeeze the elbow, which was slightly more soft. 'Aaaagh. Aaagh.' There it is, finally, I see that I have reached it. The venom was oozing in front of his eyes, as well as the pain. Formerly, there was no intention to make him suffer, not for a torture. 'You gave me no choice.' Clear, as his life's blood, was being drained. Far away, he was entertained. 'You won't last long now. I can see that you can't move your other arm, nor your legs anymore.' Argus acted smart and pointed the oozing venom towards the side so he'd not get touched. Not only did he know that he'd be infected that way, though also he knew that the body would grow pale and he would die if it were for him to continue squeezing. 'Please, stop this.' 'How did you know about my research?' 'It's not yours. Thief.' So he knew. He knew of everything Argus had stolen, hence why they were sent there. 'Do you also know?' Argus realised what needn't be asked. They must've found my threatening letters. 'How many others know what I've done?' 'How many do you think?' You can never, escape. Argus. 'Damn this man, I must know. Have any of the copies I've made even got to anyone then? I must escape and deliver them myself, it seems. Seeing too how uncooperative he was, Argus suddenly twisted the below, which was by now incredibly soft, at a rate which made the bone and muscle anathema to the extent of being easily broken, as well as the spine, in the small chain reaction that occurred. 'It seems that not even your poison is effective anymore.' Bah, he died before he even heard. Though I mustn't banter, there are much more, most likely on their way now. Luckily for Argus, the suitcase was already there, right under the table, hidden from sight. 'I wish I could save you too.' The copies, the copies, of the many copies hidden under the boards, under every corner, under bricks and bones, under which the foundation of the house was made. He left the stove on and threw the remaining oil he had in there, it'd not be much but at least it should keep them on his track. A small flicker, he threw the metallic lamp which for a second flickered before setting the place ablaze. That was bizarre. I must've looked too deep into his research, though who could blame me now? Other than their deaths, curiosity was my only other crime. None other at last. Despite living in the abandoned retirement home, it never felt like it was getting old. Such a shame, he had to see it burn to crisps, along with humans which would be set and answers would be called for. Perhaps it's even better this way after the news comes in the blight of people, none will want or need to associate with me anymore. I will become the outcast he had become. As, the many passages he had stolen were not only of his discoveries alone, but also his interactions, desires and other information not told to the boy. I'll make my way. His thoughts were plighted by the urge to escape. He couldn't explain why but under him, the ground moves, but ahead, nothing happened anymore. 'You're not to leave now.' The malignancy started, it spoke to him at last, his gnawing head and ever lapsing, prolapsing tainted neck, which bred many dead children, instead, the imagery made him fall to the ground, after being mentally assaulted. The faces they had had no features, all covered in the cords from which to be fed. Were they alive, were they dead? Why am I seeing all of this? Argus asked himself. 'Am I trapped in a machine? Have I been to lead this whole time?' Despite not expecting an answer, he deceptfully did. A wicked smile, of grin and blundering blister, the dead were trying to get out, and he couldn't run and ask for help. 'But you all died. I saw it with my own eyes.' Ensnared, the foam that once came from their mouths now formed lower lips, still burning and crawling like animals, grabbing and holding themselves together. An arm was stricken by pain and suddenly they have blown away to smithereens, leaving the carcasses, blood and gore burning, everywhere in sight, other than the place he was stuck inside. 'Do you see my power now? Do you still wonder if you're inside?' 'Then how could it be that I see so many things? Such unnatural despair that it is not known to man and others alike?' 'Hah, do not think that power only extends through the realm of mind, which your so called research, stolen as it is, as well as the identity you once tried to scrape away.' 'How do you know? That must, you're tampering with my mind, I am inside one of you like the research said. Unplug, unplug, unplug!' Argus didn't ever feel nor think that anything of the sort would ever happen to him. No, I would've remembered if I died or if I was captured. Yet every step he took, no distance would be made. And, even more so, nothing of the sort would he had expected, such power inside the mind. 'Enough. Your rambling have no interest to me, as I have plenty to listen to. I have already said and won't say again, now sit and listen or I shall blow you away as I did to the previous ones.' Silently he obedient. Not knowing any better, and not being able to see the abomination again, he looked at the sky. 'Good.' He spoke so casually, almost like a human, yet from what he saw, Argus thought he had harvested the children of his race, now bound to be used for him to speak through. 'You may be right about that, but it matters not Argus. For you may never be able to see my body in the lifetime of yours. Witness them now, how it happens, in front of your eyes, what do you see?' There wasn't any reluctance, for Argus now obeyed. Unlike the others, from which had learned, there was no way out, and he cherished whatever amount of life he had left in him. He had not two but more, as his senses acted most of his life time and there on after. 'They're coming for me, I can see them approach.' 'How many?' 'A few auto vehicles at least, armours to the teeth of the jaw.' 'Are you afraid of being seen?' 'I can't escape from this, if you're going to let them walk over me and crush my bones, you might as well blow me as you did to those three.' It was a slip of anger, easily distinguishable from the other emotions he had felt before. Oh quite peculiar, that the day had been ruined. Argus planned to flee away from all his troubles, but now? Caught by surprise of someone who sought nothing but his demise, he couldn't do much to protest, which lead to him waiting to be dead. 'Giving up so easily?' Though he knew not the answer, he waited and saw. Argus tried jumping out of the way in the lap second, though he saw the light, and how he hadn't made any step through the side. And as it happened, recalled by him, the auto vehicles didn't crush or stomp him but went right through, without a trace left on the ground or on him as a matter of fact. He watched all the vehicles go through as he felt no pain and thought. I'm either inside or have become a ghost. Either way, he kneeled and said. 'I'm yours to take then.' There wasn't any action that would be deemed worthy and no way out. Endless torture of imagery and perhaps even being blown apart wasn't worth it at all. 'Good.' Argus was then converted and none would get to hear of his doing after. The news had reached local and spread like an infection through newspaper and newspaper, of how it was burnt. Corpses smouldered and killed in at utmost repulsing way deemed not to be done by a human but by a devil. Ever-present. 'Lays a price on his head. And it's quite high.' 'Is it the same Argus we know?' 'It could be. It must be. How many others do you know?' 'They've already had plenty of newspapers gathered by her, all placed on the table as she waited for an answer. Though this wasn't the question she had asked her older brother, but why? Why hasn't it arrived yet?' He had spoken to plenty and many of his letters arrived here."Dear sister, I've told you we cannot trust what he said to us.He only seeks you in order to get the connections, nothing more than that."Then what was your reason to keep contact with him?'And there was silence between them that grew into being uncomfortable.It broke by the compromise which was said to be.'We knew no Argus, neither by given or by birth name.Understood?'We can't afford to spill his dirty ink over our name."So be it.'The letters were burnt to crisp, hoping that they'd be left alone, in which Argus has failed.Another attempt spoiled by mere effort of control.Though, not only the officials in their towers of grey and stone, on the other side of the world, easiest of the efforts.Argus had sent them, hoping that they'd get in time, in his many travels around the world, the places that were driven deep into jungles he had met an archaeologist by the name of Alexander.Originally he didn't know what he'd intent of the man, quite peculiar too, Alexander of the Pox was his full name, which always bothered him in the recent memories he had.Could it be that he had a fake name, could he be working with them?Though, alas, a bondage was forged in the time they've spent together, which is the main reason he decided he wanted to include him along the others.The field that used to be sand, covered by dirt.He thought that the world once shifted around in a moment, or a glance.As told by mouth.'You know, I've already shown you but do it again, if you may.'Alexander was always joyful, especially seeing his friends attempt to understand his peculiar obsession with his work.He watches Argus take a scoop of dirt then seen the sand fall below.Indeed, in the jungles of Agraath, there was sand under the trees.'Come on, give it a rest already, I've been doing it all day."But, how could it be so?After all, such a discovery would be worth the research of a lifetime."Hah."The arrogance he had was the main reason Argus had chosen him.Just hear him say such a thing, to think of himself as such.'The first man to discover that?I wager that at least a cousin men and thrice the animals were centuries ahead of your discovery.That, or we'd be swimming in the jungle of bodies left to rot."But this is where you're wrong my, dear friend.I know the reason why it is so.'Though he had never revealed the secret of why.And such a promise was made, or another wager.'If I am to discover something of a greater value than what you claim to have run upon, would you so kindly exchange the secret of your lifetime?"Hah, if there was something more worth.'Though days became greyer, and every single time he watched and never to hear of him again.It saddened Alexander, know that one of the few friends he had broke the last of connection they've had.For new of the departure and the descent into the realms of murder hadn't come that far.And the many more letters that were sent never reached that far.Lawmakers, Officials, Professors and more, Layman who he had met and trusted before.Many copies were made, all written in ink by himself, referring to all of them in a different manner, though it had remained the same.And how could it be then?Not even, up north, through the lands and cities of common folk that laid around, houses of wood, with not much of an interference of the outside world.The woman he had once fallen in love with, that he had sent a letter of love, and another filled with the bitter truth.Yet, neither of them arrived, as the agent skewed to everything just so they'd be sure.'Makes sure that none remains, whatever that man sent, make it end.'Clearly, he wasn't a lowlife, he had something close to a glimpse of insight, even something as plain as a letter filled with words of moist and love had the chance to be filled with subtleties of secrets of the old.'He's not to be underestimated.Burn all that you find with his name on them and do it fast before someone catches us.'If only Argus knew of the delight, though it had brought much pleasure to his lightness, watching present in the past.The irony, that was the ones who burnt some of the letters earlier that day ended up themselves burnt.Though they survived, overlong their purpose, which was unexpected, at last. None may deny the wrath of his secrecy, watching ever alone. He had him not there, trapped to wait. Argus still didn't know anything other but to wait whilst trying not to think at all. His thoughts were constantly searched withing and tore apart. Every location he went in and every location a letter was sent. All seemed to have been burnt or torn apart, be a letter of pleasantries or letter of trust. 'You're clever. Which I say to you, the game is on. You may roam free.' The box bloomed with dark as it was revealed, the whole hemisphere changed as it leads Argus to the other part of the world. It was most peculiar for a human to see the whole entirety of the planet suddenly be torn to pieces and rebuilt, all within the reach of his eyes at the ground level in which he stood. No step, still, couldn't lead him any further in front, that he feared when he saw, being lead straight inside and through mountains, through people, and water that should've drowned him instead of giving him nothing but a mild bore. The lava he had seen under that could've moisturised his skin and torn it to pieces in the old spikes of stone. Right through jungles, cold snow that reached the other side and unknown building that looked as of they had came from the past. It wasn't his world anymore. 'Where are you taking me still?' And in that moment, he thought, how could it be that this is still Earth? He must be lying. 'Though I am not.' A realm of skin, the core of the planet he had seen in seconds of utmost disgust he felt. His organs feel compelled to join, what the planet was, or used to be as he had heard himself. 'This is a vision of your planet, what was before the dawn of apes and men alike. You're a result of it, bred from the egg of which shell serves as your home.' 'Why are you showing me this?' And yet, he couldn't believe as he walked on the pink, the revealed veins, seeing figures in a sky that was grey. It should've been dark. 'And there's no space either.' 'It was once filled, with our masters.' 'Why me again?' 'Because you are now chosen.' The box stopped and finally it was gone, leaving Argus standing naked in front of the great above, filled with grey from distance, which he dared not ask what it really looked like. The thought alone that something worse than what he had seen, filling up an eternity would be too much for a man to bear alone. 'Yet you will bear my seed and my word, as I decided to choose you as my prophet. Stop. Before you ask another time, I have seen you, out of your kind, you've discovered on your own, at which other had failed, or attempt dismayed. Either way, you sealed your fate, now you're mine. You will spend ten days here and after you're done, I will bring you back.' And there was no response to that. How could he do? Looking at the skin, glistening in the grey of the sky, dark figures that he knew way too well that they were not holes which revealed the space. 'You can't do that.' And that was it. The realisation came to mind. Though he was silent, for he could only control one at a time. Of which body wasn't in control, other than Argus' mind, the rest was in his alone. To move and observe, he looked around and tried his best not to step on the veins, ever sludging with a bulging crest of a coloured red. Something was about to pop. Argus fled from the sight, in the endless vastness of skin, before he realised that there was nowhere to run. Nothing to see either. His own special endless torture, for he alone was sent there. Only to be entertained so he'd not come in madness, he looked at the sky and witness them fly. 'They're moving. What are they? Those black silhouettes in the sky, what are they?' Despite the fact he thought of what could be up there, roaming through the mass, he desperately needed to hear another voice. Speak to me, I beg you. Look deeper into my mind, just as you did before, I know you can hear me still. If I go mad, all of this would've been for nothing, bringing me here, saving me just to be caged soon after. All in vein. 'And what would you have me do?' Asked. It's curiosity arose. The many bodies above singing in despair, a song unknown to men or animals, shout of pain. They noticed. Though the voice was different, at which Argus wondered, have you changed your vocal cords, have you deepen your voice? And then he saw and sweet discord, the language barrier was broken. It wasn't the fiend that brought him there, which spoke to him now, but the collective of grey matter, the malignancy which had occupied space. How can you hear me? And how were you able to do it so fast? Though none of the questions was answered, as some parts of it spoke in their different tongues. 'Are you our creation?' 'I am not.' A distant malignancy of grey skin approached, and as it entered the area, it started gaining the colour of skin which had taken the form of the egg. Closer, it was a spear of skin, of titanic proportion, at a level, unknown to anything built in any of the great ages before him. Slowly, the tip expanded too, making itself smaller and smaller, forming spherical shapes, close to balls but not so. Of which it tried, hundred of times, perhaps more, to take the shape of his face, his body, the lower form. The jaw was too big, so were some eyes, other had nothing but the overlapped forms of another attempt. 'Why can we not create? Why? Answer us now.' And so it said, revealing at last. Despite the terrifying sight at which Argus attempted to run, it couldn't create, despite how hard it tried. Too many of them, grey as they were, had mingled with the form, all trying to go over the other, sending different signals, all in vain. None of the attempts was even close to resembling a human. And so, the rage, made them mad, the first time that had ever happened, in the entirety of existent life. Argus turned and screamed, revealing all the extent of his mouth. Seeing the sharpness, combined with the rage, from the grey point of the spear, they formed, a giant mouth with teeth and didn't think of anything else. The combined frenzy that it held, pushed the mass to chop it off. And then, for the first time, it felt pain. Such pain travelled through the entire system, being felt by the whole entity itself. The spear fell as they were silent, such pain had finally given through to them, as, ever before, every single part which encompassed infinity thought in chaos. And ever since they discovered through infinity a fragment of an empty space, they tried creating something of their own. It was there, how their creation laid. It must've been an infinity that passed, through the endless stream of time. A wriggling conjunction with no bones, no organs with deviations that no one could seem human if were to lay eyes upon for the first time. Failure, though, at least there was something made, be living or be dead. 'Freedom, this is the least I deserve, I've done nothing else but to attempt to spread the research I've got my hands on. I beg you forgiveness and to be released, please.' He wasn't being heard. For now that they have tasted pain and they have seen the opportunity and realised. It took us an eternity of tried. To think of form, to think of forms. Dark silhouettes across the sky. Malformations of ourselves that dared not move on. And all it took was a source. In the end, it failed. It failed. It failed. Some thoughts were the same, though withing an endless mass anything could happen. Now, the events though were set in motion, the everlasting change was about to be made. And it took then, the fastest it had ever taken for change to be made. It was farthest away that a part of the mass, despite being flooded into infinity, pulled into itself everything around. Gnawing teeth, sparkling and sharp, hard as the information deemed to be made, it started chewing everything it could swallow. And the second part came, for it wanted to escape, it hadn't been done before as the spear of skin was merely severed. The force of being pulled in the tight space which he saw in Argus made it go further and expand. And more it ate, more space to accompany it. And at such a rate that the mass felt pain, even more than that, it felt not only being eaten alive but being crushed into nothingness whilst the energy came to that small point. So great was the point, still keeping on, that it didn't bother but arise the curiosity. So much power and so much change, all inside just once whole place. A spot, to have something so ill, where the entire mass had not. It was deemed unworthy to be done. And so the mass developed many, many, many other gnawing mouths and each started devouring themselves. Gray became so oversaturated that it had become pale and dark. So did appear, the darkest corners of the universe at last. A sudden greed was inborn into them, as all desired the vacuum for themselves but none knew how they could do so as the vast knowledge they had accumulated over the aeons started to vanish. For that took only one to make a change, as one started the reaction and one egg should've started still. It was at the farthest reach that one part developed enough, after eating from all sides and gaining a most considerable size, it decided it was just enough. It twitched and stopped eating for a while, then turned to face the point from which it sprouted. From there, it started once again, eating without a stop, out of its own body, bit after bits, until there was nothing keeping it still. And such it was, that another being was born, floating away from the mouths that tried to reach it and escaped. It floated still, utmost dumb, for the main network that used to be its mind was cut still, leaving but a fraction to fend on its own. Many stopped and saw, how one split and created itself, a self-birthing god. But, as it did, the flaws began. Some did the same and sprouted out, the grey having volume and colour in the dark, but some were too eager as the teeth reached their own body and ate. And ate. And ate, until there was nothing left but bits, teeth floating in the vacuum, leaving more of the root to be devoured by others. More greed formed still and now sprouting terrors started eating one another as others wept. So it was that the full entirety of the being had been vanquished by its own nature, its own maliciousness, and from it sprouted many that floated away. Some bigger, others smaller, out of which there one remained. The behemoth of gigantic form, of which Argus watch praying even from the spot he was on. Kept awake only by willpower and something of which couldn't be explained by a human, he saw everything and more, the space form and in there, the biggest of them all. Those who floated ended up in the waste, the smaller bits, scraps, remnants of teeth evolved over time. And the behemoth, having nothing left, as the vastness of networks was now slain, after eating everything it could, pulled itself as hard as it could until a point, a single ball of light that grew its light towards expansion. Argus had nowhere to run, feeling from where he was, how he would die. The point of energy finally struggled and then exploded, spreading across what now became a new world, spraying everything with energy, hoping that one day everything would grow again. Though he was pulled now, Argus had no vision, nor did he see the egg being covered in fragments and harden on its own. Nor was he able to see all those who floated away, being shoved deeper into space by the explosion. Too fast, he was pulled and such. He stood there floating and saw nothing in front of him, nor could he turn around. But still, Argus heard. 'So you have seen it, the birth of what you call time.' And Argus could not believe, despite having his mind kept sane by the one he knew made all of this. 'Then. What are you?' 'I am one of the fragments that saw torn apart, teeth that grew, sprayed with energy in the dark.' Though he didn't turn Argus around, not yet. 'What do you want me for?' It was still unclear, the reason or even, if anything was clear, though nothing of skin could be denied. Not the bodies, the forms he saw. Later, written in a journal of his own, one that was not stolen nor copied. All credit belong to him, in which it wrote as such, what he could only describe as an entity that was there and it would've been forever if it wasn't for me. At least, that's what I thought, for I am not sure what to think anymore. I could see forms and shapes there, in the vastness it held, though, if none existed how could it be? There is still what happened after, which I could only think it was because of someone like me. The celestial explained then, how, I was not bored through time, but saw only a vision of what was there, what happened. A vision that came from a being so ancient and strong that it was able to store the recollection of its memory inside even its smallest part it created. Though I regret to say that I fell, inside the cursed thing I once I critiqued as faith. It explained to me, its vastness inside the space, how it was stored inside a small place, physical inside our world, in which laid another universe of its own. There he stood, ever expanding, in which, forever he may expand, until a point where it would be, restore to the point in the vision, perhaps ten times of more. We had different knowledge then, we thought space was limited and could be occupied, perhaps they thought too, the same. In time, as we learned that it might be forever expanding, so it could be, the same could happen in its cage. I wasn't given the reason why one that was shaped like a human laid on their prototype of a planet, but that could be. That could become. It may be something that meant that something existed before them. It could provide proof for ours. Creation. If only this could be presented to someone in the field, if only they'd accept what I have seen. Though there was no proof and I was given only a name. If only I could find that universe he was held inside, then I could show everyone that I was right. Dyotoromus, a name I would never forget. No matter how many pills I was given, instead. I awoke then from the trance, finally as I was released at last from the visions of the past. The rest was clouded but I was there. My life in the asylum began. For a short time, I could call no other place other the asylum as my home. Awakened there, I glanced, noticing that there was nowhere to run. 'Where am I?' There was no one else around in the room I was in and there was nothing I could do to stop the sudden impulse of the neck. Twitches began and he was unable to do anything to stop the head from being turned to the side, over and over again, almost to the point where it would snap itself. Argus yelled 'Help' As the first face appeared, going past the still open room and kept saying that. Suddenly it came, whatever it was silenced him instead of helping. Dressed like a woman but the face was split. She said something unspoken by no woman and two others came into the room. A pair of utensils, of which there was a syringe, which was inserted in his neck, slowly stopping the twitch. Argus finally passed out, though he hadn't realised that he was being helped, with both arms and legs tied, still not dead. It was later into the night that I woke, thirsty and hungry, with no one else to talk to. My legs and arms were in pain, tired as I tried getting up and only remembered what had previously happened, though unwillingly, being forced back into the trance. IT spoke to me again then, even in the unknown place and warned. 'Say nothing of me now or you shall raise a suspicion that may never let you get out of there and spread my word.' 'But you can do the same as you've done before, can't you?' The room he was now, as they spoken resembled twilight and pale dark, coloured but silhouettes of stars moving around in the dust. He brought me again here. Argus noticed that he could move his arms and legs despite floating, but not turn, never turn. He wished he could stay despite that it was never meant to be. 'You will do as they bid, they leave on the first opportunity that comes. After then, you will find my cage and free me at last.' 'But why me?' He asked, still no answer. Argus wasn't satisfied the first time he had heard the answer, nor the second time either. For he wasn't Argus anymore. 'You are now named Ferdinand Straughtom. For they will be looking for someone named Argus after all. And if they find you here and now, you will be of no use to me no more.' Ferdinand, Straughtom, a peculiar choice of name, though it meant that none found me yet. There is still time for me to escape and forget. The light flickered then and he was awake in the morning. It was the nurse who came, now, finally looking like a woman, blonde accompanied by bright amber eyes. He hadn't heard it last night, though there was a slight accent there. 'Feeling any better?' She signalled for the others to undo the bindings, though Argus did not speak yet. There was something he spat out, on the side of the bed, there laid a dust covered in blood that he had previously ingested. It was from there that he was taken to the other side of the asylum, in the advanced nursery whilst getting tied to a chair. This must be another illusion. Argus has, though, seeing the chair made of human skin, crawling with the same eggs. Must I be tortured more? He had known that someone there was hearing what he thought and said. Even as those glances across the asylum, from patients from rooms were more than enough to send chills down any rational mind, none could compare to the chair. Faces with no nostrils nor sockets expanded to laugh. He ignored, or did his best to do so, looking another way, as he was tied there by the guards of the place. Dust ran across the room, and the nurse called the doctor which only pushed her back at Argus. 'Make sure he's well tied.' Slowly breathing, he couldn't help it, hearing the sudden movements of skin that were rubbing against his, the varied breaths each face took and said, only he could hear too. 'We know what you did. We know whom you spoke to. We know what you know.' The voices felt so living, the veins being carnivorous repugnant in sight, being wrapped around so tightly that they couldn't help but drag themselves and enter his skin, but only to a hint of pain. 'There's no need to be nervous, the doctor is soft of hand.' And yet she did not know if he was mute not. 'My name is Marilyn, what's yours?' 'My.' Another coughing fit came, only that it only got rougher this time, more blood, spit and dust. Those stars I saw, the dust resembled this. It was indeed, the image of his lungs, the chamber in which he sat, thought for him, it was nothing more but a thesis, for her it was enough. 'I'm calling the doctor immediately now.' As she rushed past to get him at the fastest she could. He came to see him, standing as if tortured, whispers spat inside his ears, struggling to breathe. The image of the doctor having a strange device in his hand almost made him gag. It was sharp, long and bent in certain ways that would allow him to go deep inside and scrape for skin and blood, a painful thought that made his eyelids pop. 'No. "Stay still. Keep him." The room was lit, and the shadows ran across the upper floor of the asylum, of which the shouts of terror could be heard, seeing how he worked inside of him, ripping parts, grabbing them and throwing them away. It was supposed to leave him mutilated, close to being dead. All the patients stood and watch solemnly as the man was being killed, just as he arrived. Thought it was something that deceived the doctor's eyes. He took the apparatus, only to see it crystallised in solidified dust. It sparkled against the light, almost as if it had something else, left on the bottom of the floor, watching the cough fit end. 'I said let me go!' Vileness, at its utmost purity, finally revealed itself, despite not being owned by him it managed to appear. He was afraid of both of their intentions and what was happening inside of him, that dust. From where did it come from now? I felt that thing enter me, and felt no pain before it got thrown away. The shock didn't seem to be present in myself alone, as I could freely see that both the other guards and the nurse, along with the doctor were peeved by what happened. What I could only guess as insight, is a hunch, that I could hear their whispers that echoed across the examination room. I have quite steered the asylum in more than one way that day. 'Take him away, now.' And even by order, all of them remained reluctant towards the doctor's command. They feared and I could see that freely in their eyes, though I'd lie if I said otherwise about myself. As for, what happened inside of me remained a mystery to this day. Nevertheless, they came and swapped, from a restraint to another, taking me towards my new cell, one that I would get to call home for days to come. Though, I did not hear their comments after, nor what they had written on their notes, as I was left there alone inside my chamber, I had realised that they had no will to torture me. Sure, there was no palace, but it was quaint, more or less in the manner. They even left me a journal near the table with a pencil tied to it. I wish I could say that from that point is from when I started writing my first entry into the journal, though that would be yet another untold lie. No, that blank book with pages reminded me of something else, as I laid alone in the slightly dark room with flickering lights. 'The research.' It reminded me of what I had lost and with each day passing, they were slowly getting forth towards finding me. The barred window left me a sight. It was dark outside, though the street view was clear. 'This place must be colossal.' Indeed it is. 'A voice said, though, it came to no surprise. Other than, this time, it had belonged to another human. There was no vent inside the room, the door had a possible opening though at this point it was closed. Yet, with that in mind, the voice was still most clear, despite everything else. 'How could it be that I hear you so well?' 'The window isn't soundproof, so I presume that you're new here, are you not?' 'Indeed.' 'Well, you're just in time, well. The other one didn't go as nicely as he came.' Another one, most likely from the adjacent chamber, his voice was just as clear, though it could only be described as being slightly more feminine than expected. 'And who are you two?' 'Three to be more precise. 'Shut yer mouth down there, no one asked for you to join.' It was the voice of a woman, from the lower quarters, just as I presume, she stood right in my room, a raspy voice thought I had no room to see through the window. Nor did I have any means to break it open. 'I'm Brider, Jonathan Brider' And, if I may present myself, I'm Angus. McGilligan, though no one uses that name, no other than the nurse. 'Am I allowed then to speak to the new guy?' 'You are not, and stay in your place, no one wants to hear your wail, banshee.' Could it be that Brider said so, or was it, Angus? None spoke enough nor clear enough to be distinct, I couldn't see what they looked like either. Though her, I would recognise, the voice of a woman, banshee as they called her, sounded like a mockingbird trapped in the cellar. 'I'm Aghatta.' And there was silence other, as on cue, they all expected some sort of etiquette for me to present myself, despite not getting the hint at first and waited. In silence, I had some time to remember, though I had not forgotten, I had questioned for a while what had happened before and how could I have arrived here. 'Are you not going to reveal your identity yet?' Said by the voice of a woman, though I knew better. 'Sorry for that, my name is. They call me. 'Yes, the name Argus suddenly became hard to pronounce by lips at that point, at the point of almost sounding like a repulsing curse of some sort. 'My name is. I was named Ferdinand Straughtom. 'That came out almost as if it was muscle memory, something that I hadn't intended, yet it happened nevertheless. My hands then instinctively came and covered my mouth as I wondered, should I have lied or told the truth? What if they know I'm lying, what if the nurse knows? In the previous room, what triggered the reaction as I saw, was when I was ready to tell her my real name. And, as my hands reached out, my eyes glared almost to a shine. 'Are you having a light there or what? From where is that flare coming from?' I hadn't answered, though it dimmed after I threw it away, though from my mouth it must've come, it was the dust, the same one like the previous from before. And this time, it almost stuck upon my fingers too. 'Damn. I left out an audible note. Somehow, I remembered, though not entirely, in the journals and notes I had stolen, there was a passage, there must've been. It said something about such a thing, something that something used to do something. Or something of the sort. 'Damn, why can't I remember it?' It was so long time ago, and now, far away too. Far beyond his each and everyone, for a matter of fact, though there was always the chance that they had them. Could they? Was it there? Could it be so? He asked himself again. Though they questioned why he phrased it so, as it appeared. 'By whom?' They asked, despite being stored in an asylum such as it was, it still appeared strange to them. 'Are you talking about your parents or someone else? Ferdinand. Ferdinand isn't such a bad name, I'd say it had a nice ring to it. And there it was, the fluency and the stagnant accent that suddenly revealed itself, even past how feminine it sounded at the time, it was sloppy now. That was Jonathan, and soon Argus wouldn't forget. Though he ignored their banter, the more he thought of it. But then he asked, despite his own intentions. 'Do any of you recall the day when I was brought here? Please, I must know.' 'Do you not remember?' Angus, there he was, he must've been staying on the right side, straight forwards from which the plane was. At last, they stopped, and waited, before they spoke. The reluctance was a bit distasteful though not entirely deemed vile. He knew that something unexplainable must've happened. Hence they said. 'It was particularly odd, you see. When you first came.' 'May I speak to him now? Since it's a delicate situation, it needs a delicate approach that could only be found in a woman.' 'Then why don't you tell us where we might find one if you could manage to do so.' 'Enough, please. I'm. Troubled, to say the least, and I need to know how I got in here. Can't you, at least try to help me?' 'Listen, we're all a bit troubled here, in case you did not notice where we are.' Said Angus whilst making a scratching noise. The chamber wasn't entirely sound proof, and the material used, a reflective white, against which Argus saw himself could be visibly seen as being pushed against. Strange, though, as the side Angus was on was the only one being reflective, though. He had noticed it before, against the tail of the eye when the light came. It did not matter, on whoever his attention went. 'Go on.' 'Well, I was the first to see it, I'd wager, being a short sleeper and all, I've got all sorts of advantages.' 'Some, as being locked in an asylum.' And that was John. 'Do any of you want to go on then? You all saw the day he came, we all did so.' 'The day I came? Don't you mean the hour?' 'No, you did not come here yesterday or today. It's hard to remember, perhaps it must've been days ago, or even weeks. Perhaps more than that. This is the first time we got the chance to interact with you in a long time, you see?' And what exactly happened in these days I was unsure of. They must've contacted you in a deep place when no one else other than the nurse could've come into contact with you. 'The two of them were purposely silent since she decided to reveal what happened, though their reasoning wasn't entirely excusable. Agahatta did well know in what she was dragging herself into, and it wasn't good.' 'The day when you were brought in, everyone was held and close inside each other's cell early and dosed off. They wanted all of us to be sleeping off whilst you were being brought. Yet.' 'The three of you remained awake.' 'Lucky break, hence, we saw you being brought here, tied up and carried up inside an open coffin.' 'Inside a coffin you say?' 'I dare not lie to you, though, it was strange. You weren't dead, I saw you twitching, violently against the wooden walls of your tomb. Hey, can you see that lamppost over there? That tall one that's now shaking?' A twitch of brain that felt against the skull, it blocked Argus towards the object as he saw it. It appeared as a man being impaled there, though he was sure of it. 'Is that a man there?' 'A man? Ferdinand, there is no one out there, other than a few rabbits and a stool.' He was twitching about and he noted him staring, his face mutilated, and his eyes abnormally on the side. 'Go on then.' 'It seemed as if his paranoia was admitted, he needed sleep, and desperately too. The really hasn't come to him yet, though the chance was still brewing in front of his eyes. I would spend my time here, in this place, tortured as before, my research gone. I need to hear first before I fall.' 'What happened there Agahatta?' 'Well, you pointed towards it, and it was almost as if, in the midst of the day, a lightning bolt of fire came through from the sky. It was the hand of god at the tip of your finger and I dare not say it wasn't anything other than your doing.' 'But there's no mark thereof being hit.' 'Well, that's mostly because there's nothing left. They can confirm, we all saw and were lit up in amazement, those people carrying your coffin even dropped it as it happened. It's true.' 'She's exaggerating, though, nothing of the sort happened. Give him a rest Agatha, he need it, after all, this poor fellow has already gone through enough already."Fine."No, I need to know what happened after."It can wait.Calm yourself down, it's not like you don't have anything other than.Than."Death.'He said, in his blank state, the room was twisted and moulded by skin instead.'Argus.'He said, finally, at last, he came to speak with him, in his chamber of twisted faces that could do nothing else but speak to him.They came only to make him remember.'You must escape, and do it fast.You've spent too much time in here.'The smiles changed, moving through the room almost as if pulled out, through small cracks that formed its limits.So it seemed that Argus asked.'Will I be left alone now?'Why must I spend my time here with these lunatics?"You're one of them now?'The thought does not dare speak back to me a child.'And as the voice of the seeming less celestial spoke, the skin blackened and an empty square hole appeared.First, it was small, then it began growing bigger and bigger until it reached a point where it started encompassing the whole wall.There was nothing beyond but a fraction of him, that had many of those that once served, easily recognisable to Argus as they appeared to have been once humans.Much, smaller than the baby like formations under the neck region, as one dangled above all.Compared to that, they all appeared as if they were ants, waiting to be picked, slowly moving and grasping to one another, it seemed.'You will share their fate if you disobey, forever be trapped with me, again and again."Are those the ones that failed you?"Indeed they are, and just as yourself, they were given a chance, without any other to escape.You've got nothing else but to try.But beware as you will not be left there to rot, instead, you'll hear and feel the anguish of every soul as they all clasp to you.'Argus looked upon the tattered region of the body and observed something else.In the middle of all of it, there was a special empty place, reserved for him.The same shape, form and condition as him, an empty abyss, almost calling for him to join.And then, it felt as if it spoke to him and said.'Come through, the window's open, just a few steps.'And he did, closer and closer and as he approached, he saw how surreal it appeared.Close to reality with each step, there was no wall, no room, but blooming repugnancy instead.'Oh, so you wish to join?Abandon everything with joy?'The voice asked, thought there was the uncertainty of who said it.Ferdinand, Argus, or whoever that was, the man in which noted said, he had survived.The was a damning screech that night.Or so the report said.'Oh damn this!Nurse, come here a minute.'And she came, through the investigations and various reports, she had come back to him and noted too.'Well?'Well nurse, I still can't understand how a man can simply disappear.How did it happen?Are you sure there weren't any of the other staff members that let him go?"No, as I said to the officers that came this morning.He just wasn't there.Though."Go on, nurse, tell me."Well, it seems quite peculiar to me that he had survived.You know what."Indeed, thought, you don't think that his disappearance might be related to that, do you?"I actually do think that.Even when he was brought in here, things got awfully peculiar, don't you think?"Wery well dismissed.'She shudders at the tone the doctor had, though he was troubled, as being revealed in his face.The nurse, despite having her nose in someone else's business did not manage to see what he was reading though she had missed quite a scene.Luckily the journal was there, in good condition, which may have brought something in form of a clue, as, from where did the dust come from and what did it do.Such a thing could be a mutation, something even deeper than that, up to the point of a virus or worse.The sample taken should've been there by now, yet I received no letter of confirmation.'None at all.Damn those men too.To hell with all fo them, can't any of them see that I'm struggling?"Two hands pushed firmly as a stroke, the book slammed on the desk, making one of the patients that were sitting silently the whole time on their chairs shake.'Oh, you two are still there.Just wait for a little longer until I'm done.'These buffons again, oh how I would enjoy playing them like puppets, oh how indeed.No time for that, at least, files need to be given in.'Very well, why have you come here?'You on the left.Yes you!'The man was middle-aged, with a slim build, though the ashen hair contradicted him.And so, so, mute, mute, mute.It was written sloppy all over the small dossier, though not by him, a sloppy member of his protegee.Oh, how cruel have they become, the young, they started taking off their bitter old.Regardless.'I understand that you're not able to speak, though I have no paper, not the time to spare.Have you come here for?Let me see?'It documented everything of him, from his previous doings, life outside, relatives alive and last but not least, previous checkings.As mad as a brick this one.Even as he read again, he looked at the man and noticed that he was restrained, both hands too so he'd not hurt either him or the other patient.He tore out his mother's voice box and killed her.Such a feat that must've been.The thought the doctor had was almost giving nothing but a hint of admiration of the deed.'What was your name again?'It came as an insulting reflex, though it bore no emotion, other than the store.'I get it, I'll check for you after.What about you?'The other one that stood right next to him had no fear of being hurt.The silent one named Quinn, which only meant that the plighted other could only be.'Malorn.You've got quite a unique name, haven't you?Let me see here.'The pages were bland, his eyes were going all around, in a motion corresponding to his desaturated boredom.Nothing worth noting, other than the usual, of which matter he had previously seen.Mad, dumb, stupid and retarded, words of which the doctor could only think of when he decided to describe what he was reading. His story was just the normal that he had seen, oh a mental breakdown here and there, some family issues everywhere, something that wouldn't normally affect the perfectly sane.Sleep deprived, checked, problems with his child, checked, the lack of luck of which god hasn't shined upon him, checked.Every case was there, as it appeared more of a morbid plate than some files delayed.And there it was, the red mark, left directly on the right spot.I've to go to thank Euglufieer for this one, this really helped me dodge the bullet.Red arrows pointed, small but unavoidable to him, at the text which read.'Has a family.'He murmured to himself.'Very well, you may leave us now, I'm done with you.'The most important thing which could impact everything, oh how quaint, to think that having such a thing would impact this, ever much.'Which leaves us.Alone.'And as he said it, he heard the slam left by the closing of the door.Another night passed, and screams could be heard throughout the asylum, as its attendees knew that the doctor just had another mid-night snack by himself.Ever past the floors and the dusk, the mid-summer dust, the room that backed into twilight now was closed and there was no one inside.'Agatha, are you listening?'It was John, as he asked, lost in his own world, though still listening at the door.No guard this night, he had now, their entire program ran down in his head.Everything that was left was for them to plan the escape.'Too bad the new one won't be joining us, he's been awfully silent, ever since that night, wasn't he?'Indeed he was, indeed he was."I doubt any of you seen him in the courtyard.Pff, figures."Well, I would've recognised if I've seen a walking corpse in the light, there'd be consequences to that, wouldn't there?'She spoke from her room, unattended, still hurt from the previous encounters when they had tried restraining her.It was a pity, though, Agatha knew that her once beautiful hair was now tainted by the dirty blood of her own, as they took liberties to take blows, each with a blunt.A fracture, or two on her skull and the pain was momentarily gone, yet none of them asked if she was fine.None seemed to care anyway.But it was then, that the delusions began.'We will do this, we will do that.What chances do we get?They'll just beat us on every attempt."Don't say that, don't.I don't want that to happen again."Do you see that John?This is what will happen if we try.We might as well give up our attempt and just stay here until they will release us.'Though it was clear, despite Angus' cry, there was no way out, none other than.'A door."Agatha, we've already told you that we can't escape.'Though now she was silent, at an utmost disturbing pace.Never has she missed a chance, or an opportunity to speak to them, none at all, but why?He waited not to take, each and everyone now.Two more doors opened, on the walls.And to them, he spoke, all at once.'Come inside and follow him at last.'This time, the walls twisted, as well as the asylum shrank and stretched, the patients were there, contorted beyond any recognisable approach.He enjoyed that practice, playing and twisting with the image of the ones created for skin.Every chance he got and even to them.If it weren't for Ferdinand, now, he wouldn't have taken this approach, he'd leave them there to rot, as the rest, though now.It was recalled.'Take them.Bring them with me if you want me to find your cage.I'm sure that you're aware that I can't do it on my own, none of my predecessors or those who had taken care of the other celestials did so.'And so his wish was respected, as, despite the fact that Argus, by his birth name did not know what they looked like, asked for them to accompany him in the search.Though that did not mean he could have no fun.A bone picked off and she snapped and crawled.One momentarily had his head fall off and roll by itself through the door, whilst the other, the one with a voice that did not belong had his voice box ripped off, stretched to resemble a wheel.Oh, how fun it was, even for someone as ancient as him, to take pleasure in something so petty as it were.But it happened, nonetheless and they were pulled as in the vacuum of space.'Awaken.'And they opened their eyes.It was now inside of a house, and they all sat on a table, waiting for an explanation for what had happened.The most common explanation, at which they all had come to the same conclusion was that dementia finally took over their minds.And it was clear, as, where the windows laid, the outside was asylum, though it was not.How could it be in front of us?And the windows behind?Another asked himself, how could it be behind?How could the asylum be on every side?And no door laid to lead on the outside, the ceiling was sealed.Was it all an illusion.'Let me be clear.I've no care to explain, nor the time for it.We will be taken away from here.'Argus already knew what was happening, as what he saw was his green box from which he couldn't move, the house from which he was out was no longer on fire, though.No one to see the three, dressed in white patients that stood on their butts.My own very comfort zone.Argus thought.Though no more comfort laid anymore, as it was time.'We're leaving then.'Never had they looked back ever since that was said, as, for the words that were muttered, and the waving of the hands, the signal was already perceived by him?Though there was no need for that, as Argus's mind was ever open and it could've been more easily solved by simpler means.No visible display was shown, though the fresh air made it ever predictable.'Oh, back from where we started.'And now it seemed that there was no one in there, no agents, no other man or woman, citizen or passer, not traveller like any other.It was abandoned and left just as when he first set foot outside.Other than the dumbstruck peasants that lowered themselves and waited, still struck by what happened.That, and the small repellent left on the door, to prevent the bugs and other insects from coming inside the scene of the crime.'It was not a dream after all.The flames, the explosion.'Bits of the skulls were still there, deeply lodged against a fence that laid on the other side of the road.Along with that way, many others were left.Clearly, they did not care for the repercussions of being caught, if they did, they wouldn't have been so keenly sloppy with the cleanup.Argus, or Ferdinand, as they referred to, passed along the silent figures, almost as if he did not care much about, and who could blame him still?They weren't exactly trying to get his attention, nor get in his way. Other than the recognising of his voice, he was still a mystery. The illusion of room barely passed when he noted that it was time, and for a fraction of a moment then, it appeared as if he was a god. Oh, are you truly, blessed one? Angus thought whilst scratching his back. Their gazes watched his every step from where they stood, and almost like trained soldiers, they followed his command. Watch dogs trained to sit when he asked. 'Are you coming or what?' A simple pair of nods and they came, ever fluent and present, matching their step, or trying, pushing one another as each saw the pair of steps that were visibly placed as marks on the ground. As ridiculously childish it appeared to Argus, for a second then, it appeared as the stroke of genius. He did not notice until they did. 'Stop there for a moment.' He wouldn't have noticed otherwise, but the grass, along with the mud were cleaned off, pushed to the point of being vulnerable arranged. Yet, other than his, none other were there. Now an extra pair of footing came to be, theirs, it seemed. 'Throw out your shoes, now!' And as his voice commanded, they followed indeed, to the side, off the fence, a shoe landed by his grace inside the house. He threw out his too, and there wasn't any more time for him to check if his so carefully hidden extras weren't burned to ashes. 'We need to run, now.' With stumps, they followed, still following like duds, feet imprinted, other than his socks, though it was clear that the land was monitored. They must've been expecting. 'Keep going.' Ferdinand said. They watched him go and speak behind his back, though it wasn't ill-willed but good. 'He must be.' 'I thought the same.' 'Of course, you did Agatha, you know everything after all.' 'Stop it back there, we need to get as far.' But a vehicle was coming, approaching at an unredeemable speed, straight ahead, coming for them. Argus jumped to the side whilst closing his eyes, wishfully hoping they would do the same. He watched the car spring with no care for their lives, but luckily for him, they've spread like ants. Good thing halves of their minds were still there, otherwise, it would've been a lot worse. It was dictated now, that the tracks would've dirtied. 'The grass.' Argus waited no longer for the stumbling runts and came closer to pick them up. 'Up. UP. You too, hurry up! There's no time and I've got a bad feeling about it.' It came to his mind that before, he wasn't as obsessed with his time as he was now. Not at all, nor did he care about anyone else than him, no other responsibilities than the writings that were not there now. 'Thank you, lord.' And then he was shaking, despite helping Angus, was it? Right on his tracks, the two hands shook and he finally saw through the gaze of the insane. Pupils dilated laid there, getting even bigger. And a gate laid inside of it, just as large, he could've strung his eye inside, but who know what it would've happened after. The slight discomfort in his stomach didn't do much to help him, as the simple words the man muttered did more than shaking him still. 'Right, let's go. I'm leading a group of insane fanatics, none of which is wearing any shoes. 'We go for the main line, do you hear?' Right into the open, luckily for him, the border which leads outside wasn't as far. There were ways to get out, of which he only knew as well as any other man of his band. Vehicles were running, throwing glittering rocks against the many intersected roads, the green hills around did nothing more than bringing it closer to notice. The countryside I have yet to miss. It somehow brought him a pleasure, if it weren't as dangerous to lay on the open road. 'Right, we need to.' Hitchhike. Two madmen and women, of which he promised not to criticise, thought how could he explain it to anyone who would take them off? Agents were already on the lookout for anything peculiar, not to mention the footmarks left on the ground, the thrown shoes and the wailing that was left behind. Argus still thought of a good explanation. One that needed to make more or less sense, one to explain that whom just stopped. The vehicle was quiet for its obvious old age, though spacious in its enormous size, enough to keep them all abroad and going. 'Hah. You must be coming for the circus, right?' It was a moustached man wearing a top hat that came out and introduced himself, close to the middle of the road. A second glance past him, and tied to the vehicle laid the cargo, even more, spacious and tied. The power it must've had should've been more than enough if it means carrying such a thing to such an extent. As the road ahead was perilous, the night was dark and. 'Ehm, let me introduce myself. My name is Burtungorf. Burtungorf Middlepan. Burt for short thought you four good looking gentlemen and a woman are just in luck. They were being quite looked at, especially the lower region, it seemed. Argus intervened. 'Are you carrying animals in there?' Quite perceptive, are we? Though it is true, a few specimens of mongoose, perhaps a horse or two, but do not worry, they face no threat at all. "Don't you mean, pose no threat?" Though Argus did not receive any other response other than a devilish smile. A grin, a fat pile of sluggish, melting bile that laid in his car. Whatever it was for, laid in a glass inside there, and the more he was given the chance to glance, even more, disturbing things he saw. 'Can you take us there? On the circus?' 'Are you to join, the four of you?' Well, we are currently having more than enough openings if you would enjoy. 'We would.' "And what about them? What can you do? All of you, what is your act?" The man had an eye for looking, staring and examining things, that was clear, even better than Argus. He made sure to let him know and affirm himself as an adversary. 'No shoes, clothes from an asylum, most likely, are you escapees?' He pointed at the dirt and said nothing more. Neither did Argus, though it was no shock that he was tempted to knock him out and run away. 'Very well, we can make do with extra hands, either way, be mad or not. And you three seem quite well fit, for your condition. She can help the cook. Hop in. "Wait, how can we be sure?' And quickly Burt stopped him saying, alas, 'you can't.' "But you could just take and turn us then. "Or I can leave you here to be taken. Tell me this. And you three, go on the side for a moment. 'Like small mice, they listened, intimidated by the stature of the man. 'Are those the ones looking for you?' He hadn't noticed but up from where they stood, right, as if they laid below, stood right against a rising hill-like lump on the ground. Atop of which stood a car with its lights on. There were silhouettes, dark, and shallow, waiting and staring, for the choice. 'We'll do anything. "That's more like it, hop on the back. You too. 'He stopped Argus from hopping in front, rudely enough, though he was nothing but a guest, after all, hitchhiker. Very well, I'll make do. Though Argus had no intention of keeping himself there, none to go any further than that. Alas, he went ahead, and entered the shed like cage along with the other two and felt the shaking as the car started carrying them far and far away. And wide, the stood and shook, shaken from left to right, with the sounds of the animals of which they mistook. 'Do you now feel the emptiness?' And then they were asked. Finally, they spoke. 'Is that your voice lord?' Asked Agatha. 'Could it be?' Argus followed the almost as a mockingbird. And the third of the bunch stood silent, almost shy and unable to ask, for none of them was being accompanied by a word or spoken to, not at all. 'I'm talking to you, oh do you feel now?' "I know what you're referring to, is it what you feel? Is that what you wanted me to know what's like. "Yes, oh yes, this is the fate that will await you, now them too. If you fail to find my cage, this is what your fate will be, an eternity in which I stood and waited. "Then tell me, for you did not answer, yet asked me to do so. How is it that your cage got here? Why can't you escape if you're so powerful?" Do not dare mock me now, I may be more merciful than others that might've tortured you or sucked you dry of your blood and other bodily fluids until you were nothing more than a spineless worm. 'And as they spoke, the many children like voices, and the other that resembles dark tones that could even bend the mightiest of walls, it appeared in front of him. And yet again, despite floating, he could see nothing other than fractions of the endless body. And he knew too what he was doing was vile, to release such, such. Evil, disgusting creature, accursed monster and other things that could describe the endless vileness turn and edges it had, the many bodies of which had once tried help it, only to end there for their failures. What have I gotten myself into?' Do you need to know what it feels like without my protection? Without my control over you that keeps you sane?' And then, his mind suddenly freed, and his eyes widened, his mind was filled with pain. Pain that could be felt throughout the brain, something that Argus knew that it wasn't biologically possible. Yet the pain was there, accompanied by the skull, by another psychological level that went deeper and deeper, side by side. His skull wasn't there any longer but stricken, pushed deeper, cracked and broken. And the cracked shards entered the brain, and pierced the various ends, making it even more intense. The imagery that was then forced upon gave him a whole new feeling of despair. The human being was never supposed to face such a thing. But he understood, as they shook, seeing how he stood there in the corner, the animals making their dire roars of rage. He was distraught in the visions, the road clear though the vehicle was tilting too, the bumps that followed made it hard for the driver to keep his composure. And in the vision, after the pain, Argus found himself being pulled. He froze for a second as he heard. 'You've previously wondered if you were inside one of my celestial brothers. Now, you will get your answer and finally see what it's like, what they see, how they feel. This is their fate.' It said, and finally, Argus was released. Still oozing, his head was now struggling to recover, if at all, from the damage it had suffered now. A vision was adjusting, he was in the compound of something, a bunker, it was clear. In front laid a sealed door and in the back darkness that loomed in-between the darkest corners in his eyes. 'Why?' Though his arrogance had no end, his resilience too was now put to a test. Resistant this one. Oh, how he not only did survive, but his mind was holding well, more than what it could be told of others who were or used to be in his own state. Argus drew in and opened the vent that enclosed the door, at which a set of light bulbs started enthralling along the facility. And it was enormous. His eyes couldn't see past a sphere of vision and past that, like water, everything blurred in his sight. 'My eyes, what have you done to them?' And three madmen, of which a woman stood, watched as he peeled the walls and make an affront towards the animals, still, the illness far surpassed everything they could be held upon. They took, each on a side, holding his hands and tightly coming closer to comfort him. 'No. Leave him be alone.' And the voice was finally directed to them, though not as kindly as it were to him. They were nothing else but 'Worms, little disgusting in human remains, do not dare interfere.' And as he was distracted, the field of sight Argus had, finally drew farther away, until he could see. 'Everyone's dead.' There were humans, other real humans. He knelt down and started touching a woman who was left there, her eyes blood, left to rot, of which followed disgust. 'Aaagh.' Argus yelled, suddenly she fell even deeper and became part of the floor. 'Make no mistake, you're still to be punished for what you've done. But I will not go as low as my brothers had to go as petty as their techniques.' Stone became flesh, flesh became then stone. Now there were no dead men and women when Argus opened his eyes. For he was Ferdinand, of another name, of which he was reminded yet again. 'Go and roam in the underground, someone is waiting for you in here, don't make him wait.' Such pleasantries, it felt to him, almost like he was a human, as cruel as one, yet a human. 'Will you free me after?' 'Do you have a choice?' 'Will I feel the same pain yet again?' 'Do you feel it now? Have you even wondered if you do it still? Is it because of me that you're sane or not?' And without his knowledge, he was already moving, step by step, it wasn't his, as he wanted to stop. He saw faces but none of them was that. Are those the humans then, that they were once? I swear I saw them. And out of a wall, a sudden box, permitted by ridges, bent towards each side, fornicated and bent, and extended and cut in halves. 'Find it.' And Ferdinand took a turn. Ferdinand looked as the statuette of a half did human, and out of it another box. 'Find it!' The voice said again. Out of all of which he had previously tried using, Argus responded the most, he could take the slimmest of the control and remained focused, farthest from the brain damage the others felt. The next hall that would've been farthest away, almost like a tunnel became a labyrinth, boxes sprouting from each end until it left but a slight space in which to crawl. 'Let go of me already. I've had enough. Though he was forced, stepping on a box, another coming from below to lift him, atop, he entered like a vent, going closer, seeing it from side to side. And each box had circular holes, from which the endless space could be seen. 'None are real, learn to see the fakes.' 'You've said nothing of fake ones. This makes no sense, you want me to find your box but you're not even leaving me on my own. Can't you see that I'm trapped? Why are you doing this?' 'Learn the fakes!' The voice continued, and Argus fought, to keep still, his body did not respond to his commands, making it feel almost as if he was nothing more than a belittling drunk, with nothing to do, nothing to feel. Only the slight pain of being forcefully rubbed against hard stone brought comfort. Neither did he know that the other three had been forced into sleep, nor that the animals died, of their approach to the destination that laid. So much explanation had to be given, and he was clueless of all. Why he went down, lifting himself on the legs to walk forth, despite there not being enough space. He was shoved by a force stronger than the wind, that trusted him like a bullet towards the other side. The box shifted around, to leave just enough space, until they crushed everything around, from the thinnest fraction of air to the biggest slope of dust. Argus pondered in the small break, what laid forth looked normal as he regained control over his various part of the body he could feel as alive as they once were. 'What are you doing now?' Though he was in luck that man driving the truck, they weren't aware of the fact they were being followed, as in no way could they see. All of which were now dazed, except the circus man. 'Circus man, oh Circus man!' 'Who said that? Are you fellow playing tricks on me now? I won't allow that, I swear, I'll peg all three of you out in a glance.' 'Look at the window.' And as the unexplained voice, he saw other dark cars, so much more distant than normal ones that you'd see. They had no visible wheels yet they could come fast, as fast as they were, cutting through solid dirt and more than that, they were getting closer at an unimaginable speed. The sides were the most poignant feature, as they reflected almost a pure ray of light, a testimony of their sharpness. 'Are those fools intending to ram against my truck?' Though the voice didn't answer, more than enough was said. He knew too well what it could endure, and this wasn't. The truck roamed on the other side of the street since there was none. And as he did so, the sound of metal bars being slammed against sides was so strong, the intensity almost blurred everything around. 'My animals!' Burt mass reacted, which only gave them an opening to attack. They came from behind. And they followed by the sides, and eviscerated, twisted metal that was plunged, a full-fledged attack. The mirror broke on both sides and Burt, the circus man did the natural thing and covered his eyes to escape. No hands on the wheel remained, and he knew that with the damage done on his truck there'd be much to explain, but only if he was alive. There was no time for that, as when he did reach for the wheel, he still didn't fully see, but another truck came from his front, just seconds as he did not hear. He couldn't steer the wheel, as both held his truck in a straight path. It's told in a newspaper of that day. Read and printed, continued, before and after. Varied sources, some claims of eyes sighting before and after, another incident that happened. Read directly from the edition of the Duregand Express. 'Local News. Men killed on a freeway.' A title that would spark even the utmost sane of people. Written from the small office from which they always did, the Duregand Express was a fairly small joint. No one that sparked interest, no one at all. Not in the usual way, until now. Something interesting was caught by them, especially now. Lourraine McFall. She was the one who ruled the joint in her own words, running over a few people of her and a lot under her age, the local of her town. Already, more than mad that they had missed the first burnout and the deaths. Though what could she do? 'What indeed? I couldn't send children to investigate a death scene, the Johnny's would only call their parents which would lead to me.' But that changed, immediately, as the new thing was written, she went there by herself. The massacre she thought. Parts were thrown around, animals dead from the impact, decapitated. Only three remained alive, only but placed into custody, away from her own accord. And as expected, there was no one that was kind enough to let her come to the scene of the crime, for closer investigation, that is. None at all. All of which came into contact with her denied. Though she saw more than enough, even though her sight was blocked by an attempt which failed, she almost pushed at the sight. They were carrying a man, who had enormous shards of glass that impaled his eyes, as the gruesome image of animals wasn't enough. 'At least three or four died that died, out of which a driver died of impalement, other two out of severing injuries. There was another man who drove another truck who died of severe injuries, broken neck and complications. From what could be told by the officers, parents, with what was reported, it was apparent a gang raid, hear. Apparently, the two who drove in expensive, black cars were more than well armed, in the accident, though they failed to see what was coming from them and how they ended. Reports also speak of another, despite the three that survived and were sent to intense therapy, waiting still for a recovery, there was another one. Though no tracks were found. "No tracks indeed." Argus said as he looked behind. 'He could only see the real world when he glanced behind his back, for in front of him still laid the hall, the images of cubes, the torture was still to go on. And it went, for, still he wasn't showed what he had to be shown. 'What do you want to me to see? I know you did not just phase me towards here. Is it all just illusions and tricks? Is this what the celestials are all about?' "Indeed." He responded, which came at first as a shock. Though he continued nonetheless. 'It's how they acted and what they do, to keep the mind and body tender, to feed on them until they grow and grow, grow and grow, until they pop out and devour the rest of what is left. "The end of the world.' Argus said, though there was none to hear his voice. No eye was walking around, nor floating to see the man past long his prime, wearing dirt lettered clothes that could now be refrained to as rags. The accident, he did not know about, though it was clear to him that the three that once followed him were no longer present with him, at least nowhere behind, where he could see them. He went through, further, deeper into the base. Now, there was the test he was long awaited to go through. From above, the ceiling was being rocked and for a second there, the illusion was broken. Argus felt nothing more than what could be described as a terrifying terror. 'It's a real bombardment, isn't it?' He was shaking down the point of kneeling, trying to get his composure back as he laid a hand against the wall. The small bits that fell were felt on his cheek, it was real dust, real bits of tone that were falling. Couldn't it be an illusion this time could it? 'Is it?' He asked, but no voice answered. There was nothing out of the laws of natural that happened, as he looked behind, no vision that was seen. He was in a bunker, no woods laid, no trees, no land from which he came. His hands were dirty and he noticed that he was wearing a uniform, a war uniform. No immediate reason called for him to get up, other than the fact that he had heard the echoes of soldiers yelling through the halls, women too, medics that said. 'Go on. Go go, come one already. We need to go. Take the children and hide them.' A pop shifted his attention, as he saw, blissfully a ray of colours, bright orange, red, yellow, which ended in an even brighter orange that washed them all, in a shell shock of power. It was an explosion, small, from which a lightbulb popped from far away. But it guided him nonetheless. 'It can't be.' No one notices two important things. First, even as he saw silhouettes from the now, more shifted halls, which now laid with and, even more, deeper detail. Frames at ends, doors instead where they shouldn't have been, both the right and the left had their corners taped to prevent static from spreading around, and even the light bulbs were fixed, more than that. The place was constantly shaking in more than one direction, the dust flying in every section that laid. Each was different, even that, Ferdinand witnessed. Could such an illusion change the appearance of something so small? There were white fractions that came out of the wall, with the thinnest white of previously laid paint. And it was getting worse. Even more, than he thought, strike after strike. The memory laid the foundation, and he noticed in front, a trail of ripped out paper. It couldn't be. He said to himself, rubbing his eyes after giving up on the wall. Though, even from the distance, the thief recognised what he had stolen a long time ago. And the time he spent analysing something to have been claims of his own. Purest of a lie, Argus made him be sure that he had written it himself, and only in peril the truth was revealed, now, no longer would he appeal in the midst of anything. 'It's mine.' His voice grasped and he immediately did not care where he was, real or not, as he recognised and reminded himself. How long have I searched for this, at least a copy? Though it appeared, the closer he got, not to be a copy, but more, the original. Still no one around, he made sure to not be caught, knelt by the silhouettes. They must've been agents, yet again. Argus mind tried rationing it, though its feeble attempts were dismissed when he saw, oh the next one, the next page how it clicked, how it was stuck to the other. 'Stop.' The voice said, and to dust the paper formed, only to be left. 'Why? Why did you take it for me?' 'Do you not see it yet? We're both falling into patterns, the same one as my brothers.' The realisation was much more than he could take, even for someone so eternal as he was, he could not resist the primordial instincts, to take claim of the small desires in the little mind of the human and turn them against him. 'But you.' 'No, we must both escape, or I shall become just like them, attempting to devour you, be caught in my own games, my own peril, my own theatre, and my own cage.' Dust turned them in the box he saw and slowly the incestuous fiend turned everything around, burnt it down. Argus was left in the middle of nowhere, it was no swamp, it was no forest, at least not one that would be recognisable. It was clear that no man had ever stepped there, not even the slightest, nature at its finest. Dirt with no wildflowers, he was close to mountains, though unload without a map. There laid the mountain path. 'Where now? Where am I supposed to go? I don't know what you want from me. You don't act like them, I understand, but you're not even clear where is that box, that cage of yours.' 'Find it, free me, that is all that I require, what else would you seek? We shall both be free after, I promise you that, at least.' 'I can't. This world is too big, too enormous for a simple man. You've taken them.' But he was silence then. And the voice spoke even louder as he said. 'I took no one, but there are others who desire the same will have me trapped forever or worse if they find out my cage.' And then, it clicked, it couldn't be hidden at all. But the first thought that Argus was the human instinct to take advantage, to devour the first sign of weakness that he noticed. 'Trapped forever or worse.' Whoever owns that cage, could own him too. The land was crushed, even after his first step through the mountain pass. A mid-time plain wood avalanche. The rocks were solid and sharp, his body felt hard even against rocks, and he fell. And the voice sang, slowly yet sharp, despite the body being lousy and slow. Crackling lightning strikes were just above. It happened in a glance. Standing there, suddenly stuck, nostalgia came at the worst of time, accompanied by delusion from the lack of air. First came the breath that grabbed as much as he could. And then came the memory of his childhood. I was never a good lamb, though neither was my brother. He wondered then, what did happen to him, they were two, after all, separated at a fragile point in their lifetime. Still, it was so set apart between what happened then and now, the past still managed to haunt him from time to time, events, small and big, along with changes. When he ran away, when their mother disappeared, never to be seen again. The memory of the childhood home still brought gloom, the constant rains, the harshness of the place, whichever made him go and turn his life's direction anew. Though, alas, he hadn't forgot either, what his brother did, when he'd always run, and how he ever deserved it. Even in a day of rain, he made sure to remind him and blame him. 'Look at mother! She's like this all because of you.' And he'd hit him with no remorse, almost as if he'd hit an animal. From then he'd only survive whilst going to his petty gang, with petty ambitionless young men just as he was. There was no job, other than the one held by his younger brother, though he spoke none of it, other than the work he'd whisper to his mother when he thought to be alone. 'Professor here, the professor there. Damn that man for teaching him all of that, we can barely afford food and a nurse, let alone him spending his time there.' And even as a youngling, he noticed it, oh how he tried to skip going back home and how he'd be pale when turned around. It was fear. Genuine fear. Look and seen through the eyes of a child. Staring at his brother and unable to deny. The fear wept as did he. For his mother couldn't speak. Prepared only to rot inside a sort of machine. Still unaware, he could only look in bliss at his younger brother every time he asked about something. 'Still going to that professor?' Asked whilst pushed against the wall. The creeks were still there in that old house, the one that had a nail, which one time entered his spine as he yelled. 'Aaaaah.' 'Oh calm down.' Even as the oxygen started running down, after so much time, as the voice kept signing slowly whilst the life draining away. Not even then could he admit who he really was and shed his ego, reveal that. He deserved it. The cruelty had not died, not even then, not even for a brother of his, not at all. Nor for his mother, as the hired nurse immediately came as the child yelled and pushed him to the side. She heard the small blunt young man call her cunt but did not care, even when he bounced right back. 'Idiot, what did you do to your brother?' 'I've only pushed him, that's all. Tell her.' Though there was no audible word coming out, just yells and cries of pain and pain that kept on. So, it was that she came in time and brought the small boy in the room, to cleanse and bandage the spot. 'If I was just a little bit late, or if you weren't brave enough to yell, you'd have been in a worse condition than her I'd wager.' It took a few minutes for him to calm down after being caught in a stream of crying over and over again in session, with pauses when he glanced. Back at him, then back at his mother. 'Oh, how the nurse was pissed.' And now, as he said, he felt even worse than the small child crying, with a kidnapped breath, not even the moisture of the air could prevent those drying and cracking lips from being even more sagged and crisp. It wasn't the first time he did it. There's no way I could find out where he is now, nor what would I do. Though in that moment, when blood rushed through his brain, he asked, now, after being reminded who he was, who his brother was and from whom did he take the notes from. 'Why did you choose me over him?' The features he had were so youthful and soft. Compared to mine. Argus hate even the slightest difference between them, as they were growing young. Are we even brothers? Which was never answered, neither by him? Nor by the mother as she could not, being in the state in which she saw. Nurse? No, she wouldn't even dare glance at me, let alone answer my questions, though past any attempt. Even past, what they thought of any other, they both knew inside that they were brothers, which made his hate get even greater as he did. Night after night, after he was done causing trouble around the town, he'd come only to release his anger against his younger brother, though never did he dare lay a finger on their mother. The nurse was always around whilst her watchful eye kept him at bay. And he treated him like a slave, only to return the next day, once again. Four others, of three delinquents, just as he was, and a girl that they have taken in, stolen from her father, as per say. Argus could remember the names of his peers, even after so much time, though he had another name back then. Their names were quaint, but then again, they were still there for him when they were needed. Angus, Jonathan and Aghatta, those were the names he had remembered and well. Others as well that dwelled in his past. Some that were his peers that followed around, listening to everything he'd say, nodding and helping him commit unspoken things, as he was. 'Damn it.' The voice was being drowned, he felt his body sink deeper, lowered by the roots that laid there, holding him above the chasm inside the mountain pass. From below there was a cold wind that granted him air. 'Finally, he said. 'And then, to him at least it appeared. No matter if he was alive or not, the earth and sky seemed to have disappeared. Or inverted at least. Above, rock darkened but below laid something else. Even then, those who followed him around, it felt to him, more intense. Aghatta, no! That wasn't her name, at least not that he had remembered. They weren't even three or four. He had only a friend back then. 'Why are you doing this? Why are my memories conflicting like that and how come, everyone, before I had suffered such?' Again, the answers might've been written in the journals and notes, though they were all gone. Soon, he'd wager, time would come that the desire to find out would wane, or perhaps be deemed as no his, again. Is it even mine? Do I desire such? What do I want? 'Do not fall into the same trap as they did.' The voice finally spoke, as it dragged him to the other side, like a grasping hand. Thorough the mountain, he was swallowed by the land and threw up in the heat of the wind. And there, put back on his feet. 'Where to now?' Argus asked. 'It's up to you to find it.' Again, at that, though again he was reminded of his choice, and he gave up. 'Where do I begin? Since I've to go no option anymore, at least. I don't even know if I was ever in control. 'For a second he didn't mind the grass, the field, the disappearing mountain, and the mist, he only looked at a puddle, knowing it had rained. The face that stared back had a different expression than what he felt, what he tried showing to himself. Not even that could he control, the blankness that was there. 'Do you understand now, what happens if you threaten me?' But I did not such thing. 'Silence!' The voice did not wane not drop in power, remaining as strong as it was ever, perhaps even stronger. 'We go now, I can't control many at a time.' And why are you telling me, this again? 'You're about to see.' Argus, now accepting of the given name, Ferdinand stood there, with his mouth shut, realising where he was being led. The mist went away if it were ever to be there. There was no glass but hard and cold steel. And there they waited, firearms pointed at him, in the middle of the night, he was caught in a trap with at least a dozen of them, way too many to count. 'Why?' He asked the voice, though it was silent, yet again, waiting there, seeing and marvelling at how he reacted. The shock on his face, in the little moments he was left there was way too much for him to take. Ever spoiled that way. 'Keep your hands up and don't move!' How have I even gotten here now? It was the urban area, one of the great cities, judging by the high buildings and its trademark architecture, Burmingshire. Haha, even for a glance. Though there was no time for that, nor for him to fight back. Soon, as he was slammed against the ground, and knocked out, had he realised, that he was driven directly into the heart of their empire. Somehow he snuck under their nose, only to be caught. 'It ain't much of a change now.' Ferdinand said, bars were of cold steel, even colder than the ground he was slammed against, even as the pain laid another layer to the memory and the small mark on his head felt. And, even more so, it resembled the bunker he had been taken to, previously in the vision, older than it appeared there, with the regards of whoever did the renovation. 'Which could only mean.' 'Well, you're awake.' They were brought with him, though he did not respond immediately, not until he glanced. Agents, two standing near a door in the far right end, the opposite went the same. Another three which were adjacent to an office that was also adjacent to two additional cells that were dead empty. Even more than that, there was one walking around in leaps, from one end he was coming and it took Ferdinand not even a second to guess where he was heading or what did he do. Worst of which, they didn't seem to be altered like those who were able to end themselves with ease. Lifeless, along deathless gases were present or would've been if not for the goggles they were wearing. A gaze, a stop, he spoke some words that made no sense and signalled for Ferdinand to go back. He abided, knowing that, if so it was, for a greater will above his own. Though, he thought. I'll walk knowing this place and its turns. Even if the time spent there was short, he remembered it precisely well, and who knew, not much could've been changed. After he stepped outside, he has forcefully turned around and a pair of handcuffs was strapped against his hands. 'Move.' It wasn't the agent to said so. The cells were filled, as predicted, though, as he went forth, they were there again, though not a sanatorium again. This was worse, as he noted. Spots were visible, where his cell was laid clean with polished bars, theirs was rusted with empty holes where fungus and the roots of a small plant had been growing for a while. Not that it was the least of their worries, their mental deterioration must've been accentuated ten times fold. It was obvious then, as none did even recognise him, despite having spent so much time together. Ferdinand could've said something, anything of the matter, but he did not. What could I say? It made him ask himself, the scene of Angus biting and eating his own shoe, beyond mad, it was the thing one would read about in a newspaper or a book, quite unusual even for them. But another step and he realised why. The expression on his face waned and he grabbed a hold of the bars. It was painful to say the least, even as the agents were ready to jump at the slightest sign of resistance, the one behind Ferdinand simply raised his hand, just to stop their motion. 'Damn them.' It came as a whisper, almost, seeing the past of a small trail of tears that once filled the face. On the other cells, that were ever visible from the angle he was from, he saw them doing so too. 'Move.' Came out as monotone, the agent not even sounding human at this point. How could I? How? You're starving them in front of my eyes. Just take a damn look, they won't even recognised me or my voice. 'The light that once flickered in Angus' eyes diminished, starved too beyond ignition, though he had nothing else to make, other than to protest. Another glance and Ferdinand noticed that his body became more frail, his hands being hurt from the slightest touch after laying against the metal cracks. 'I said turn around and move.' Standing there he had realised, after remembering what happened, the last time three of them came to his house, it didn't go as proper as it did now. Though he was also, not a fool as he had been in his younger days, there's be consequences now beyond whatever repair he could hope for. 'I will come back to them.' And I won't repeat myself again. Now move or I will make you. He'd already been handling the line of Ferdinand's neck without him even realising what happened. Resistance was beyond a lucid dream, so he turned around and said nothing, but went, expecting to see the light.'Fade.'This wasn't the place he had previously seen, being pushed into, the bridge was straight and lead to a narrow path, in front. Though that wasn't simply everything there, despite the fact that it was bigger than a coliseum, there was nothing but emptiness everywhere around, which left him unsettled. It wasn't just the thought of so much space, or how much would it go below, but the thought of something occupying all that space, especially after knowing what he did. They stopped. Both could see and feel fear rushing through the air as below of them a wail started, first, nothing but a slight sound. Progressively, it got not only louder but stronger, at the point of which both their guts were unsettled by the likes of something so quaint as a sound. But that wasn't alone, it was the groan of slumber that had shaken, even the darkness around. The figure of objects was moving as the grant went, the wail of depth, before abruptly stopping. It took multiple breaths, even for the agent to recall what he wanted to say. 'Move.' Something else needed to come out, despite being dark, other than the light that came from behind, as they did not dare close it yet, risking, even more, having it open. He refused to say any other word, but push. Though even that seemed to have lost strength. The moment came, at the time Ferdinand regained his will and turned. Before the man could take a stance and shake himself, he was grabbed and thrown. It happened swiftly and he couldn't even fight back. Now there was no way back, after they saw it, none of which dared come forth. Two stood there, staring, unable to think forth, unable to move or do anything in particular. Ferdinand was stuck, placing a foot ahead, then taking it back, stuck between coming to find his friend and going forth. He had realised, soon why they were all so taken, held and distraught. Now, they were shaken, adults as they were, lowering themselves and kneeling down before a stronger wail came to be. 'I need to get to the other side.' No more would he step lightly, now it was the stance for running, step by step, triggered sounds, from each side, the figures shook. And from the sides, slowly they lowered, revealing that there was yet another level of figures that shook and made sounds. Ferdinand looked around and saw them shook even more often than they did before, hundreds of them until the sound became intoxicating. Until whatever laid to the bottom was being awakened. The stench revealed that it was getting closer. On the other side, the hand froze and started melting, whatever mastering of which they were made out of was either being set apart by the stench, or it was worse. 'I could die. Help me, help me! I can't find your damn cage if I fall.' The dizziness and the moving bridge was getting him into a drunken haze, from which he would fall and soon face. It. Just in time, he grabbed his own ribs, pushing by them, a reminder of pain, unconventionally and unheard of. Yet it worked, he was stopped from falling, after reaching the end. It was a dead end, his own, it seemed, ready to have awakened the fiend. There wasn't enough for a path back for him to look back, for the light suddenly vanished leaving nothing but unawareness of the surrounding. Dead-beat silence, in which bells rang as silhouettes. Their sound was not even pleasant, other than the fact that they wailed like the sounds of people screaming for their lives. Worsened, even more by the fact that it did not scare not shock Ferdinand at all, as he had heard the exact sound before when they first spoke, him and the voice. Those fetus-like being that was attached to it. And his thought became ever more clear, as he looked through the waves in the dark. Those layers were not bells, the silhouettes were not of objects but of them, the being that he had seen attached, though there were many and previously predicted, hundreds of them, all chanting for him. 'Argus.' Came from the back. 'Ferdinand.' Came from the sides. And from every other side was his real name, hidden by a wail that came in the form of an attack. Blood immediately came from his ears and he could feel a few years of his life being taken away. It was silent now, though the breath was cold, then warm, then cold again. Frequent would that thing that hid from the shadow breathe, and move, though the speed was far too fast for anything than he had ever seen before. For its size, at least, it must've been quite the feat. In no way could anything else rival what it achieved, the giant figure, the big head that floated around, hiding itself and concealed in a wall of the wailing children, the screech of the damned. They were triggered as they came into contact, then suddenly calmed down when it stopped. Ferdinand looked at the spot and then pondered, what could be done? What else? Indeed, he went on his knees and on his hands, walking a dog, slowly whilst looking around where else he'd be. The maw opened and it revealed an inner light that lit the room. Still, far away from his reach, he saw a gargantuan size of the room that stood there, and the wind inside, and the varied amount of veins that were thick enough to be used as roads for the fair. And above, where the hard palate laid a giant moulded sack of human remains, still oozing with pain, yet glowing nonetheless. Ferdinand left him inside go out as he vomited at the gruesome sight, of the teeth that sparked and wanted to eat even the small part of the platform he was on. And even more he saw, the texture of its skin, oily and seemingly failing to keep itself still, moving from side to side and jittering at every sight. He could see now, with the eyes almost hellishly red, how much of what he thought to be true revealed itself to be so. Those things, the wall he thought to have seen was actually a net, made of no wire, but the babies with their voices, with the inflated bodies of the barrels, all connected to one another, as well as yelling in a choir. Their hands. How could they be stretched so far, how can they have no legs? Their simple appearance disturbed Ferdinand, even more after seeing them dry as they were, being almost glued to the body of the monster that laid ahead. With a dripping mouth it almost waited, as an invitation for Ferdinand to come, and yet. It was refused, bluntly by the man who did not want to be dead, not yet. 'Not yet!' He yelled so loud and proudly that it echoed, triggering them all. The sound of which disturbed it more until it closed its maw and started wailing on them too. Unbearable to say the least. Ferdinand barely felt the hit as the giant threw itself against the bridge, shaking its very foundation past its resistance and support. Barely, he caught the edge of the other side to stop himself from falling down there in the pit of howls. 'Hold on.' The voice said, with an obvious distaste for whatever was in that room, it knew it well. So did Ferdinand, they were both aware, of what laid in the room and why. 'Why is it a part of you?' Before he could hear an answer, he felt again how the bridge was shaken and the horror threw itself again at it. This time there was a splash, and the cry became nothing more than a scream of pain. It got worse and worse with the second, still, he waited and got to taste. It was vile but Ferdinand knew. As well as the beast, he had felt the sharpness of the edge from where he was holding, though he managed to not get cut at all. On the other hand, he had tasted its repugnant blood and understood that it was nothing but a gluttonous monster. 'It's just like them, the parasites that lay all around. Kill them all Ferdinand and free your path. It awaits, past it, My cage, My box.' Another smash, it refused to go around and get Ferdinand, and its rage started taking, the howl became one of both hatred and pain. It opened its mouth then. And he saw, how time after time and bounce after bounce, half of its body laid there, stuck mid-way, too far to get to him, with those outstretched weak tendrils that used to be its arms. The jaw was only set to the side, revealing its head, one that resembled the rest of them. It used to be human. 'Just as I was. What's the meaning of this? What is that?' 'Your predecessor.' And before he could finish that thought, his 'predecessor' twisted its own neck, unable to go forth and the heaviness of its overgrown head, stacked with fatness and fluids dragged the rest of its body down. Though not before it cut itself in halves. But in the last attempt, though desperate denied Ferdinand's desire for it to be gone. Suddenly a light came from below, revealing to him where it stood, though also more, it anchored itself with an odious umbilical cord, which impaled itself on the hard edge of the bridge. Still pulsating, it squinted a liquid, the harder it pulled, the beast was trying to climb back up, unable to fly again. It wouldn't take long, judging by the jiggling wire that was dangling there, nor was it obvious to Ferdinand that it would break. No, it wouldn't not. His most inner thought. It had seen him and deemed that it was his fault. Even he was aware of his, as it laid forth, the strongest of arsenal that it held within. The gnawing mouth that lifted itself left flashes and flickers of light, as it wanted to gnaw and eat everything in its path. Suddenly, the flailing hand, if one could call it so, reached the sky and bounced against the net. And after, it suddenly happened, though not by the force, that it lacked, to stick against one of the younger ones and pull it down. The half of a beast devoured its own, Ferdinand heard it well, despite not being able to see it. The flicker and the sudden play of shadows above revealed too, how it was crunched and smash, the teeth cutting the younger one before being swallowed as bits. Horror encompassed him after hearing the shriek of that small one being eaten and the sound he'd make, his brittle bones and small insides being taken away. And what he did was only wait, when his power left him there standing still. Suddenly he was poked, his ears almost being blown by the power of the voice that was, as well as he was, mad. 'Move on already, I can't do much to help you here, but on the other side. I will take care of those small human parasites, the rest is up to you.' And so, the hand that was twisted, on the other side of the room, and melted suddenly pushed forth, as the door opened, and the light arose. Ferdinand shook his hand and pushed forth, with his might and lifted himself up just in time. It held its mouth open no longer on the other side, so the eyes that laid slightly on the side could see him still. The floor was slippery, yet he slid forth, avoiding being lashed with the long tendril that was glued to other that he ate forth. He'd eat more, though the hunger still yearned, as the shrieks went one. And the hunger would go on ten times fold since it wanted nothing else but to devour the flesh of a human being and no other. It wanted Ferdinand, now on the bridge, it crawled like a small child, gnawing with its gaping mouth that must've been damaged during the fall. Small glances to the back, the saliva that met with the concoction of both repugnant blood and the liquid that came out of the umbilical cold encompassed the already oily body it had, making the colour change, the scent become more erect. Like a landwhale, it pushed itself, with half of the jaw shoved into the ground whilst the light was fading, on both sides, it reveal the true nature. It was no human nor could it be called a predecessor now, those teeth revealed themselves to be just extra pairs of feet, like lances, making holes on the ground they touched, yet the helped it pulled itself closer, starving as it was. Worse than an insect, and the exit was still far, Ferdinand jumped across, seeing the agents either knocked on passed out. 'Where are the keys?' 'There.' They were left on the bottom of the floor, just in time. Adrenaline rushed fast and there was even less. With a swift turn, he grabbed a hold of one of the unconscious agents, and threw it forth, against the approaching deliberate, of which tendrils, as sharps as speared, quickly and suddenly stop advancing, just to sample. Fourth, it brought food to devour, immediately, in a gruesome way. The atrocity lifted itself up, having no teeth, other than the spears, after ripping each of the limbs, it crushed the meat with a combination of the force and heaviness of the head, until it was tender and ready to be eaten. Repeat the process until the body of the human was ready, it then ate and swallowed it, still unsatisfied. Byt the time it was done, though, with one of the agents, Ferdinand had thrown three others there, the last of which were nowhere to be found. After that, the gate was shut, and in his mind, that should've given him more than enough time. The keys were taken and he opened the cells. Luckily they were universal ones that worked on every lock, as well as they turned fast. 'Let's go.' They followed like dogs, once they recognised, though Jonathan was reluctant at first. 'Why must we?' 'Do you wish to die then? There's hell on the other side and it's coming straight for us.' Thump, thump, thump, it went, the sound was getting stronger, though Ferdinand couldn't believe yet that it fed itself so fast. He went through the cage and tried grabbing. Immediately, he was pushed back. 'You're going to die if you stay. Give me your hand already.' The second time he tried pushing and pulling by the hand, leaving a red mark there as Jonathan yelled. 'No, leave me, leave me alone. You're just trying to hurt me like those ones.' There were marks where he had cried, red trails on his face, as well as the marks of which he was hit, bumps on his head where fractures were more than visible and worse than that. 'They will pay for this, I can promise you that, but please.' They pulled him back nonetheless. Realisation kicked in that the man in front of him was beyond salvation as he couldn't even recognise him at all. One last time did Ferdinand try, seeing only but now how humanity died in his eyes. It wasn't starvation now that drove him to eat, but the madness in which he had fallen as he kept sinking his teeth into his own hands, until the point of which they bled. Even they knew that he was beyond redemption and they still had some realisation that something worse was on the way. For only a madman would deny the sounds, sharper than iron bars, the ground and the plate on which the wall stood shook with such a sound that it could be no beast, from their perspective, but a machine of war. Perhaps worse. The sound it made, the small bits that sprang, it still tried getting in, and, Ferdinand knowing that there'd be no way out, he turned around and told them both. 'Stay close and let me take the lead, understood?' For a moment there, despite knowing that there'd be no a second left, he made a quick decision, either lock him there for his own protection or leave the bars open, hoping for a sudden realisation of what laid there. No, he will not take it, even if I decided to leave it like that, there's no other chance for it, so it seems. Both nodded and didn't look back, though he still heard his friends weep behind. Despite that, he pushed them first, still waiting for another chance for him to come with them, hoping as it stopped. Whatever happened on the other side was uncertain, though he could still not be entirely sure. The hinges that held the door there were almost knocked off the wall during the last of the assault, now he asked himself thoroughly. Did it die now? Is it dead? Should I wait longer? Though a sudden thump came, which made him step back and close the door in his behind. For, after the break, the entire wall that was on the other side was visibly pushed in the diameter of a normally packed house. If he had waited longer, he knew that he'd been crushed. Another push came, and he didn't need to look back as they kept running through the bunker, though he saw what had fallen and how it shook. 'It must've thrown it to the other side.' They didn't realise what he was talking about, though he knew well. More than that, wanting to return, as they had heard a muffled scream in there. 'Shh.' The glare he threw against them didn't bounce back but got stuck with them for a while. Terror, the same one he felt and now, the one he was feeling, knowing that it was still living out there. Even more, now they dwelled in the heart of the enemy. The spiralled tunnels and the antechamber from which they went through left no space nor a place for them to rest. It's been fashioned as a base of operation, that was clear, multiple tunnels, and so many to take. Closed door from which they passed under, gliding below the visors so they'd not be seen. Lights were clear, and the sound of laughter just as well. The silence was important, though he wished he'd had another chance there. There's something more about these agents it seems, laughing and feeling emotions like other human beings. Jolly and unaware, they stood in a chamber, in front of a table with mugs of old ale that was refilled after a refill, so on and so forth, though little but drunks. They were aware of one another, fair to be said that they were weary and dull to what was going on the outside. 'Another one.' 'Hear hear.' Said another. They were in groups of four, each at one end, on a rounded small table, in which the joints of cigarettes had no ends. Their clothes were there, though the same, all that differed from one another, other than facial differences, the hair, usually muffled anyway under a hat, the eye colour that'd be covered in goggles. All which was distinct would either be covered or out of the attention of anyone curious. For a good reason too. 'Do you ever think there's more to life other than what we're doing now?' 'Do you not get tired of asking the same question again? Just drink your ale, you'll be sent out in a few weeks or so.' 'Who could blame the poor fellow? One of his colleges understood just as well what he felt, despite not stepping forth. That pale yellow, dirty black that laid in the corners, dripping to the floor, the colour being washed out, all stone, never changing, though never were they allowed any paint over. Or any of the sort.' 'Aye, you'll get your chance. Just drink what you're given like everyone else.' It was indeed strange, mug after mug yet none was drunk, who wanted to question that? Their conversation didn't go much else, other than what laid around, or the strange noises that happened from time to time. Which led back to it. 'Hear that?' Malcolm asked, out of the four of them, he was the one with the blackest of the hair and stuffy eyebrows. Eavesdropping on the metal plated door, holding stiffly on the wheel that held it closed, he listened for the sound, until it came back again, stronger than a wail. This time he was forced to step back and on his arse, of what he had heard, was not only a wail but the cries of the small ones being dragged there. Slowly, he lifted himself and turned around, looking at them, as pale as he was. They hadn't been there before, in the chamber at the far end, never being called to serve that task before. Perhaps they were lucky enough to not even have their names written on the list. Though none escaped them, never before and never again, as they'd be renewed once in a while. Each of them laid next to pages long, perhaps long enough for books to be written out of a number of current active agents that had their names written there. On left, a name would've been written, from an alphabetical order, next to which a number would be spotted to signal the task the agent got assigned to. It was important that they knew, for the task that was written and assigned would remain to each individual for a half of year or more so. Which lead to them, in a bunch. Sitting on the table, two of them had guard duties that wouldn't be starting until a few hours later in that day. The other got the easiest of it, janitor duty, as, even the most advanced fortresses they had needed to be clean in order to be effective. He hadn't spoken in a while, though. Neither of what he was assigned to or anything in particular at all, other than giving a response. Come to think of, as they stared at him, despite acting awkwardly for so long, nothing else was much given at all. Is he slacking off again? Did he receive something better than all of us? Malcolm always gets the best of the jobs between the four of us. And as if their thoughts alone weren't unshaken already, another set of desperate screams came to be. Now they heard, at which they suddenly lifted themselves, armed with nothing more than the empty mugs, which would no nothing more to the average intruder. 'Are we being invaded?' 'Shh.' Malcolm stood near the door, though he did not move. He set them near him as they waited, each having their ear almost part of it, eavesdropping on their own accord. Two of them had the luck to be on sides and see each side that laid beyond the visor. The light was dim and they saw the tunnel, the grimness it held and perhaps a hint of something big approaching. 'Make no sound or we're all dead. I promise to explain all of this if we make it through.' Malcolm's voice was soothingly calm for what was happening, none could deny it, but not even that could take the thought away from the sharp sound of metal being rubbed against a stone. It echoes through each and every hall, room, vault, perhaps even reached the upper levels, who could truly tell? They were not alone, the bunker was filled with many just as they were, the same situation, other than the fact that they were unaware of what was about to happen. Small hints started to appear at last, as the entire bunker was starting to be tilted under the heaviness that was bound to drag their whole station down. 'Shhh. Stay.' Ferdinand, alas, he held them both with his left arm, pushed almost to the point of pain, just as a tightly knitted group of agents passed by them. None noticed them, though the thought alone made him turned his stomach inside. It was about to come to livelihood, which he could not deal, at least not alone, if it were not for the intervention of the voice, which constantly guided him inside his mind. Take a left, now a right. More will pass here, take flight. Stop. And so they stopped again, and now it got more serious, as these next marches had not only the agents alone, but they were all armed, with real firearms, sharp, long, ready for the assault. Atop of that, he'd have to deal with more of which, kneeling under so they'd not be seen, the many doors holding others that were still either sleeping or distracted. They're all getting ready for something, why can't you tell me for what? It is simple, though it may be way beyond your understanding. The voice spoke in his mind, with silence and care when Ferdinand tried being aware of his surrounding. Not that it did go forever, there were breaks, especially when he thought that one agent turned and found them out, a sudden impulse forced that man to forget immediately all that he had seen. And atop of that, he was keeping the two madmen docile, perhaps beyond that. They are going to war in the depths, for territory. He said. Though Ferdinand did not understand at first why they were acting like colonies, he paid no attention to their games, as, all that mattered now was. 'Freedom.' 'Not so fast.' He turned and saw it, way too late, John was shot in his back and left on the floor, suddenly bled to death. A silencer. 'Your arms, up, both of you.' Only one agent stood there, though, it seemed to be more than enough to do the deed, and an unexpected level deemed so by his own self. Why didn't you save him or warn us? Damn you if you let this go and leave us ignored. Though now, he found out that he was to be on his own. Both him and Aghatta were turned and saw the spiral shaken, the mound of dirt fall from above. She could barely keep herself silent, despite being ready to cry, looking the other way and barely being able to walk. First him and now. Now, he remembered them, as young children. The boarding school, though they were problematic, that's why his voice seemed familiar, and the thought of him so alive. The old teacher was a young woman that was forced to go to war, though of her name, still, he remained unsure. It wasn't a mistake that he thought it was a ruse, now he realised who they were, now he remembered their old lives, though, in spite, it was the moment that came after their deaths. So it happened for him to be forced, and yet another memory emerged. He never did forget though what happened, nor did he previously experience amnesia, though still, the class had faces that made it hard for them to be recognised. Ferdinand knew from the previous experience that they used to be his mates, at least on the outside too, though they were much older there, a lot more than what they appeared now. Childhood friends? 'Excuse me? Are you?' 'Silence now, you wouldn't want to miss out on the class, would you dear?' The teacher's voice was clear, miss Prie was her name, pleasant, despite the need for the war that was approaching steadily and fast. She tried nonetheless to shield everyone from everything, but now? Now there were no rules, Ferdinand, Argus, whatever he could call himself knew where he stood. Walking with his friend, steadily being taken at the gunpoint by an agent who only need but a shot. And at the same time, he was here, in this point of memory, though that was no alone, as his mind was invaded still by the voice. 'Worry not miss, we shall tarry not.' 'Very well, keep behaving and be good boys.' Near him stood another child, roughly the same age as he was, though still. His vision changed, and then like an encircling sight, as he looked at his friend, everything around him changed. Down to brick that turned to the sky, and the bottom in a stream of lamplight, as it was in the middle of the night. Both were grown and it was revealed to him there. 'We're safe to talk in here, at least until you're distracted.' Though the voice of that grown boy now confused him more, rather than revealing everything to him. Alas. 'It is I, or have you forgotten already?' 'You, wait. You're that, that celestial, still? Why do I have to keep seeing things like that instead of doing something? I'm getting tired of having to have to deal with everything that's being thrown at me.' 'It can't be helped.' That was said with almost a furious laughter before continuing. 'Old habits die hard. Though say, you have in front of you a celestial that slim to depend on you and the same goes for you. Until the event foretells and you're taken forth, we've got all the time in the world. Say what you will, where you want to go, just go ahead, that's the last I can do to ease the passing of the time.' And again, he was taken, even faster, at the end of the world, for once, the sharp cliff was almost alien-like, with fangs of the earth, spreading too far, cutting through unlimited ends of giant clouds made of pale yellow, in a dark sky without a storm. Cities stood beyond the reach, though he had no dared say anything since he knew well, none could distract him. 'No matter what you throw at me, whatever sight or memory, I can't lose focus, since if I do, I stand to be shot behind the head, right through the neck, perhaps multiple shots at that. And for what? To have my fun like other did?' 'Would you prefer getting a rash and getting yourself killed? Perhaps I should fully control you like a small worm and make you crawl there until everyone's gone.' It was safe to say that he preferred nothing. Nor did she, seeing her flesh idol be as silent as she was, her mind beyond mad, afraid to die. The last friend she had would meet his end. Even a glance back made he turn away, the agent's grim face was too much for her small frail heart to take. Still, he leads them, avoiding the paths with most of them, who were already driven towards. 'Ehm, stop here.' And so they did, though he had no control, not a real one over his own body, the impulses did the job, more than what he could do. It was no dead end, but her knees were jittery and shaking so roughly. She stood there, afraid, crying but doing it silently, still no clear thought in her plagued mind, like an animal that's based on instincts she waited and did so to avoid more pain. 'I said stop. Sit still.' Two hands then fell down in anguish and she held her knees, feeling the skin almost swallow. Though she stopped crying. And he looked away. The sight she had suddenly turned from being drowsy, to back into an insightful sane trance. Even for a mad woman, she realised that it wasn't her knees that shook, nor as the weapon the agent had dropped and the sound of footsteps in a direction, or even the fact that he was gone. No, it wasn't her, but the darkness, she turned against the command and judged for herself. It was pulling the whole bunker towards declining and making it appearing as if the whole region would be swallowed, even deeper than her knees, inside the most of the depths of the earth. And the vowel of silence was then broken. 'Wake up. Wake up. Wake up.' She repeated at least a few more times than that. And in return, there was nothing but a blank stare and the nod of the head, as he'd followed without a word, wriggling with nothing more than blank knowledge. Now, it was her time, bending down and grabbing the firearm from the ground. There she stood like a revolutionary at hand, nodding back for him to follow back on the track. And beyond her awareness, he laid there at the edge of the world, still, debating whenever or not he should be aware of what was going back, or not. Though, even then he wondered what he had seen, beyond the visions and the cage. And so many of the agents that were there, preparing for something bigger than him. In his mind, it was even bigger than his own expectation, perhaps even bigger if his predictions would be right. 'You did not show me that memory in my childhood for nothing, have you?' Perceptive, are we? Only the two of them remained in the class as sharp stone reverted back, and miss Prie was standing at her desk, ready to cry. It wasn't like her to do that, but now. Now, it was an exception. Ferdinand wasn't here before, when it happened, though he saw her nonetheless. 'Is this the day when she was sent to war?' It was obvious even without asking about it, as, even from the point of which they stood, the small framed picture of her husband was there, as dead as she was going to be. Both of them were, after all, victims of the cruellest way the war had to offer. But, he changed too, despite being there, in the midst of his memory, there was no other care and certainly no distraction now that would keep his mind away from the real problems that laid at hand. 'Is there a war in the depths?' Though he wasn't sure about what to ask, he knew that the bunker was deep, not how deep underground it was, but, 'Deeper. And the worse of it is that you're heading that way.' The new was broken to him, though he wasn't as shaken by it as he thought he'd be. 'It's not as if I had been given a chance anyway. You did not ask me before so why to start now?' 'I didn't ask, it's just a warning and an advice.' 'Which would be?' 'Break them. Break them all.' Before he could ask, finally his vision was given back. Next of which stood Agatha, against a closed door with him next to her, standing there at the sound of the walking feet. 'What happened?' Though her gaze was reverted from the door, there was no answer given back to him, instead, she only pointed in front, where the advice would come to hand. 'Are those?' 'Yes.' The voice felt warm, in the cold stone hands of the tilted base. Despite how her companion could do nothing more but be projected against the wall which held the door, he found himself defying even gravity, as he was walking straight towards it. A set of vessels laid against the wall, and from the description that he remembered now, they were. This was. 'Another celestial. Here? Now? How?' 'Ask no more.' The voice said, as his vision was cut in parts. Purposely, the edges of the room were darkened for him alone until the task was gone, extending to everything behind the vessels unlit, making them appear so weak and easily taken by force or worse. 'But I've got nothing to slay it with. Even worse, it may.' 'Throw.' Instinctively, through the darkness he cut with his gaze, Ferdinand turning away to catch the firearm that flew directly in his position. And so he cocked it as if he knew and got used to it well, despite how advanced of a model it appeared to be, fully loaded down to the sturdiest bulled. In front of him now laid another one of his own. 'But why would you want such?' 'Enough questions, just do as you are told to.' 'Make me.' His muscles twitched and he was slowly forced. The vessels were standing there, almost transparent, in which he saw his own reflection against someone that was already inside. With the power of more willpower, he glanced at the other sides and saw that they were all loaded with other people too, which made his grip even harder to fight against the control. Looking more at his own reflection, only to notice that behind of him laid infinity corrupted by the malignant being. 'Do you defy me now?' The pain was stricken through his arms, not alone as he started bleeding through the nose. 'Gah.' It came out as a muffled sound, knowing well what laid beyond the door that laid on his back. 'Who is in there?' Even with the pain and forced away, he still managed to ask. 'Fine.' And he fell on his knees, being left with nothing but a small break to recover. 'They are dead, all of them, you see? The moment they are released from their traps, they won't be able to live much longer.' 'See?' 'See.' He continued the thought. They should be released from their trap, but what cost? The power over him was waiting, one way or another, which couldn't be hidden away any longer. Still, it remained, what was to be done with them? 'How much time do we have?' The words were twisted in her ears, even beyond the room and luckily for them, it was, since if even one was to enter, both of them would be immediately killed, worse. Perhaps, even plugged into the celestial, being fed as raw and untainted by anything. 'Put me inside.' It would've come as a shock if it wasn't expected, though none of the vessels was easy, there was still a way. 'I can't protect your mind once you're in there.' But I can free them. 'It was a long shot, and he paid no mind to the quake at hand. 'What about that?' Ferdinand turned back and looked at Agatha, with a sight still clouded, knowing that the shaking wasn't because of him, but of other forces that didn't play at hand. 'Stall for me.' At what price you ask me that? Do not forget that I have waited a long time. The voice stopped too, even for someone as ancient, the epitome of being, somehow the information was blocked. 'It may know where your cage is.' Impossible, fool! If that petty insect would've known, my cage would've been endlessly crushed or broken. It's at least worth a shot if anything at all. Acting as if his thought was known to him, as it went to all his ever present thoughts, he was given yet a chance, another one, to prove himself and enter the world that now laid in front of him. One chance. Now the voice slightly went into his mind again. And after that, you will retreat back and smash the vessels, if you live after. 'Just delay as much as you can and trust me.' And you will lay after that and surrender your will? 'I will.' There was no word needed thereafter as his world sunken, shaken beyond his control and his mind was trusted there alone. Some seconds were needed, as he was shot in an unknown territory. First, the ears and his ear vents slowly adjusted to the harsh noises of a waterfall. 'A waterfall?' The hands slammed trying to grasp at anything, as did the feet, trying to walk over anything they could, or trip, at least he would've known if there was a rock, wherever he was, on whatever road, so and so forth. And he stepped, the stream with him, the sound revealed itself to be nothing else but a fountain. Now he felt the material built and fashioned around, the water, as cold as it was to his touch, and even the golden coins that were now easily taken from under his brow. 'I wouldn't do that if I were you, young man. Normally, you're supposed to take and throw one of your own in there.' Said the voice of a man. It wasn't the same troubling voice he thought he knew, not did it prevent to be anything above his kind. Now, after releasing all that laid in his hands, and feeling his feet adjusting, next to a vision, of flickering lights. Fragmented, it was, only vertical lines formed the man, like his jail before, but turned around, he saw him be grabbed and taken from left to right, trying to match like a figurine. The neck was tall, but was those the shoulders? Is that a white material I see? Perhaps this is how the world should be inside of here. Argus thought, even more as he started at the sun, only to used his hands as a cover, to defend himself from the harsh rays of hundreds of floating balls of fire and be asked again. 'Are you all right son? Do you need some help?' Morning Mr Oliver. 'It scared Agus to look in the direction, as, still, despite his ears working, the bell that rang out of the small bicycle was strong enough to sound like the strings of a mighty roaring machine, striking and sundering at the stone. For what?' Morning be to you too Valentine. Oh what a sweet girl, if only I was. Ehm. May I help you? People are starting to stare. 'Argus hadn't realised that there were people around, as he heard nothing else but the man, the water and the memory of the small cycle roaring. Nor did he realised that he was walking on his four, trying to get as much information about where he was and where to go next. 'I can't see that well. But, surely there can't be people around us, I would've. Heard them.' Somehow it had escaped his thought, even after how much he went through and where he was, now there was no denying, certainly not to himself that he missed both of his friends, which laid dead. And she's out there too, along with my body. There was peril there and here too, now being able to see the face of the man, with his wrinkled and small walking crane, standing atop of the stone foundation of the fountain. Next, Argus looked around, just to see the clear exaggeration, no one was watching him now, or even seemed to care. Everyone to his errand, baskets, carrying horses, garnets and clothes. Peculiarly old and antiqued for where they were. 'Where are we? Actually, you'd better answer me, when are we? Or how?' Stall for a moment young lad, you seem to have been walking in circles from the way you're talking. 'As the man started laughing, this, Oliver, mister as he was deemed, has a big belly, wearing orange, red, at least some shades that were all pale compared to his skin colour and the big feet with his big dark shoes. It was important to be noted, as Argus knew, there were none of those colours beyond the transparent layers of the vessel. And they were even more clear there, as the light was devoured momentarily, which begged the thought, did he do it on purpose for me to find them? Buildings were old, it was a town that seemed to have belonged in a folk tale from the books he had been reading from home. Each house had pointy lances that pierced or at least jabbed for the sky. Even the old man looked at him and noticed, in surprise. 'It's really refreshing to see a young man being interested in the architecture of our town. Oh, the days of my youth, if only I could tell you, how much has changed. You see that alley back there?' His eyes permeated through the crowd, looking through a dark alley that was cut, though, like a crescent hole inside a white tree that was bent and twisted on the side, it came out of a garden and made its way there. 'Yes, yes, I even remember the day when it was taken out of there. Some poor sod planted that tree in his garden and didn't expect much to come out of it, though nowadays that house is abandoned, I can still remember him and his family of eight. Children that is, oh and his wife was more than busy as it was. 'There was another laughter that followed, blowing directly through those puffed up lungs. The man, despite how jolly he remained, still hadn't managed to get any attention over them, though still no chance could he was taken. Argus kept his voice low as he came even closer to him to listen. 'Well lad, I can clearly see that you're more than lost, at least in more than one way, so hear. How about I take you to a tour of this town, how about it? I can even call me young daughter since she's already on the way and we can merrily go, just the three of us around the old folk's song. We were already going alone on a small road, just the two of us, but you seem like a fine lad. So how about?' It seemed odd to hear through those round, forks, dancing layers of moustaches that he had, but nonetheless, Argus did not forget for a second where he was, or what was his purpose there. Hence, he came to the conclusion, alas. 'I will come with you and your daughter, thanks, by the way, it's really hard to be young and warily carry around these days. 'Indeed it is, young fellow, just wait for her and we will be on our way. 'This shouldn't be too suspicious to anyone, thought. It was an awkward thought. Does the celestial know I'm here, does he know my name as well as what lays inside my mind? There was no telling of what was or how it was to happen, still. He could do nothing else, but. 'Wait. 'On the other side, beyond the crowd, what Argus could only describe as an adventurer or seeker, ran and almost managed to knock a merchant and his travelling trapped chickens in their pens with no regard. The way he moved and flown through there and the orange clothes made him incredibly animated for who he appeared to be. A younger male, that seemed to resemble the amber he had previously seen in the vessel, which still could mean, that, so. Is that the man I have seen? Could it be? Still, Argus, looked, at the tattered scrolls he had, an orange backpack, some dust that seemed to be merely sprinkled and even a golden lantern that managed to shine ever bright in the middle of the day. 'Another peculiar one. 'Just popped under his attention, though he was quickly noticed and retracted from it by the very man who stood near, across the street, against the lamppost. 'Aye, see. His name is Jeremy and judging for how overactive he is, he must've discovered something from the old abandoned grotto."Grotto?"Argus asked whilst staring for a moment at the man, who now approached him at a slow pace, still, with a voice that managed to cut through, if not, pass around the passing crowd.'Yes, he claimed that he found a grotto under his house that leads to something even greater.These young lads these days, seeking so much unwanted attention, wouldn't you say Mr Oliver?'He gave a small peck and pointed at the young lad, again, watching, presently now how he stumbled over small rocks that did nothing more than shine in the glimmering sun.'Hah.You must've seen his face when he thought he strike gold if you ask me, he's only bought his attire to get some more attention.Ehm.'Another one.But which could be?Argus now came to a dire conclusion, as they all appeared to have something even more grim around them.Perhaps his thoughts could be known, perhaps not, since he wasn't connected to the vessel itself.It could be clear since he, now, could refer himself as Argus, instead of as the given name.If he played his cards right, he could pretend as if he was nothing else but the mere fragmentation of what could the celestial create, leaving the rest to nothing but the lamentation of who he thought to be a real human.Still.Who is the real human and who is the fake?'So what's your story young lad?You seem sort of new now, not to be a tough judge of character or by the looks, have you come from the north now?"Indeed I have, how did you guess?"Perhaps, it's the burn raw hair, perhaps not.Though."That's enough, leave the lad to breathe for a while.Come on now, we'll have enough time to catch on and meet everyone tonight."But wait, Mr Oliver, what about your daughter?"Worry not, for we will go on her way too, perhaps this way we could give this old bones of mine some work to be done."Right, sir!'As a small soldier, he went closer and helped him still on his crane whilst they walked away.This was quite the opportunity, though he wanted to see who was the amber young fellow and what he was talking about, he couldn't risk so many people staring at him.Especially since everyone else seemed to be nothing else but blank facades, being there only as placeholders for what would've been the normal folk.Who could tell anything, really?"Who indeed?"Argus turned, quickly alarmed.Did he hear my thoughts, have I been found out?"Don't look so alarmed, as if you have seen a ghost youngling.I like doing that sometimes with everyone new I meet, figuring out what's what in their mind and what's not."You can read minds then, or worse?"Oh, no, nothing of the sort, instead I like playing the game of guessing, it really brings forth a small flame to me that I enjoy playing along from time to time.Which remind me of another story, see that.."No, there's something else I need to know, other than playing your tricks and asking about part of the town that are no interest to me."Just a second now.'He was pulled by the side, close to the darkest of the alley, slightly being covered now in a blanket of shimmering gloom.A group just passed, three of four, shrouded by their hoods and attires, other than a shining piece of metal that each had.It was just in time too that he was pulled, as no one managed to see them hide in there not try to get even close to the mouth in which they came into.Argus saw himself as even luckier, after seeing the thick sharp wooden teeth on the ground.Leftovers it seemed, cut from a bigger branch.'Lucky talismans they are.'He said in a whisper, though now, as he looked in front, one of the shrouded figures stopped.Argus didn't seem to notice how tall was until one of them came alone out of the group and remained there for a while.Suddenly, the cloak that shrouded him, along what was covering was thrown and laid there by the side, revealing the cast pf bright armour, twisted around thought appearing as if it was melted and poured over the poor soul.Line shined thorough, and small parts where the joints of the shoulders, hands and knees were, bumped over and over, almost trying to blow itself into small pieces and throw its torso just in front.'Don't make a move.It's an agent of peace.'Behind him, the second pair of armoured legs came to be whilst all along, holes extended to reveal the helmet, from which a cold wind came. Agents, here too. Though these were a lot more different than their human counterparts. Suddenly Argus turned and looked at the man and remembered what he said. His daughter. Could it be that? Before his thought was finished, he felt the land suddenly be tilted and he knew that it had happened again. Before light could come out of the agent and his armour made of pale light, he grabbed his shroud and put it back, carrying along the marching ones. 'Phew, that was close.' 'Who are you?' 'No time yet, my daughter's waiting for you now and I'm afraid that there might not be enough alleys for us to take and be hiding away from them.' Argus nodded, though with glances he saw them march across. With one hand he touched, just to be sure of his senses, not only that they might've been dulled, though, somehow he did not trust that he was in the same room anymore. 'Let's go.' He said no more, though if it were true, why were the vessels not smashed, was it out of his control then? The voice wasn't there to answer, the people looked more than normal, other than them. 'Are there other agents like those ones?' 'Everywhere lad, that's why we must be careful, agents of the old monarch, you see? Quite the old shadow if you ask me, to have his agents driven further and further away from where he laid, straight into trouble, perhaps even worse than that.' 'Then why haven't you and your daughter left it?' 'Our homes? Our lives? Just look around the land, how could someone leave what lays all around us? If it weren't for the small warm houses, the bakeries and the tall rap snacks, the houses in the sky, there'd still be a wild life taking over. See those roots?' And as he pointed, the small roots, seemingly overgrown to the point of appearing to prepare for an assault, suddenly retreated themselves back in the depths of the earth, with not even an attempt to hid themselves or what they were doing out there. Just like that, it made Argus, even more aware. For the wrong reasons. 'He's trying to speak with me.' 'What was that lad?' Another group just passed by, empty faces just like before, fake laughter and just a different carried baskets with fish coming from the same pond. 'It's nothing, could we take a break, though, just to stand for a moment?' This road. I have been on, I mean, was long and left quite a stretch on my muscles, and I'm afraid we may not be able to continue together without at least a break. 'Oh, but we are taking a break here, just inside me friend's old house, Grajim. Just wait for a moment here.' A wooden door, tall and made out of an oak, still didn't do much to remove how unsettling those roots were. Looking back at it, whilst Oliver tried opening the door, he thought he saw the flash of skin and a body being dragged down there. If it weren't for the body that laid in the lamppost when he was first taken there, perhaps. Perhaps I wouldn't have remembered. Nonetheless, if he can't reach to me, there's no point trying, I must find a way to make them leave. 'Ready.' He didn't look around for much just came in and bypassed both of them, with such a hurry that he closed the door and left all the smoke to remain. Violent counter came soon after. 'Smoke.' 'Who is this young man here, Sleigh?' 'Don't tell my name near. Oh, let me just take.' Oliver took a small napkin and left him to get he breathe back in after inhaling too much of the smoke. First, he thought of fire, though there was no sign of it, none that would say otherwise. Then, he seemed to think that his sight was being drowned by what he saw around, red and purple, everything from the pillow, to the smallest chair, the rugs under that had each hair of a different shade. Even the man had a turban with a small gem, dangling from one colour to another, filled with a liquid seemingly changing between one another. Trapdoor. His innermost thoughts yelled, right under the dust and smoke, against the covered mirrors that wore clothes over them. 'Where to now?' Beyond the set of coughs, only the muffled sound could be heard, alas, there was the trapdoor, and the system Oliver spoke about when he heard the rumour of the young man. He's lying then, very well, I've nothing to do but play this game of his and see where we go. 'We wait here for a while until my daughter comes, all right? She shouldn't take much long until she'll arrive.' 'Oh, she's coming here too? I should go then and prepare the refreshment and be on the way.' 'Don't bother.' The men spoke quite gently for their rough appearances, but it mattered not. Both were on the way to the kitchen and all felt quite familiar, to more than one way. 'Wait here, I won't take long now.' Argus nodded and kept his gaze array, starting to go around in an utmost deceitful way, waiting. Waiting for another set of seconds, up until the very moment when both turned their back and he came closer, opening the door, despite being small, it opened a door that fornicated a large part of the floor. Like a door, it revealed an entrance to the underbelly, a spiral to the ground, made to look as a slope. And so, it triggered, the blowing, grasping wind tunnel, where cold air pumped in front of him only for a second until it suddenly started to draw air back in as it started to get all the smoke to come in. Made of dark bricks, that seemed to have the appearance of rain, he knew as Mr Oliver came back to his friend that they'd try to stop him from fleeing. 'Not now.' Argus said and without a thought, he left himself to be pulled. Behind, the sound of a mouth closing was audible, and right that moment he knew that he laid in the throat, riding along. That feeling was unexplainable, though it felt ever present, as if someone was near him, neck to neck, ride to ride, being able to feel the road another human had taken right by his side. Such a familiarity of another person was more than unexplainable, it was too bizarre, too surreal. He closed his eyes and embraced himself, as the fear of such speed and the pain promised was far from great, greater than he had ever felt and more. Yet, the slope and the pull continued until he felt a refreshing feeling as he said. 'Water.' 'Water.' 'Water.' So on and so forth, the echo didn't stop for a while, neither did the feeling of cold under his feet and back. And it kept, up until the point where he was thrown out and stopped. A flat surface with no knockback and barely a drip coming out. Such darkness was obvious to him, even more as the sudden knocks that were above of him knocked through the bricks. 'I'm under the city, but.' 'With another look, the way there, still like a spiral, other than the water made him question whenever or not was he knocked outside the dream state and back into the bunker. It was either a war above, in the worst of the case or people marching across. No voice and he remained too far away from finding any real humans like he originally planned to. 'Hello?' And no echo either to comfort him, other than the squirming in the dark, he went on and ran, hearing splashed, nets that were tied on the side, he stopped then. Quickly he examined and felt the roughness of the net, which appeared to be filled with fish. Fresh and warm, barely picked. And empty round wooden holders, though for what? They were set against the wall and left only the mark of something that was sharp and close to impaling. 'Hardstone.' Argus hand came close and almost got hurt by the sharp edges left the stone, by whatever pierced and marked it along the endless wall that roamed to the darkness. Only here, it seemed, whoever came through must've let some area lit, just farther away. So, it must've been the logical way, though who could tell what laid after. Who and what weapons did they have, if he was still inside the base or inside the dream of the celestial being? 'Well.' He walked at bay without a stop, the guide by the wall and the roundness it had, revealing not anything more. Though, he still felt the cold wind and the water under. More nets, many of them and something came into his finger, impaling it without a notice and making him glance in surprise and shock. It was a hooked shaped fin that came out of the fishes that were caught in the net walls, though it was no bone, nor part of the next, none of that could possibly explain the reason for that. 'Aaagh.' Came as a delayed screech, single though durable as he started pulling slowly, his finger just standing there, pumping his blood out before he turned around and breathe. Still pumping, whatever was in the fish, it now got inside of him and coagulated the wound. It was either that or something else. Though he was sure of something, even more now. 'I'm not supposed to be here.' Argus's saddened voice dulled the pain bit a slight regard, though it still didn't do anything else on that other problem. Now a mark of him remained there, even more, as none of the ones who came in there and laid in that town should be present inside, whatever depths he was in. He will find out and have my neck for that, I'm most certainly sure about that, and once it does. Flashbacks were not needed, though he had remembered the rage induced vision coming from a god inside a box. And if that was poison made on demand and through only controlled, the one who was intruded into by the force of another one of their own could drive it made. That, only if it didn't know if Argus was inside, and it could only go so far with the entire charade. He could tell that he was being hunted now, by something bipedal or worse. The splashed didn't come from the bottom of the floor, and the set of eyes in the dark make it clear that something was indeed coming at a fast rate, approaching ever fast with no excuse. Feet started overlapping the walls and they were coming, at which he didn't stop to think about the infection nor the trail, though the scent of his blood must've been inside their noses by now. A look came and where he thought that the fish who had its sting bloodied was taken from the wall. No more glances, focus only in front of you, don't look back. In this unknown territory, as cold as it felt and as much as he knew, more will come and after that, I'll get caught and my thoughts will lay molested, so. With a swipe, he pulled to the side and threw the net, undoing the barely tied, knowing not at its stop, nor slow, but minor discomforts, it's all he needed, rather than to face against their flight. They sounded like animals, despite the fact that small feet could be heard stepping on the walls. And, so, with another curve, there laid more to it, the underbelly of the town, liquids now dripping on the side, many other holes at which he dared not climb back. As, for, whatever followed him, if it was to be that they could follow and walk on walls, he stood no chance to climb on his own. The stench was wretched, and nets were starting to dim out as he went further. It seemed true, that whatever that child had found under his house, no, every single house in this wretched town must've had an entry here, or so it appeared to be. There was no way of telling, nor examining, just going and glancing, feeling the sudden change of atmosphere, cold from the empty hole, the warm in-between, cold again on yet another, followed by the warm of a break. But when there was heat, it was clear what laid above, even if it felt exhausting even but to pass beyond, it was the furnace, the small remnants of coals were crushed under his boots. Small flickers of light even came from there, which only meant to him that beyond there laid either a bakery or a forge. None of which concerned him most, as he was driven, unable to look back at the faces of his pursuers, other than a small chance. The next curve, they're far enough and won't be able to walk on the walls any further, the gaps lay too small. And when it came to it, his eyes widened, another curve to the left, despite appearing to move to nothing but circles, he managed nothing but for a glance. There were something else, other than human, gruesome but rabid, jumping the small gaps without even the smallest of problems, only to have their clothes dirtied by the liquid dripping from the ceiling. His thoughts rushed to their black fur and squint eyes, at even the thought of being caught and handled by them made him forget where he was and his objective. It was either escape or die, knowing that the voice wouldn't come to his aid. 'Slow down. We want only to speak.' And it made even worse, that there was no denying, it was their voice that came, as casual and normal as the one of a human, thought some parts of the bloated skin remained, nothing else did so. They're too fast, deemed by him, after hearing yet a leap, though now there was light, at the end, the entrance to something bigger, perhaps even the chance of escape. And his muscles did not stagger down, even after so much struggle to keep up and keep them down, seeing how there wasn't any net, but the mud of the wall he leapt too as they did before and reached the small stairs he did not expect to see. Stumbling on them, caught in surprise, he lost balance and his vision was delayed, twisted to see only left and right, from time to time. Though it wasn't just a daze, he couldn't lift his other foot until the other one laid on a different step, and so on, so forth, he had to go one after another, then to lay on the different side, a smuggler, den, on the other side of the land. There laid hundreds of them all as humans but slightly taller, hairy, small feet with no shoes, acting like the ones who laid above, acting normal. And yet none surprise that in the middle of them laid one human. Breathing in excess, in and out, he was ready now, after closing and reopening his eyes, to go forth and act normal. They seemed to have stands where they sold fish and wears, others had food from everywhere, trinkets, other tools, more than he could count, from wherever place he could deem. And none resembled one another, nor acted rubbish and blank like the humans who laid above. Some smoke pipes or gambled on the side, others wore uniforms and had swords, but still. Hair raised ears that would belong to rats, at least two or three of them, with deviations of eyes, of which others seemed to be mutated and have extra, which carried with them, either on the back or worse. Bulked, they walked, something pushed themselves against him, at which Argus only heard. 'Watch where yer' going.' Thought to avoid any fight. Argus said not but gave a worrying look, glancing all around at their belts and how peculiar it seemed. There was one who had a leathery one that resembled whip around his waist, wearing nothing more but a small league of small rats that she fed. Such cries were not of pain, but simply just of content, for their mother loved them, as well as their brothers who were not apparent until she turned around and revealed that they were brother mice. White and black, like a girdle, though she wasn't alone, nor did she go without a praise. 'Beautiful, just beautiful children you've got there.' 'Thank you, my husband and I just decided to adopt them, and let's just say.' It was a nod of the head, and he looked the other way, hearing but the giggle after a glance with red cheeks on her face. It seemed that some were more than fond of humans, perhaps it was possible that they weren't any more different after all. 'Stop him!' Reminded by the nuisance behind, there they were, finally caught up in their grabs of blue and red striped, silver edges and a contour of their attire lines. Swords, utmost medieval chivaree they revealed, though scraps of metal and machines were just some boxes up ahead, store to be sold or used, whatever came first, of which he did not wait. Luckily they didn't hear nor find out of who they were referring to, as they all ignored and even let the only human just go past them. As long as he didn't bother or hit anyone there, they treated him as one of them. 'Careful.' Where he went, it would be heard from time to time, for the walk was still long and weary, as he dropped down like a dog, starting to crawl, up to the point where he managed to stick just by, even start the laughter of children he did not see. 'Damn.' Came the whisper, though he was heard by someone who stood nearby. 'You shouldn't be so loud, hear?' It was a woman standing at jabbing at the passer-by, seeing her various shining plates and needles in jars, perhaps marbles or something Argus couldn't even come to wonder what it was. And, even with that, she didn't reveal where he was. 'Don't tell them I'm here.' 'Don't worry hun, I wouldn't even dream of something like that, especially with those filthy pigs just making more trouble than fixing it.' Sure enough, their carrying didn't go unnoticed, above alas, he looked, and saw, as fractioned by many bars, a portcullis of light and wind, dimming everything in yellow, perhaps too far from the world above to be described as. 'Wow.' 'Aye, quite a sight, you should've seen the architecture when they first built it, a marvel I tell ya. I'm Sonya.' 'ArgArguylle is what I'm called.' There was first a glance around before she lowered her head to shake their hands. Peril still lurked and their architecture deployed started to fascinate both his thought and his eyes. Is this what the celestials built, the dream that sucked humans inside? Not even he could resist the urge to stare at the spired and how they bent, dark, green and yellow, pale shades that reached and held the portcullis of light, that dropped water from above. It could've even been the fountain that laid from where he started, though, the same, it would've meant that he went in nothing but circles. Circles, too, as he thought and didn't notice, they were present, though sculpted by stone, and the heads of their masters laughing all around, spread by a facing stone that ran across the ceiling. Somehow, it brought the home-sick feeling he had felt in a long time. He couldn't stare, nor could he stay there forever. 'Out of my way. Now, fisherman.' The sounds of a fight were present at those yells as they were pushed around and hurt. By the small hinder between the wooden bracket and his barrel, there he saw, not far away, they were pushing one another, up until one of them fell on the ground. 'Does this happen often?' 'More than I could tell. You're not the first one to come here, you know, though I doubt we're the first to be seen, judging by your reaction.' There were a pleasant surprise and shock too, despite lying and without the presence of sanity that the voice claimed to have restored to him, he remained oddly desensitised to their appearances. Up, to the point. The ruckus started then and a fight erupted between them after finally being done with standing for nothing. The glass shattered and broke their sword. Metal against the glass and it went just like that. 'Come on, it's going to get a lot messier here.' With her hands, she shifted and got everything that she had a sack that once acted as a cushion for her plates. And she wasn't alone either, others started taking their business away from the fight, none wanting to be caught even further. Though he was hiding, he wanted to stay, despite everything, there was something up there, chained above, held by the spires, dropping with water between the underworld and possibly the fountain that laid above. 'You'll have plenty to see, just look.' So far, he's been guided by the shoulder, turned to look at a fight, basking and coming among other like her, close only to him in the various spots of skin, to see, revealed that he had been in nothing more than a market. There had been only that. What he saw when he turned was only but a small island with another section of not a market, but a full-fledged town, with tall buildings, a bridge that connected and more people than he could count. Everything under his very own eyes. 'It won't take long now.' Though it was more than a simple deviation from what he expected, he didn't complain more than the simple thought of it, he wanted to see what was in that town now. Obviously, there wouldn't be another way and it would've been a false thought that he wanted to enter the celestial but for the saving of the people alone. The promise of paradise, though not present at the time was too much to take, even for someone as he, who knew what the consequences were. And the lives too, real lives that were lost, or not. That was quite the sight, humans were present there, helping the other carry and move merchandise. It was a glance, though he pretended to look the other way, two men that helped move around had the faces of Angus and Jonathan, though both decided to look the other way. It went off for a few moments, in which he couldn't stop himself from breathing in and out, much more than afraid of being called out for what he had done. You've abandoned us, they'd reveal me. And even when they must've passed one another on the long bridge, he looked upon the waves and how they bounce, thinking but a turn would make them glance at one another in an awkward matter. 'Aye, there're a lot of them in here with us, if you're just passing by, though."How d'you know I was new?"She stood slightly in front of him, walking on a pair of shoes bigger than the one worn by a human, though still, it was getting even worse for him to be known as such.Staring at woman shoes, right from the sea, he felt like sailors, if not for the spitting on the rust that laid on the iron bars left there for those who passed by not to fall down.'You're running from trouble, aren't you?'Indeed I am.Is it so obvious that you found out so quickly?'You were chased around by those two, weren't you?These eyes of mine have been deemed by the passing of age, though I can still see just as well as I did when I was nothing more than a small girl.'There was something else about her, other than the strange carcass that covered her, past the hair, her compassion, and the small flare in her eyes smelt as real.Blue, almost sparkling, though still.So did the old man appear the same, past the charm, Argus looked in front and others, at their small interaction, how they'd flicker inside their pockets, or playing with small toys they've found.And there were still those two that died, yet they have come back here, just as he did.'There's no one I can trust.'It deemed not answer from her, whatever she was, spoken so softly, away from the ears that constantly surrounded them.Alas.'But, could you show me what lays beyond those gates?'Finally, they reached, though, through migrants with their charts, carried by many others that passed too, to the giant gate, armoured with statues pointing by the side.'No expense, huh?'They seemed to be nothing more but pillars from distance, other than here, two human figures, wearing royal attire and holding the chains of the island that, in their turn, kept the island from turning away.'They say that they're the founders, though they look nothing like us at all, I'd wager that they're more close of kin to you than us.You know, this has always bothered me.'There were two guards above, just behind the statue's heads, just waiting to turn the wheels and open it, though they were grabbed to a halt, both just looking at Sonya as she was about to speak.At the point, a crowd of small number even came closer to listen as she spoke.'They say that those two are our ancestors, isn't that right?Though what do they have and we don't?Why are they like that when we're the way we are?'Small voices raised themselves as she spoke, either to the point of accompanying her or encouraging her to get louder.On the opposite side, it seemed as if there was yet another one just wanting to come outside and join their charade.If Argus wanted to remain incognito in a crowd of both other people and the others, this wasn't the spot no the time.They all had their eyes either set of Sonya or on him and not for a moment did she acknowledge that they were standing there, carefully analysing what they were doing. 'Then what happened?'Argus' voice was slightly dropped, sweat running down his neck into the already stained clothes.It was clear to Sonya.This man is certainly uncomfortable with it, well, no point to just stop, it's time to move on with it.'They say that, long ago, when this was nothing more than a mound under the ground.'And as she began recalling the story, torches were unlit, leaving nothing but gloom lit by small glowing insects, almost bent at the will in the dark.'When giant beasts made out of anger subjugated these depths and it is said that they roamed against stone and dirt, going everywhere around, they were stricken by the plague.It was then that the fathers came and delivered them from the application that threatened to devour and spread against everything and everywhere at will.And, just as well, it was at that point when they, themselves became afflicted by the infection that made them turn into what our ancestors were.'"Then, if it is so, if I may interrupt, tell me, why are there statues of two people, two humans there, and now what appears to be in your story?'There was more to it, downplayed to every single amount of detail, he had to stretch it as fast as possible, at least that way they wouldn't be able to cut through the crowd.Will he listen, though?Does he care?Sonya found his tone lacking, even for someone in his position, especially when dimmed by the rich history of their past. Though, now everyone waited for her to continue, despite her unawareness of the attention she had over them. Nonetheless, it was made clear, everyone knew the story well enough. They managed to bend the affliction to their will, that is the reason why they're not there, standing in the temporary state, and the same one that our predecessor fell into. "They found a cure." Indeed, but, do you see the one on the left? And his body slightly turned and dimmed into darkness? At Sonya's command, he followed where the bed of fireflies suddenly came to lit the side, reveal how the statue was truly shaped. He didn't stand tall, but instead, he took upon himself to the knee, with half of body knitted in broken rock and laid against the distance, still. He took upon himself to be afflicted again, for the cure that they found only did reverse those that weren't afflicted for long enough to suffer the true extent. There had to be a way. With the flickering of a hand, out of the border, on which there was the bar alone, and the fireflies stood, they were scattered in the air, waving for other, bigger glowing bugs to come in their place. Those bulbs they had were at least four times bigger and the area was backed in even more light, though of little importance that was, other than revealing of what laid illustrated on the wall. Like notes and long roads that had lines, deliberating from side to side, it spoke of what had happened then, the coming of two of them, a secret men that fell into despair. And how they walked. From side to side, our founders that had brought our future with them. Look at it, just bask in their glory and how they ascended and descended throughout the lair of the wailing beasts. At that, more than various lines ran and flew across the wall, shattered but still, more than enough to wake the slumbering beasts. They came without notice but they weren't stopped nor did they give up, despite how frail their bodies were. Look, look! She said again, pointing at them, at which pint they'd go. There was something glowing in her hand, a sceptre, which came directly against the floating insects. That must be how she's controlling them, it could even come useful in time if I were to take it of my own. And, indeed, anything could've helped Argus, especially then and there. His eyes immediately guided themselves away from the spot, back to the walls like everyone else. Everyone stood, still, again, in utmost silence, doing nothing but listening as she went on with how they went against waves, the war. War in the depths. That sounded far too familiar for his own liking, in more than one way. They fought, lost one another then found each other once again. And then it was, upon the highest of the peak. And as she said, her voice, then and there, as everyone was slowing down, and he could see the faces freeze. The air as grabbed to a halt inside their lungs, even to the point where he could see the illusion of time having been made to disappear. Wings were frozen but the light remained and it was clear then, why it stopped there. Far, though still away from the story she was speaking off laid a box, present or not in the story, the voice was strong enough to pierce through the corner of that world and tell him there. My cage, find my cage. And, as well, as that was made clear, so it was that his name could've been Ferdinand, given to be taken yet again. I can outrun here, neither in the real life nor in this dream. And the time came back and she continues of the deeds of their old patrons, how they conquered even. Even. What laid there, still unknown to any of us, and the previous generations, even the new. The thing which lays there is forbidden for us to even dream about it, hence, none of us dares go against the law of the land. Past the prison laid a road, which was stricken in two fold. One remained human, abandoning us, leaving for the world above, it is said, thought not entirely unchanged himself. In reality, no one knows why but his stature is written as if he was getting younger, the farther he went and the closer to the outside world. Our elders used to say that it was then that one of our founders travelled so far alone, haunted by two apparitions, that, he became younger again and gave birth to the world that share of your kind. Though a part of him remains here, emboldened in stone as a statue of his full grown stature as he once was.' Again she pointed, now greenlit, though still dark, the once that stood tall and held the chains for over his shoulders.' And the other one?' He asked without a dark, wondering whenever or not, her tale was true, or even if there was a shimmering fragment of truth inside.' The other one chose to return, though both have healed themselves and cast the affliction there.' And on the wall, the lowest part laid a chasm, dark, getting darker as the small insects went back, up to the point above, from which tendrils and other parts could be seen, though as it went deeper, even their light was devoured by the representation of darkness which laid below. There was another one deep down there, though against where he thought he was, no possible way could've predicted where exactly that was. Though there wasn't need of many guesses of whom they were speaking about. The war in the depths they say, the war in depths. Even then and there, the peril of being dragged into their war was inescapable. And perhaps it was being dragged closer to him than he thought, as the bridge was being tilted back and forth, only for a slight, by the waters that had the scent of battle yet aroused.' Back to the source from which it was spawned from, a tool of war that was deployed. "How do you know so many, or even if it were to be true all that you've recalled? You've shown nothing more than the writings and carvings on the walls. Writings that I can't decipher and images that could mean anything." Oh but I have, I have studied everything there is to know, both writing and manmade, everything that you see there was checked by me, both in appearance and the distant places that lay there. I have gone and taken their path, even. Even. "Go on, even where? If you claim to know the truth about the founding fathers, have you gotten to the point illustrated there?" With this and as he pointed back at the depths, Argus momentarily made her stop. Whenever or not it remained a delicate subject or not, it didn't matter, though what did was obvious, there, there, the beast that lays. 'Would you be able to take me there and be my guide?' Is that the reason for which you came here?' And even if he wasn't sure about the answer, something inside of him, voice or not made him feel as if he was right. 'Indeed it is, but I know not the way, though carry on with your recollection of events. We shall speak of private matters.' Though it was unexpected, this seemed to be the right path to choose, whenever or not, he'd get the chance, to finally get rid of everything and escape. 'Our fathers defeated the affliction and cast it right back and just in time before it managed to spread and feed its children.' Children?' Indeed. 'She pointed and flailed against the wind at which the insects spread across every place, where small creatures laid all across the wall. First, they were nothing but illustrations, but then, it was revealed that some dwelled there, small and barely beating, though Ferdinand laid his eye elsewhere. 'Do you believe me now?' Though at her question he did nothing else but swallow his own words and listen. 'They still haunt us, even now, as their father lays in there, slumbering after dark. And what we do now? We're sitting here exposed and waiting to be taken.' She stopped then after finally turning and having revealed the many faces listening to her. For a second there was a slight shock that so many had come and stood there listening to her, though it faded yet again. It wasn't her for a time she had laid a speech for such an audience, though never had it hurt to lay surprised. 'Poppycoks, that's what we're doing now, just waiting to be taken, just like he was a long time ago before we built what we have now?' 'Where are we on the map?' 'We do not know?' 'How can you not know where you are if you claim to know the way to that?' It posed a threat for him to ask so many questions, but if it meant going to an end, it was worth everything and more. 'Ask yourself this then, how have you gotten here? You can't and no one else can answer that for you or anyone else. Can you?' And as she pointed to the crowd, that, in a long time of sitting silent and placid got excited to respond, they nodded back and claim to not know. 'Exactly, none of us, none of them and certainly. Not that!' Darkness crept around though somehow they were concealed. 'But even if it's true.' He bit his tongue there, knowing that it was still too early to ask for her guidance yet again. She knew. 'Do you still wonder what happened to one of our founding fathers?' Just on cue, he was quick to drag his eyes at the guards above, even when it was getting darker, the gates started to open, slowly, then. 'You can ask the great one, he knows of everything else that needs to be said and ever known.' She leads the path, of which everyone followed, and to which surprise. This wasn't any normal town, that was the least it could be, one an island, under depths, it was an emporium of lights. Lamp they had, of harsh silver, tall and having the insects all caught up, with tall buildings drowned in whichever colour and paint they could find or have fallen down. Layers upon layers of streets, different paths, and many watching from above at the dance of lights that threatened to drown the real light of the sky. Sonya was quick to come by and grab him by the hand, speaking of ill, an advice and wonder of which she said. 'I can see from your surprise that you now understand why is it that they but refused to go outside, or even further than their little bubble, waiting to be burst.' 'How? This.' There were no words to explain, the materials, the shining of glamour they had was unexplainable at most, even the clothes were of royal stature for whom they were. 'We must hurry now before the second part come and I'll have to bliss.' It took away. It managed to take away, as he went further, the others slowing down, to understand. Everything was so clean and radiant, even to their reflection that it made them, even with the help with, but a glance on their expression, that they were putting themselves beyond repair. The plates, the puddles, the surface and everything had a reflection of what they really looked liked, and it was obvious even to Ferdinand, why they fell so deeply in self-pity. They hate themselves and how much they look alike to those vermins. But she still had her hand gripping and handling him away from their gazes, down the alley, and past a pit, she leads him towards a place that was unknown to him. 'Where are we going?' 'To meet him and for you to be registered properly.' 'What do you mean by that?' He asked surprised as he didn't know what to expect from the encounter. Lowlifes. There was a deeper embrace of which his thoughts came to be after they kept walking, near the braces of the inner city, where they stood there, smoking blunts as cigars. They were big and their succour could be felt even as he passed by. Such rags and so young they were, despite what they looked like, the small band watched them come around. 'Ignore them.' 'Wait a minute.' Fifty feet more and there was a small tunnel leading deeper into the city, after a small slope, which already was halfway passed, he decided to stop. Now his presence was taken, as they turned. Eight of them perhaps, more or less hidden in the back, in corners darker than the soiled wood he passed whilst coming there. There was another glance that they allowed with a nod, as he looked down and noticed a couple of the black blocks turned to grey ashes along a few bottles of distilled liquid, still dripping and seemingly infecting the very stone it had. That must be what's affecting them, those drinks. Through ragged clothes and through the holes there were the marks of bodily abused, greenish and a canine red skin was left on a large area that was expanded even to the point of getting a point of growing fungus. 'Watcha doing in our part of the town?' From the voice, it seemed as if it was nothing more than the adolescent kind, though what actually surprised him wasn't their appearance but how easily he recognised them. More than that, how easily he recognised himself into them. 'You won't want to start anything with me, trust me.' 'Oh, right? Hear that? The little human thinks he can come here and cause.' Before he could go on and pull out whatever laid hidden in his back, Sonya pulled and dragged him away, against the mantle of darkness which laid on the said, as it encompassed them both, letting them sneak away. 'Why now?' 'Keep your voice down fool, and watch.' Sonya kneeled both herself and him in an attempt to not hinder and give away. Though the party was, from the looks of them, already spread with dirty weapons, some petty knives, but dripping. Perhaps the same substance that laid as well on the blade as on their belching bodies. 'One drop of that and you'll be in deep trouble.' 'I don't need your help, I could as well have dealt with the four of them.' 'Don't you mean eight?' And after both whispers faded, it appeared as if two to three additional ones came into the light, as it was safe to say that they were the only ones. Others could've been hiding there too, just as they were watching for any sign of them. 'This isn't right, they're not supposed to be here.' 'Who isn't? Those rascals?' 'They're not supposed to be there, not that many of them, they must be planning something.' They did seem quite friendly to him, laid down, other than their numbers and compared to his youth. Back then when he had a gang, though not sharing their appearance and their flawed act. Have they ever gone as low as we had? There was a time, long ago, in his town, at the point when he had trained his friends and taught them his own trade. It was then that he acted like a huntsman, or at least he thought of himself to be the way, managing to learn from the thickest spots, from the easiest ways to outrun whoever tried interfering with their plans, to the best hiding spots, up to breaking in houses, though the thought remained exaggerated. Only one thing remained to be sure, of what he had been doing then, and how he made them aid him in robbing his own house. He knew that they'd not recognise him and other than a guess, he was rested assured of his own doing. The door was blasted out and they were fast, he had seen them again, a second time, and even in-between his memory and their previous glance, they all avoided eye contact, or even speaking. He was walking with two dead men though no time dictated them, nor their action went further than they should've. Is this a memory I'm living through? He wondered at it, being the last to enter his own house. The corridor was dark and the street lamp behind him illuminated just enough a point. Unexplained territory, it seems indeed. His hands looked real, and they responded as he moved, even though he was left alone. So did the street behind him, as it looked as if it was about to rain. Dark clouds, they pitied him, for he didn't remember stopping now. This could be dangerous, if it does affect my mind, it could replace my memories or worse. How much could they replace and what was the true effect on his mind? There wasn't any way of telling, though it looked and felt too real. 'Wood.' He said as he touched the door, removing his glove past to a point and firmly going all around to feel its texture. It was indeed wood and there wasn't any response to reveal neither the gang nor that Sonya was around witnessing the episode of the madman. And it remained, to enter the looming darkness that laid there, off the street. Silhouettes were coming, and, just like before, it was way too early for him to be seen. It's either that I enter now or risk the chance of being seen too soon. Enough damage had been done, though little as it were, more damage to the memory couldn't make it better. Two wrongs as they said. The door was slammed immediately, as the mood changed to ever dark. If there were glimmers of light that might've come from outside during the passing of the silhouettes, now there weren't any left, which could only mean that they had left. No one should've been at that hour outside, witnesses coming and going on their own accords. Though something else haunted him and his memory, other than the dark, he knew well that both his mother and his brother were in the house still sleeping. A crack was after a step, the floor was just as he remembered, though the sound was off tone. There were still some of the things of which he failed to remember properly that showed around, as a cabinet on a side that had pills, though the labels, still visible there had gibberish written on the labels. I don't remember well whenever or not I checked what was inside, though I know for sure that there had been some time spent before entering the other wing. Another look followed, immediately after the thought, of which he opened, revealing that it was left open for him. A small cut was made against the lock of which it was cut without his knowledge beforehand. Just a bottle then I'll go. Words appeared though they were nothing but mere words, the ones of which he's been running for a while now, the same ones as before. 'Find the cage.' Again, it seemed as if it was turning into an obsession of a kind, at least more than what he wanted and needed to be. He's trying to come back in, first the voice, now the words. It became apparent to him as he went on, seeing the mark of water on the floor, though it hadn't rained. The bottle was kept in his pants, knowing that there was a chance, if he came back into the alley to find it in there, despite the time and location, no matter how far and long. Beyond both, there still was the room he was in and even there he wondered if he was still facing the vessel unmoved, with danger in the base. It can wait, for now, he leapt into a stillness between a crossroad of a room that leads to the living room and one in the front. In his right laid the stairway and there was no doubt that in the room above there was his brother, reading in the darkest hour that came. Shadows crept and started stealing and grabbing in the bag, of which he had remembered, triggered, though the knives that were reflecting small fractioned light coming from outside shouldn't have been there. And they're stained too, dripping as well. Argus didn't know what to do, either it was to continue and try to act as if in a play, or act however he wanted. They could be the ones there, or it could be fashioned just for myself. He hadn't perceived nor questioned how time slowed before, though possible ways could've been explained if the world acted only for himself. Though if that were to be true, the celestial would've most likely been aware of his presence there. Now all he did was a question when the time was most opportune, as they couldn't see them, even with their light despite him being able to see. Did it matter then? When he was stopped and cars went through? Does it matter now? Very well. He paid no heed anymore and joined them finally, looking at his hand and seeing but a knife. At which, with the image and finally the noise of his little brother waking up to see what's happening, laid a wicked smile. Now, he truly awoke, after a glance. At least two bodies laid on the ground, and just as he looked at his hand there laid the blade with their blood on them. Strange how it came to me, as I did not even feel the force needed for a stab. 'Are you coming or just going to stare?' And there she was, Sonya alas. Just a part of her was roughened up, though nothing else seemed to be missing. Two ears, two legs, some wounds but no deeper than what they appeared. 'I've told you I could take them on.' 'You were lucky, nothing more. Not to mention that they will go and bring more of them on their way, seeking to avenge their fallen.' Thence, he leapt again, now through the lowered enclave, both coming together, neck in neck, riding through as if nothing had happened. Now, it was clear that, after forcing himself to remember, it had been revealed that no damage was done. The memory of what happened before and now the new one stood there, side by side, though, even more than that, it had been revealed that the celestial hadn't reign dominion over him. Nor could he be forced to relive his memories for far too long. Now, just to follow her and try to escape. Arrogance followed, after yet a turn. 'Stop.' Sonya grabbed and pulled him, in an empty hole in the wall, from which they both hid. Two guards, perhaps the same as before, though he couldn't remember what their faces looked like. They weren't searching but trying to escape. 'Something still isn't right.' A wail still came from inside, grimace and had a scent that reeked of dead, rotten and rubbest against hard lead. Too specific to pinpoint from which he remembered the scent exactly, though he was aware still that he had felt its full extent from somewhere. The two of them were still on the run, being as obvious as the flickering of daylight that their bodies blocked, leaving behind only a dance of shadows spanning across the cold walls. 'What could it be now?' She wasn't sure either, despite swearing to have known the city down to its smallest crevices, and at least that he knew not to be a lie. It could be caused by an external source, same as it happened before. This posed a threat, bigger than he thought, especially since, if change dictated that he'd have yet another vision whilst walking there, he'd not escape alive. 'Follow my lead then.' He said, again, in a hollow of a tone, leading slowly with a hand on the wall, as cold as it felt. Again, his fingers went through the small empty spaces that laid in-between just as he tried figuring out why did it feel that way, how could his senses be twisted like that. It wasn't important at the time, yet the wonder alone, and how it felt was deemed to be more than interesting, an obsession, to understand. Celestials, speaking through, messing with me. A vision blank that went through the scent and the dirt that laid on the bottom, grass spots that were taken from somewhere and abandoned only but after a step. 'Is there a field where you're taking us?' A small spot I guess, there's a garden if that's what you're talking about. Ferdinand showed her the small fist he had grappled from behind, the way he felt and handled it made her think for a while, in the still-dark. 'They came from there. But there's still more to go, and to think they'd have run so far away.' 'What are you talking about?' 'You're new and I doubt we can speak much here.' 'I've got the time.' Though yet another wail showed off that there wasn't yet any. She was stubborn yet, refusing to return, a lump laid in her throat, as it was decided best. 'For me to go on. I've known this road for more than any other and don't doubt me yet. Just try keeping up.' And he did, for a while at least. It was rude to look directly upfront, as there now laid only but an exposed skirt and a glimmer through the dark. Little did it matter though as they were both coming and feeling the heat come throughout every single part around. Dripping from above, still no light now and it got even hotter as they went on, almost to an unbearable level that couldn't be ignored forever, at least not by her. There were signs that she was slowing down. 'Are you all right?' 'We can't stop now.' She didn't need to tell why she feared of what she thought of, which was more than obvious of what she thought. 'Let's wait for a little while, at least.' 'I've lied to you.' Now, she said, as she laid along the wall. It was clear that the wail came from the end of the dark level from which they were going, though something else laid above. 'We haven't managed to fully get rid of the sons.' Despite the dark, a shed of fear he felt there, feeling the heat almost ransom both of them, especially where they laid. He waited though he made some steps, closer to going faster where she stood and ready to abandon before it laid too late. The fur that laid on her started falling down, something he couldn't do much to prevent or help. 'It's because of us, we. We tried feeding and taking care of them, that's how.' Before she spoke again, she grabbed him another time, though it was easy to feel how much of her strength left her there and now. 'Go to him and speak, he'll know what to do.' 'Are you going to die if I leave you here?' 'No, but you will.' The founders did that, though we failed. Her thoughts were now bitter, and he was slowed. She just couldn't let go of his arm, now oozing and being stuck against, the fur and a layer of her skin were lowering and falling apart right under his very nose. But, still, he knew more than enough, what would happen if we went on and refused to go on. And, he had a good idea of what laid above. 'They like dark corners, and they can just as well adapt.' 'Let go of me.' 'I can't.' And before waiting for her to speak again, he started attempting to flail, causing her more discomfort, all until he had enough and threw her on the side where she fell there, laid forgotten, right under a pool that dropped for above.'I will send help.'He tried saying, though it was nothing more than a lie, of which they were both aware and spoke nothing.She will end like those that were infected.And then he remembered, just as he thought, the previous encounter they had, the marks they had above and beyond their open wounds.Though before knowing he bumped into another, still fleeing like the others and for a moment froze into a position being mid-flight and an attack.'Don't hurt me.'A young voice said, thought he must've been just as tall as he was. 'It's not safe, let's go.'Three or four just passed by, more and more fleeing at the point of even that who he had faced just managed to sneak past him, fleeing as he was.'Don't go there, it's.Dangerous.'None of them seemed to care, though now the light of torches reveal what it was, the old tunnel filled with overgrown roots.Rotting.He tried peeling one, just as two legions of them passed by in a hurry to escape.The wailing continued, perhaps more amplified than it ever was.There wasn't any way for him to escape the incoming doom he'd have to face, going straight right into the mouth of the beast from which he wanted to flee.Just like they did, the threat felt real, even as he heard the screams behind and imagining the pain felt by the caused by the upcoming heat, there wasn't a way back.Plenty of them were aware of the danger yet they chose to face it against what laid out there, at the point of no sympathy being shown to him at all, the madman who deliberately chose to approach the peril.Other people of his own kind as they have said passed by, and with the help of the smoke and the dust, they weren't too much different than the others.No sympathy was shown to him, not by them nor by their peers, at the point of which to them he didn't even exist.Just another man to be abandoned and die.Voice came from fear and exposure to the bitter materials that laid above, close to the ceiling and worse.What's my name again?It was not the time to ask himself nor was it important for him to know, given or taken, the closer he came towards the point from which the light sprouted, and the same one from which the crowds came left nothing more to him but wait.Wait and bear through crowd and crowd, so many people, perhaps yet to many to count, he didn't stop, though.Now, the waygate was open as he forced himself to go through, breaking their small stockade, pushing smaller ones off to the ground where they took their time before lifting themselves up yet to run.There were too many to count from the inner sanctum from which he entered, perhaps more than half of the population of the city, at which his eyes widened yet in the shock.It wasn't from that alone, neither the size nor their form could gather and do such a rection as which he had felt then and there, seeing the wailing point and the spire.The giant reigned over as a cathedral of scorn, as tall as the dark sky above that was shimmering in darkness inside a hole.The way up was dark but that wasn't which was scary, most of all, though no matter how far it was, he saw it again.His.Theirs.All of theirs.'Predecessor.'His shoulder was hit many of times as more passed, he was to be hit more than that, many more times, until, he thought of running yet away.Such a giant thing and its attention came back.Its repulsing body was still trying its best to climb and climb upon the spire from the point where it impaled or was impaled, holding by the spiked base up until even is hands were there trapped as well.Hardly, it twisted its fragmented jaw that was done to its flaccid bone, deeply inserted inside and dripping down, infecting the land under and signalling that he was seen.Now, Ferdinand had realised why they were all running, now he realised why they were all afraid.It tried its best to come and-and drag itself, remembering too, even through the empty crowd, that he was so different from them, so much recognisable, alas.Along the vile that fell, the lack of teeth and a system of tubes that were now visibly twisted inside its neck, it tried even harder to grab and pull away, saliva dripping at an even faster rate.The sight made them faster to come, though the spire refused to fall, it just refused, standing harder and ten times stronger than it even was. The crowd got harder to get through, and the scream made it even worse, as the choir went on saying. 'Begone. Run. Madman.' And worse, they were afraid, knowing and expecting it to be like what was inside the passage, only more evolved, at the point of which he wondered. What could it really be? Sonya wasn't there, though it was time to find out. It seemed as if it used to be a city, inside the darkest part, near the wall against which the spire and the predecessor supported themselves, among the many buildings with their visible wooden pillars held there to stay. So many houses to be abandoned. He looked down as he thought. Small bears and toys, ripped apart and drained of all the joy that was felt by them, children had used them previously to play, smashed and crushed under many dirty feet now. Ferdinand looked around again and listened to the crashing sound of rotten bones being rubbed against the material of which the spire was made out of. He couldn't pinpoint what it was nor what it felt like, seeing the vibration across, which made his heart get sunken into the dirt. Even the green field, of a garden, had its fence broken and laid around, they were getting rougher and rougher, as a stream to come by, and now it seemed, that there wasn't yet a chance. There came the final strongest wail, and it could wait no longer. More and more stopped by the stream and watched in surprise. Or was it fear that he felt too? It suddenly stopped resisting nor could hold itself anymore, not feet to support itself, the hands just as sagged, instead it threw itself and with the force of the spire, ripped its jaw from the rest of the hand and fell down, knocked back and forth by the tall homes which laid, even more, planks which came to it. A ray of dust, almost like a hurricane came by the feet and they looked still. 'Is it dead?' 'Could it be?' Most kept the wonder and their comments as short as they could if said anything at all. More and more tried or attempted, though nothing could come out. Their senses as well as the voices from which sound boxes dared try to come out mostly failed with each inaudible attempt. The assault was night and in their minds, everyone expected to die, as the landing wasn't enough to say the fiend. And no matter how hard it would shimmer and wriggle, crushed and stab, the sound it made as it forced itself to go further away was unbearable to listen. Now it came that he couldn't go past the running mass, too many moving at once and trying to get the past was close to being impossible. The flailing beast didn't stop, making the ground tremble harder and stronger as it approached, now without a jaw, which had already been sunken further into the spire, abandoned there to rot. It needed not one of it, though from whence it came, he tried thinking. 'The chasm!' Argus pointed as he yelled, finally realising where he was so that he'd be able to think and understand. It must've been pushed back, though alas it meant. Another glance around, and the more he touched them, the more it seemed to him to realise that they must've been malformations, mutations that were alive. A base must've laid, also he wasn't there anymore, the celestial. Too much was there to think about and even less now, that he was pushed about unable to see straight or even attempt to come back. Without the promise of safety and removed from the voice, he wanted now to remain alive and joined them, running among them and refusing to stop. There wasn't any other way back and above him laid the way back, tightly squeezing through the hair nets that laid around. So much sweat ran between him and them though he dared not speak a word of it, not now, neither at the point of which their screams resumed back as well as ten times worse than before. Worse things have happened in his mind and yet more remained to happen, hearing the buildings crushed and slammed, the screams of agony didn't leave much to be expected, other than what the abomination did with those who it had gotten. Still, he couldn't fly nor hover round the air, which was more than fair. But, for a moment, enough space seemed to deem that he'd escape, more than the half-way back, hearing them speaking. 'Faster, faster, please, it's just behind of us?' 'So fast?' Even Argus was in shock, how could something so big and left in pieces be so fast, and yet again, it managed to wriggle and block the light, or at least the one that was natural. Dark sounds could be heard, it was revealed, cogs for a machine were in the cracks left by the shattering of the wall. 'The predecessor is too big to fit.' Though none of those around him understood what he meant by it, being too preoccupied not to die, they tried their best to keep up and not make a sound. Cogs and wires ground at its skin, melting as the heat began, moans from something from far above. The light from the torches revealed the red malformation and the small tumours it grew on its skin, oily and moving, right where he had went. Sonya wasn't there, though it remained none of his concern now that he had fled away, running as fast as he could, without a glance behind, to see how the body being pushed by the walls, taking the form, whilst being ripped apart. Others fell and were crushed under, though by now Argus had no care, not even for those other people or who they were. From above? This must be what the war in the depths that they were going to. He'd wonder and deal with the agents after he had taken care of that, now, he could only fly away and try to escape, avoiding the poison that fell, the roots feeding and dripping on the cogs. Soon there'd be a meeting between the predecessor and the unknown ceiling-lurking terror, now being less flaccid and more active. So much heat came from behind, it had gotten from an unknown source, at which Argus threw yet another glance behind where he had seen it grab and handle a machine. It must've been pulled from the wall and used as a replacement for the jaw. Cogs were there and two iron leads along a block of metal, red and lit, still going and active despite being pulled. It was so close he could feel it run, though so was the exit, and the leap against the wall, only to avoid the dripping from above. Those flailing gripping dark hands didn't belong to it, though terror was felt by everyone who was to be caught and touched by them, as they dropping yet more with the same poison that was present in the drinks most seemed to have. Bottles in bags and other trinkets taken, soon contaminated, at which Argus had nothing to sterilise himself, nor protect. There was only a way out at which he pushed others that fell and slipped on the moisture, unable to get up now, though, it was too late. The sound of metal being rusted, the machine in its mouth soon to be activated, and now. Now, it leapt, the creature that laid above let itself fall straight to the machine, on a side whilst the other, unknown. The sound was terrible, as was the scent of burnt skin and hair which permeated throughout the entire small tunnel. Thought in place, it tried to escape, making everything shake, and the wail, even darker as if it was afraid to be slain there and now, in the dampest of depths. Then, it felt as even the moisture of the air had fallen and dissipated in the air, burn as it were. Way behind there was a pit of fire, though no flame arises, being as it was, the only way to describe the infernal heat that came, melting and forging on itself as a sack of meat that still followed through. It refused to give up, but so did Argus, especially since he knew the way back. Now came the open streets, the lights above starting to dim out, night even in a covered hole was about to come. Around there could've been the cutthroats that looked for him at the point of which he plainly and casually stepped on the blood that rots at the floor. 'Help!' There came a sudden shout, thought it was drowned in many other who were fleeing for their lives, and in their path, as many as they were, they managed to crush to bits and pieces every can and smaller stone that used to lay on the ground. If that weren't enough, he looked around, but for a glance and saw them step on one of theirs, yet again, without even showing a need to care. None did but why could say, the peril was far at hand, at a trail of black smoke, some looked behind. Waiting still, until it turned out to have become, a rain of black that fell and made those touched by the smouldering plague waste their insides still without even daring to attempt lifting themselves up from the kneeling position in which they stood. Whatever laid now inside the cove, the abomination made of black and cold, he didn't need to lay eyes upon, as he knew still what it'd do. Though still. I have to go back. Argus thought as he took a turn, whilst others either spread wherever they could lay their small damaged feet upon, he took a hard right, cutting through as a parent through children who didn't even dare question, yet think again. Some have said. 'Madman, madman. Where'd you go?' But quickly turned flaccid after a glance coming from him, demanding ill and hardness as it went. The predecessor wants me, perhaps he'll see that I went through with the crowd. There wasn't any song still and the city yet laid to be abandoned by those who desperately wanted to escape. Such a place. Etherly wonders gripped at the city and it was almost as if a tidal wave came from underground and made the entire isle slide from side to side. It was only to a moment that he managed to grab the base of a street lamp that he didn't fall like the others and was thrown around. With that and the quakes, the assault was nigh, the beast was sent only to assault, and there was only but a way for him to go. 'Don't let go.' And nods came, something he hadn't previously notice, but little children, fur about, were clinging and malformed as it seemed, their little hands fell apart as the strength of the wind. 'Damn.' He yelled though those matters felt bitter and cold, somewhat not belonging to him, neither to anyone he'd dare know. Somehow he found more strength to go about and twitch his head to see, the way from whence the hole was yet blocked, though features revealed, it was still alive, still twitching. Once the land and the island regained its stature, he could walk again, though daze, as were the others. Buildings were falling apart and it seemed that furthermore above, there must've been war. The great above, though it seemed as if it had more than enough sturdy stone-built by ancient people still shook, unable to sit still. Enough was made by feet alone and Argus was sure of it. 'If it was me still, it'd be impossible to tell at all.' Now, after touching the end of a door, it opened to another memory. 'Bad timing.' He said, as he thought, how demeaning his distracting delusion got to be, at least, it wasn't as far as before, though still in the days when he was young and sturdy. After dark. It came through as a jungle, with roots that grew up to titanic proportions against walls and buildings made of stone. He has dressed apart and many others were near, all as he remembered, a party and a trip, though not even the sight nor the play of illusions could save him. A tree just fell, tall and round, too perfectly to be made of wood. It made them scatter just like ants, and almost crushed the old ancient abandoned structure, yet to see. 'Damn this. This must've been a pillar.' And at that too, he remembered now which laid, the architecture build, and how it bent. Tree with holes and twisted long, far and wide, it was hard to fathom at all. And still, he kept on, they abandoned, yet far behind, too many others wearing their suits, to be called human. His hand went through the tall grass and leaves and cut through as if it were. 'Nothing but a glorified layer, I know now.' 'You realised.' It came as a surprise, that the voice came immediately back and burnt leaves and trees, revealing the dark blood on the one side, far behind of him dripping, whilst on the other, the apparatus of the city standing to lay in utmost flames. 'How far have you been with me?' 'Ever since the bridge, or have you forgotten?' 'I forgot nothing.' Thought it wasn't true, even now he failed to be in shock and realise that the dripping substance was approaching, far apart, the thing was now bigger and fed by a symbiotic embrace with another friend, just as worse, perhaps even worse than it was. 'Find it, and slay it, as it was laid alone, just waiting to be put to an end.' 'What about your?' 'After.' The voice spoke again. Another pushed out of him. The sound that came from behind made it even more clear than before, the splashes and the dark. He turned around and saw it finally lift up and it was almost at started state, perhaps a couple of times larger than before to say the least. Over it laid the things, black and slain, yet a part of it that remained, covering the gap between the lack of jaw and a machine, some parts melted and bits of rocks were still impaled inside of it. 'It's still alive.' The predecessor. The voice spoke, monotone yet again, almost as if it didn't care. 'Do not stop.' And he turned and walked yet another step, though even with forced control, he couldn't help it but turn back and look about the malformation, to see the two hands rise and bulked up, at the point where they have almost blown apart in pumps of meat. It must've been caught and set apart by small joint-like needles, bone-like spears that kept it even more from falling yet apart. They weren't belonging to it, at least not before, they must've come out of the slain terror which dropped its blood, ever black. And still it refused to follow, the masses of hair, and instead, it chose to follow him without repenting, it plunged, but not far away, two arms that came into the dirt. It wriggled and vibrated for no reason, but to give him time to escape. Confused he turned around and hear the body fall again, against its own heaviness and destroy the ground, crushing it, even as the island was being ripped apart. 'There's more still here trying to escape.' It came as a surprise, even as the thing came, they weren't scared, two jumped, dirty as they were, dressed in rags still, with knives inside their hands, leaping to attack. He dodged the first, almost like a primal instinct, a kick came from his behind and pushed one of them to fall closer. The sound of his bones being crushed under the body of that creature was more obvious as the other's expression changed. Now, Argus got his round, to come and grab and wrestle the knife. It was a struggle, hard and harder as, with each passing second it got closer to him, both the knife, above his shoulder he saw the beast try to lift again from the ground. He knelt suddenly, even with two hands close to being at his throat and threw one of them above his body, though, the knife was let go. Argus grabbed it but didn't notice that he was taken by the end of his hand and pulled, not far, both being slammed against the ground in a fast motion which almost cracked his skull. The wailing of the beast came again with just another leap. It stopped again. Both he and the pig near him were so close they could hear. If only a tilt and fall in front came, they'd both be dead in an instant, yet it stood there waiting for something. 'Keep walking.' Said the voice. 'I can't right now, I'm busy.' And as he said it, he turned around with the knife and tried jacking a swipe at the throat, though he had already rolled and tried getting up. Not much and I'll be crushed. As he thought, the body already strated shimmering and got ready yet to fall once again, just as the main part, from which dust came out of fell from the ceiling, yet again. He got up and got into a stance, he moves steadily-fast and yet didn't look back, knowing it'd attack, yet the man ran away, dirty as he was, so did Argus. The ground was still being filled with its dark running blood, though now slowly, conserved inside, it needed it for something, right under his eyes. Argus looked for a second and saw how holes and other sides suddenly were stumped by skin and meat, coming from the inside sealed, to stop the pristine blood it took away. There were, suddenly homes opened, yet more fire and smoke, at least a couple more alleyways and he were safely far away to listen to another fall. 'Where is it? I can't. I don't have any idea where to go.' Scream arise, and a family came out, thinking they'd have escaped, now seeing that the path outside was blocked, with ruins laying from its right to the left. It wouldn't be long now until it'd die, he thought. That must've been the reason why it was acting that way, driven mad, though still, it healed its wounds and prepared. 'A final assault?' With a knife in the hand he waited no longer and glanced, for his every approach matter, anything would matter now. A pole of fire impaled the ring of alleyways that laid not far out of his reach. If that was the right path, any path other wouldn't suffice. It's been over before it started. They were everywhere too, trying to escape, and all who tried, either died inside their burning homes, the bouncing hinges that bounced didn't retreat at all.'They died.'Observation, simple for him, especially then, to notice how one moment the door kept being forced to open, just to fail, and the other, it stopped.Only a trail of smoke came out and that was only in the small opening that was born, almost like a crack, revealing nothing but fire now.The pain came from somewhere above the shoulder, and suddenly Argus dropped the knife.Before turning, someone grabbed his hand and kept it locked behind of him, unable to turn around, to run, refusing even to scream then and feel the pain.'Remember me?'The voice asked, but it wasn't the one he had expected yet to talk.He knew too well who it was hence why nothing came to his mind for him to say.Piss off, perhaps, he wanted, or simply just die, though this wasn't the time for anger, not at all.Could I carve my shoulder and lock the blade?This could end up being more painful, even as it went again, further inside, slashing deep and cutting through layer after layer after layer, the skin started bleeding and falling apart.'Still, don't remember?'I do.'Argus said accompanied by a screech, the pain was far too great for him alone to bear, just as the sound of the earthquake, the burning of the fire approaching as well.There wasn't a mistake, he dared.With a twist, still lodged in the shoulder, he managed to turn around, making the knife twist just as he did and leaving him to turn to nothing but a grin.Short lived, it caught even him by surprise, Argus remained unshaken by the popped out veins that laid pulsating in his shoulder.The neck got grabbed, and even as arrogant as he seemed to be, he let the knife handle go and tried to stop Argus with a flail.It came fast since he remained unable to overpower the human and save himself.'I said I know who you are.Now.'A short break, seeing how it got back up, ready to fall again, and with a might unwedded, he threw him on the ground and looked upon him getting smashed.The scene went more than fast, undergoing his glance, and a second he was there, and the other, nothing but a pile of crushed remains, a spot for a throwing knife once he got it out.And yet, no blood came out anymore.I'm infected.'You'll be fine.'The voice said, before continuing in his mind.You have my blessing, you're still mine.Argus couldn't deny either that he didn't feel ill at all, with some following twists of the joints, he then felt both his shoulder and his arms more than well.'How?'Unanswered, as it remained, it wasn't as easy for him to be responded at his command.Before seeing the glance and following shadow that laid above of him, there laid a glance of terror, yet it stopped.The beast flew again then, abandoning now its arms that were only holding it down, even as one was crushed by falling debris from the sky.'It flies!It flies!'Voice spoke, even as fire consumed some, none could deny the fear that they felt whilst watching it rival the sky in its awakening, now sharper on its teeth, made of bones as they erupted out of it.A rain came out as it started shedding its skin, oil filled with drops of its black blood, at which Argus couldn't do anything anymore but flee away.Or at least attempt, now he tried his blessing, running through fire and leaping to the other side unscathed.'It's true!You have indeed my back.'No time yet, as it weren't as true as he thought, a glance forth followed by another in the back, revealed that the predecessor followed, though still holding of its guts and small tunnels that were held out of its stomach.It was falling apart, and it happened right in front of them.Everyone started running away, through the now open passage, all but Argus who ran through the other side, only to find cold.But no winter, there laid a blue light that dimmed everything around, be it a small planted tree or smaller home, bakery.All of which laid abandoned just as well as any other, despite the fact that the fire didn't go through.Even as flying rubbish flew about, it extinguished before it managed to hit the ground.Such was the fate of any fire, that flew around, only to die, not leaving the ashes either, that laid around the air.'That's it.'It was only a chance, just if he was lucky enough to set it ablaze, that would be the end of it. Just as well, after that, none could deny his might, not now, nor after, leading through a valve-like formation that laid there, near it, just a spanner. For a second he was reluctant, even as the sky-terror flew above and dropped its shadow over, lurking about, still pondering when to strike. The spanner had a mark on it, and even the slightest touch made a resonating sound, almost like a melody of an instrument, sung after dark. Reluctance, this could cost my life. Such thoughts could end up driving him to extinction, even more as the peril of death laid about, and how much this formation, this entanglement of valves, pipes, seemed to be at the core, the heart of this part of the city. 'It's so strange that I refused, but so do you!' Argus pointed, at the predecessor, hovering, higher and higher at the point of flight. There's no way back if I do this. Though even then he denied his right and need to lay his hand on that, somehow knowing there wasn't any way back, taking a trip back, running ahead. Argus knew too well of the peril which laid ahead, even as the beast was flying and ready to strike. There was no fire though at least the coming of the silence was slightly comforting for him to feel, even after taking another peek at his shoulder and seeing how it was more than healed. No dark mark, no pumped veins of melted skin, it was almost as if he was never stabbed there, all under his own notice as he wasn't aware of what had happened. Still, there was the problem of going back, refusing to look above but stare below at the dark shadow that threw itself just slightly above of him, there laid a fragment of fear that he felt. 'There!' The pointed at two sets of knives, making sure of two distinct things. First, that he was heard by the predecessor, no matter how old and evolved it was, beast or no beast, there was still the chance that beyond the hunger, it was as smart and old as the celestial had said to him. And the second thing, that he did well to remember the set of valves, how sturdy they were, to need a spanner, and how easily there was a hint of rust. One swing of a blunt blade could easily break the whole system down, and judging from the colour that seemed to run, through the glass part, there laid more than a complicated system of grass. If it refused to go against it, it must've been important, fixed too. It needed to be destroyed. 'You may go forth, it won't lay down.' The voice said, now in an almost dismissive tone, if it was one of his lower voices, perhaps he could explain to himself, though Argus wanted nothing of the sort now, leaping and grabbing both knives, then quickly turning to see. Still flying there, no wings, though watching with its now dark grin, dripping from its newly made mouth, just waiting to see things unfold. It survived for so long. 'I doubt you'd want to talk about it beast?' No sign was shown, neither of it understanding what Argus said, not wanting to retreat, though that could've been easily explained. The debris and the sudden attack that went above seemed to have stopped for a reason, though not entirely at the right time. Without anything to disturb it, especially such a big target, it had all the freedom needed to do anything it wanted to, even to leap and strike, to fly and throw itself around and cause avalanches. No, it waited for the small little humans. 'Is that it? You want me to use these?' Both knives stood above, dimmed by the dark light of its broken eyes, of filled with a concoction of his own blood whilst the other remained creepingly clean. Of course no response. Argus thought still, before, he could've easily just taken the path back and got away from all the trouble and all the pain he had suffered so far. And if he was fast enough, he could've even outrun it to the point where it became too thing. 'It wouldn't work though would it?' Have I intended to say it out loud like that? Such a thing as he said it himself wasn't to be left alone, he ran away towards the valves, wielding both knives without a care of being touched anymore by the tainted valve. A stop, a twist and he hid, seeing two parties, eight. Were they men or those malformed rats? He asked still, unable to figure out who laid in their suits, covered from head to toes, ready and watching and working with their tools. From what he could see there were already a couple of brought toolboxes that laid near them, of which they must've been using all of which they brought. Agents? Argus tried thinking what they could do here, as far as they could go, though none seemed to care. Even as he looked above, the predecessor went away, in the colossal dark space that laid above, the colosseum that wasn't seeable until this point when he looked. Too convenient that I haven't seen it so far. Though with an action, as he felt some fatigue, he hid both of the knives and turned to them, both hands standing in the air, ready to surrender. To whom I wonder. And the first one turned. Now he could see the whole suit and what it looked like, just like before, a pale yellow after dark, dimmed in a like they brought, working on the valves that they opened and connected with a larger box of their bringing. A hand was raised, along inaudible or unrecognisable speech, whatever suited Argus more. They didn't seem to carry any weapon, at least not unless you could call a bunch of screwdrivers, hammers, perhaps spanners, small and barely well made. Unlike their suits, made out of an unknown material that seemed to be reflective up to a dark visor that hid their face, making it the reason that made Argus feel so unreasonably uncomfortable. A friend or foe, I've had enough. 'I surrender.' He said, no matter how it seemed to have been, awkward for someone unknown, against which they seemed to be nothing more than engineers. Still, two knives and something peculiar, none of them had reached and grabbed, the spanned that laid over the ground, at the point that, it seemed as if, peculiar that one of them would even stand over it with his food. With no regard of tripping, or even seeming to be tilted about, he worked without a care, as if his life depended on it, even if it may be true. One started doing nothing but approach him, almost as if he had no regard for his own safety or had the guarantee of not being hurt at all. Shifting his hand to his own back, he seemed to have something hidden there, a small back slightly being hinted at from where he stood, though Argus could still tell nothing from what he saw in front of him. A weapon maybe? No, restraint. A pair of shackles must've eight inches, immediately then leapt from the man's hand, almost as if it was more of a leech jumping for its fair share of blood and latched themselves on his wrists. It was a shock that there wasn't any pain involved in it, perhaps leaving it to be even more comfortable than what he expected, though nonetheless. A prisoner now. He has left a line to follow, as he took the side and let him go. Whilst he was being conducted further into the passage on their right, Argus knew well that he couldn't take them all. Too many and too well equipped, I'd have no chance against them, as it seemed, a hand came on him, just making sure this wasn't any kind of trick. They couldn't be too sure of it. The material was indeed not cloth of any of that weak, it felt as if it was a piece of armour, metal, despite folding around them. Chainmail failed to be as good as this, yet they did it so well. 'Who are you?' Argus remained perplexed by them, though he laid still taken by the stairs as they all ignored him and went back to their work. Repairmen, I should've known. Thought it seemed to him that even then, looking for the signs, there used to be a door, broken or taken and hidden far away, with no sign of who it was or the reason for which he had done the deed. 'What now?' Finally, the sudden ascension was grabbed to a halt, after such silence, he almost begged. Something must've been above. 'It's a maze of it, but to what? Are you at least going to offer me some answers?' Other than a slight push, though nothing too hard or painful, he came back to his sense and just watched and tried to take as much as he could. Pipes, valves, glass, distinct and each of them had something carried above, all of them lead there without a break from a lower level just as well. They must've been the reason the fire was being extinguished and the rest of the town being purged, but why? What else could it control? Could and warm, even to the point of which both had their extremes present there, though nothing human-like would be of needing of something so strong. Not even those inside the desert he had travelled, though, not even the hard and pointy hot sand could take the lead against that heat. It felt as if there was boiling magma there and from the looks of it, that could be true. Still, there was a long way and perhaps, it wasn't a good choice to come. 'Escape.' The voice said though he couldn't respond them, nor think too well, judging by the situation and the harder the bonds started swelling and holding him as he was taken there. A light came, and if it was dark inside the room, a long dark shadow came over and covered both of them along every single pipe and valve that laid inside the room. I can't. 'You must try, or have you forgotten?' Never, or how could I if I keep being forced to look after, though it's not here. Argus looked around and the cage couldn't be anywhere, who would hide it in such a seemingly important and tight place? 'Who indeed?' Though I cannot escape with him around, he's armoured and at least thrice my size. 'Very well, though you must continue yet alone, yet again after that door. They're waiting for you there, so act as normal as you can.' It was confusing yet there was a deep feeling that he was about to understand. 'Here goes nothing.' Argus finally spoke, and despite his position, he took the opportunity of not being checked for any weapons and slid his hands behind, taking both knives out and coming to a full stop. Two blades hit armour only to make a bulging sound of metal being impaled from any angle that could be held, pulling them both, only to be released. One was used to cut the bonds, almost as if they were made of butter and right in time for him to hear the screaming and the shouting. Argus turned as he went, seeing him knelt down the floor, bleeding blue that ran down slowly. Sure, he'd follow if he was let there. 'Wait, don't!' It bled differently, though the language remained the same, perhaps it wasn't his blood, though clearly he was hurt. That didn't stop, though, desperately like an animal or a madman, he swiped and cut through lead pipes and glass, making small dents and opening to drip. Steam, water, other substance, the more and the often the cut, the more toxic it got there. A biohazard area that seemed to be getting out of control, despite the lack of purging fire, he knew that it should delay. 'What now?' He looked at the dark door and opened it to white and striped, many blocks below for him to stand on and go. 'Back to the asylum, it seems.' Spoken like a madman, alone, as others barely then seemed to come out. Trying to close the door resulted in a failure as he was almost thrown out of the room by the steam, just as his hand was burned and slightly rot. Cracks left the asylum in a shock after, both to his right and left, ascending to the walls, all was taken and rotten to the point of being pulled below. The machinery revealed, almost as pulling and crushing of bones, cogs were sharper, wires were hotten to the point of boiling skin at the touch. Even those who stood around receded to their rooms and closed the door, afraid of what was happening, just as he were. 'Was this too but a ruse?' The familiarity of the place revealed just how real it appeared, how sturdy was the ground when touched, how warm were the prongs and metal fangs that laid twisted in their motion. Argus even recognised, utmostly, the most important thing that laid there, a broken door, more close than ever, from whence he came from, now laid ever in the state. But it remained, nonetheless, the same room which had the doctor, without the walls, without the chair, or anything of the sort. Memory or not, he wondered, as he went into a trot, were they still alive, could it be so? 'No. It's you again. Noo!' The first madman who saw Argus, from the bars left open in his door left nothing but a shout to goes out of him, unable to control himself or his feeling as a matter of fact. His inability extended to others who followed that example and got more violent, like monkeys in their cages, holding and shifting around the bars, trying to either rip them off or manage to rip off their own hands. 'What happened here?' Before he could properly ask, he looked below, in the gap between them and managed to see the remains of what used to be a human being, perhaps the doctor or a warden. Whatever he was, now he was being ground between the cogs, making him look away and turn back and the hatred through which he carried. Still, the place was being broken, the cracks extended and again. 'Where am I truly now?' Though after a twist in the corridor, there was a window standing on the side. He was in another wing of the asylum, so much different than the rest of it that he doubted, was it the sanity of was this another place? Only a glance around revealed the different structure, and below, the wood looked almost as if it was forcefully inserted into stone, at the point of even having a merging of them, fused bonds that laid there, just working beyond his comprehension. Still, this wasn't an asylum yet at all, it couldn't be, unbroken on the sides, no doors, but cabins, no patients, nothing that would belong to what he had seen before. The scariest part remained, that he looked outside and he was yet in motion, going at a steadfast speed beyond anything he could even think of. Long hills and forests were being passed by, though he couldn't point out where he was even if he wanted. Sounds were coming from behind, they were coming and there wasn't any time. 'I could just jump out there at any time with the chance of being free.' And Argus felt some truth behind his words, with the absence of the present voice, perhaps it was being blocked, or left. But there were still the repercussions of failure, of which he was even more aware of what was about to happen if he were to fail, their faces and bodies still erupted from his. His voices were still in his memory. 'Where am I though now? And where are we going?' He asked, alone, as we went on. Empty cabins, he couldn't be underground still, the sky and natural light made it too obvious. Though, after he was about to get into a stance, though he couldn't find a way to reach for a weapon, he saw her again. It couldn't be, he thought still, though they were coming in and judging by the voices, at least four or five of them, perhaps more of the repair men were coming for him. And for her. 'Agatha.' 'Come.' She said and Argus nodded. Though now they walked away, leaving him with nothing but wonder, after throwing a glance, at the door from whence she came, as battered as she was laid a part of the bottom of the earth. The base from where they have delved before, and behind too, there were the hinges left, as if there was a door there, though now removed. She closed and grabbed him by the hand. 'They're not coming back are they now?' She didn't answer but lead him. Another door, on the side, another glance, a black abyss, then a jungle, a cage that holds many bars, perhaps different escapes from the trap. 'There isn't an escape, is there?' They were going by the end, and only a look behind of him revealed one or two crazed engineering running straight towards him with their mallets, clinging to their waist, then up towards, closer to the ceiling to be hit and held. Some mumbles and mutters came from there, though he remained unsure of it, just as well of what happened next. 'Don't let go.' The door opened and immediately after a blitz of light, she was lost as he turned around and closed the door. Too convenient it remained though he took it and barred the door with a wooden block that laid on the side. Many people, way too many to count laid around, all dressed elegantly, dancing and looking at the strange man dressed in black and in dirty white. It was a long journey and whatever blessing he was promised to have, it was starting to wear off him and his patience. Thirst, hunger, weariness was as much as he could take. An empty circle was made around of him, only to be made wider and move just as the move, through whispers and discussions about him and his upbringing. 'Snobs.' 'Did you hear that my dead?' He called us snobs, how dare this man, is he a servant?' 'Oh, I'd never been so insulted in my entire life.' Though, again, a glance at the door from whence he came out from and it had a mark just slightly above of it which read. 'Boiler room.' Dark wood polished and changed just rightly above the door without a compensation. Now it's closed. There was a bounce there for a second, but now it was over, so he thought that they'd have to worsen the time to go through and he had escaped. Agatha was nowhere to see and he was still so thirsty, he hadn't taken a cup, but took out of a bowl as much as he could drink out of without a stop. Desperately, he wet his lips to make even more place for more to come in, though now Argus was overextending. His hands were dirty almost driven in a coal like a state. All around everyone was staring almost as if at either a servant or a dark stranger who was tainting their drink, whispering but refusing to do anything else. 'Do I scare you?' Argus asked after he was done, refusing to take any food out of the table, once his thirst was done, of course, there was the need of entertainment. 'Sir, you weren't invited.' Said another, as he approached, in a black suit, wearing a mask. Despite the fact that the other guests wore their masks out by the sides, revealing who they were, one only stood there with it, going forward with the courtesy. So. 'I believe you're the host of this banquet, is that so?' 'You may believe what you may as well want as long as you do it on your own time and property. Now, I don't think we've met before, but.' There was a second hard knock on the wood. Everyone curiously now started paying attention the door being stricken at, hit after hit, glance after glance. And suspicion still came from him, since, he was the one who came from there. 'Are you a thief?' Outrageously he asked, now his mood changed still and he started calling around some names. 'Agamemnon, George, Victor. Johnny, Verrick, Bram.' He must've been calling for reinforcements, after seeing that the guests did nothing else than whisper and banter at the sight. 'Good, finally this present will be thrown out so we can resume once again at sight.' 'I so adore how they're dealing with, hopefully, you could learn from.' Though, before the woman could speak, the man threw nothing but a glance that stopped her still. His hand laid still in the air, bumps coming from the wooden door, as he was about to be caught in a situation that was more than known to him. Twice at his throat, between two dogs. 'Wait, wait. Wait. I'm leaving, you don't need to.' Argus was interrupted, even if he hadn't realised how much of an interloper he remained, even there, even then. 'Damn sure you'll leaving.' The orchestra hasn't ended not even as the intrusion went on, but before he could speak more, six men came, dressed in working clothes, immediately they came despite protest and grabbed Argus. He didn't resist and let them take him, dragging him, and at a sight, he saw right under the mask, though unable to recognise him, he went on. It was mid-day at least, judging from what was outside, a fairly big pair of people who were called into the banquet, and from the lights coming from the outside, it was the city. A smile came, even as his knees were dragged before lifting himself up. Home, or not, whatever came out of the door was to be their problem after he left their residence or more likely force, he first hit the floor hard. Before lifting himself up, he fist felt a kick coming from below, a low blow, even like that. They made sure it was closed then, even as it were, the loud music covering the sound, the red silken curtains now covering the windows by someone from the inside. And they stood at it, knocking the hand that tried lifting himself up, hitting and kicking him just as he stood. And at the end, his nose and mouth were bleeding still, though beaten, not to death. Some people stood around and looked, either smoke or having nothing to do with the banquet. At the end, they rolled and pushed him off a small pair of stairs that left him standing at the level of the ground. 'And stay there!' 'If I catch you again here, I'll break both of your legs and hands, hear me?' The door bounces back close, though it was hard to see. So much blood was lost and finally, when someone came they asked. 'Are you okay?' 'We need to take him to the hospital.' 'No.' It came as a flurry, grabbing both of their hands, despite being dirty of coal and blood. He looked at both directly in their eyes, two thin people who haven't dressed as well as the others who were inside, either servants or people who were looking for something. 'Help me get up.' Now, the final moments of his life must've been coming, a thief, a murderer, an outlaw, worse. I'm bleeding too profoundly to be able to be kept sane, am I to die now?' No. The haunting voice still came and he knew well that he was the only one around who could hear that voice, the only one tormented. 'Help me get up.' Slowly, please. The fairly dark skinned woman help him, just as the paler man stood on the other side of Argus, both pushing and pulling, slowly to look around. The gate was made of iron, open, stones and a small poll, small enough to be a confinement of drops that came out of rain water. And around, the garden, shrubbery and boxes, cages made of tall grass, sculptures left there for him to look at and without a doubt there weren't anyone there to see it just as he did. 'Help get on my feet, I need to get out of here as fast as I can.' You can't do that in this condition. You won't be able to do anything once we get out there, don't you know that the streets are dangerous and the night is coming? Perhaps true, this part of the town was new if he even remembered it properly at all. Everyone, even those standing by the side and smoking their cigarettes threw their hands around just to look at what was going inside. The lights were dimming and so was the sound of music before the shadow came out and started running. A bright light must've been there, to be so strong and fragrant, the smell of fire soon to come. 'Get us out, now, or else we won't get another chance to escape.' This was the most serious tone Argus could muster out of him and even so, it was hard to maintain, even as he was ready to sprint out of there empty legged, bloody beaten as he remained. 'Are you sure?' Do you want to find out what's happening there, girl? There was a slight nod of disagreement, still. Three more seemed to be out there, one finally throwing his cigar, still no suit or mask, or looking like a snob. The other were two twins that finally came, brother and sister, introduced themselves out of the sudden at an utmost needed time. 'Greetings, oh greetings. Name's Andrew.' And as you may have guessed my name's Vanesse. I've got not the time for pleasantries, I've got to go out. There's a problem then ye dance. A hint of a thick accent came from the man, even as he puffed his last threads of smoke and threw it against the just cleaned off garden hair. Foreigner, and less that what he thought of it. 'Why?' The gate is locked, and the wall is too tall and plane to climb. Trust me, I've tried. There must've been a way out, he thought, the door was being assaulted and something in his gut told him of the worse. Worse, this is an open city and none of them acted so far in the open, even the agents were as secretive as they could with their operation unless they had no other chance. No, this must've been that man wearing that man's secret, why else would he keep them locked. 'Have you tried making a human ladder then?' A what? He asked, again with that slight hint of a blunt accent, hitting right in the spot inside the ear, the right one at that time. Name is Argus and I've no time for further introductions unless they can wait. Whatever's coming out of that door. There was an eeriness and none could point out where it started. It was almost as if they were forced into deafness, but only to a point where they heard only the sound of a knock and someone behind it. None could swallow past a point, the pain was growing just as a feeling of unsettling tune. No sound played anymore despite the fact that it was covered up as a banquet. Is there another escape then? There weren't enough people for a ladder if they all wanted to escape and Argus now needed everyone that he could get his hands on. We tried to seek. Said one of the twins, just as the other seemed to be focused on how it was pushed, the hinges and its joints seeming to be slowly taken off and thrown. Look for an opening in the ground, entrance to an attic, sewer gate, or something. Were they still in shock, the man seemed a worker, hard but slowed like a cattle waiting for slaughter, stuck at puffing the end of a cigar. Even the twins were unsettled in their places, waiting and glancing around. Her breath was so close to his neck that he could even say that she desire to suck his blood, just like her companion was holding him tighter and tighter. 'You must abandon them and move on, my patience is wearing out.' His vision was present once again, through a puddle that laid close. It must've rained not so long ago, Argus knowing too well that it was a bad sign, even there, with the dark clouds still presents, stone seeming more like wood from the distance, even as he looked in front. There was an inability to turn his head now, as he heard something just 'Above.' 'Do not turn your head now and search this place as you're told.' This reeked of fish so far, though it revealed that even the small sculptures in the grass weren't there anymore. The more time spent looking away, the more did the image of a bright place change, leaving nothing but a dark sky, a huge town that was old, probably filled with a dark people who wanted nothing to do with him, as well as he refused to deal with them. The sounds of hinges being burst came out as suddenly as they were, as the faces of the ones speaking started dissipating, though by the burning and the steam. Not even now could Argus look without disgust at the abomination that had all those being interlocked with it, even more, that he was purposely remembered yet again that he'd be there, spoken through and pushed to the point of looking just like them. 'Damn that thing, I must've died right there when the agents came.' Luckily for him, none of them heard what he had to say, for both his and their awareness. 'Another burst, though it came from the main front, where the gate was being blasted at the joint, with a slight hint that it was his work, trying to get its main assets past there. 'Let's move, now.' There was an awakening, that everyone turned, almost at the same point in time and looked at him, almost as if they were out of a dream, far off from being mesmerised, to ask. 'What happened?' Already half on knee up, Argus knew more than well that the sounds from behind were more than enough to kick start their journey. Both their handles were grabbed, by the end of their shirts, rightly above. 'Let's go already!' Argus said again, knowing that it was the time for him to give the order, as it felt just plainly natural and right, just like the last remnants of daylight that seemed to be dying in the sky as they were making their escape. The twins were on the other side, the man soon to follow them. Even those who helped him seemed to be keeping up more than well, though now it thinned. 'Hurry already, the gate's closing.' It seemed as if he wasn't going to make it, or at least not the three of them together. 'Go without us.' It came from under his right ear, though with a sudden click the gate shut to a stillness that almost decapitated the man's finger right in front of them. 'We'll find another way.' There was a slight hint of a lie, though they didn't take it at heart either. It was strange, but Argus felt like he could trust them, above the mad-men he had previously seen, and despite everything that happened, they seemed to match every detail seen behind the screens. 'Fine, but don't go too far and hide whatever you can along the road, I've a bad feeling about what lays ahead and I can't get rid of it.' With Argus's fleeting words, they parts, soon to never be seen for a time, just as the strength in his legs were coming back, all of which they were knelt down on the grass now. It was a chance, thought they stood still and watch just below the stairs. 'Don't raise them, or it will happen again.' A warning was more than enough to warn them and prevent further mistakes. Even then, it seemed as if their sight was dwarfed by what laid just above their eyes. 'Jane, we need to look around.' 'Don't go too far, I can't.' The sight of it made sound stop, though they wanted to talk, pushing air through their lungs to breathe. Even that was slowed by a mere stepping, a boot that looked more than heavy, enough to the point of cracking up the stone of which the stairs were made out of. Another step and it laid on the ground, tall like a beast and masked, some giant tube, that seemed as if it was grabbed from the boiler room from whence Argus just came. Though obviously, it couldn't be coming from down there, the size was too great, too bulked, too old. And no doubt it, their vision was being stomped on just like the sound inside their ears, still. No attention was paid to them, lying on the ground as they were. 'Can it hear us?' Argus spoke then and for a second so did the behemoth to look around for the source of the sound. Its stature and seeming less seemed more than a match, especially in the condition they were. Even as he walked, the ground started shaking almost at the point of a tremor below, or so he thought. 'No, it's not over yet.' Said Argus, now without a care if he was heard of not, as, not even the behemoth could keep itself still, as something was dragging, through cracks in the bottom of the dirt, then stone, then further almost to them. The citadel of wood and stone was now dwarves before their eyes by something further below. It was a charge of which they didn't pay much notice, though the armoured fiend just bent its arms and almost like a ram went through and broke even silver, iron or whatever metal. Just as it was started to shake even more violent. 'We cannot stay here any longer, or else we'll be dragged to the bottom and I can't say what lays there.' 'How do you know?' Jane was already on her feet, holding stiffly to her companion, heavy-handed and her pants were almost cut to the bottom part. 'Trust me on this.' Said the battered man, just as he went through the gate, following the trail left behind. It was a dangerous path, though one last time he looked back, just to see. Rightly, just further away from the gate so he'd not be caught into the trap in the utmost dangerous path. It was really something worth glancing or staring at, even for a second time. 'What are you?' Argus asked, despite knowing that it was an inanimate object, made of wood, though air seemed as if it was pulled inside the holes filled with darkness which laid inside. Suddenly, the two hands that were there pulled him back, at the right time. Whatever that was, it seemed to have taken a hard side and be forced to change direction. Somehow, it was now pointed at a right, just as ground cracked more, followed by another pull from behind. His eyes were now red, as battered as the rest of his body and his sight wanted nothing more but see. Though two forces at hand, one that pulled it down and another that pulled him away, one stronger than the other, though the voice came now, alas. 'Snap out of it.' He returned to face a slap across the face and the sight of the great above. The sky was a bright blue in blue, though even brighter than that, almost to the white of the clouds. It must've been blinding at first to glimpse at it, even as the stones below, paved on the floor were cleaned so well that they took some of the light away from the sun. Still there laid a down, and not a delay spent, from one era to another, justly he thought. Even the grass was painted red and green, white in-between, with gold on the side. Raised just above, the smell of fish was more than gone, now Argus being able to stand on his own without the two of them lurking just around to make sure he was fine. 'I'm well. We've got plenty of rough deal with that thing, have you seen what happened to the gate?' 'Don't.' Jane paused to take another deep breath before going on as well as she was, having realised that something was wrong there. 'Don't turn around, you know what it happens. And if it happened once, it will most likely happen again.' 'Plus, we need to find those twins and that man, right before we spread where it will be too late.' 'But where could they be then, just take a look around.' It was true though that Argus hasn't taken any look whatsoever, to see those who dwelled there, still awake now, moving around like silhouettes from the distance. Now he has learned his lesson, as silhouettes could be deceiving of who they were and what they were hiding. And no trail of destruction on the marks. 'We need to find them and do it fast if you may come with me now.' 'You know, we could always use those.' It was him. 'Ehm. You don't suppose we go and steal a pair of horses now, do you?"They won't be needing them anymore unless their palace returns from the depths.'So they did, closing in by the stables, though now riding with stolen flaccid horses who were more than happy to be taken away.From the mere look upon them, they were starved and tortured, marks of entry on several spots which already had sewing marks on them, with a thick and spoiled material.'Are you sure this is a good idea?"There was a moment in which everyone inspected the horses, though not before they took them and placed them by the side, refusing to turn around even as they did it so.'There, there, there and there.These poor animals have marks like those everywhere, and slashes and stab wound, if you could even call them so.We.We can't continue to them, I'm sorry.'He was set on his words, judging by the look on his face and the way he was fiddling under, reaching for something off his belt.It was a known motion, to the point where even hers started to do the same, both acting as if they knew well what was going to happen next.Beyond his shock, which already was grabbed to a halt, both of them took out firearms, which they just had under them for the whole time and got ready for execution.'Won't it make any sound?What if someone hears the sound of firearms being shot and has a jump at us."Relax already, are you in this with us or not?"In what?"This man might prove useful or not, thought if only knew what you're thinking right now.The way shifted now, from Argus to Jane, and not a second, not a glance, she wasn't mesmerised as if of yet.'What happened Jane?Are you caught again? Tell me!'It could've been a slip though there wasn't any sign of restlessness in her eyes, nothing to signal that something wrong had happened, or that she was tainted by something unknown.After Argus doing the same, almost to be left with an open jaw, he turned to around to see it empty, a void in the space, a hill of blue and red, painted as if by the striking machine of the sky.None would take it for granted, even as a crater laid there.'Should we investigate then?"Not so far.'You won't escape now stranger, not unless you prove you're one of us.Out of his pocket, another gun was taken out and he was sure he could trust him, seeing how he had nothing to offer to those people who laid in there, how he was beaten and broken and left to die.And yet he pulled out and survived past anything and everything thought of him, not to mention that whatever they had released, experiment or not, they needed everyone they could get.Beyond their knowing that he needed them just as much as they needed him. 'Very well, but make it brief.'Both nodded at his statement and pointed their firearms at the horses.Four of them, though when the shooting commenced and the ones stood still, the last one should've died in the crossfire, which it was, even then revealed to have been hit by the bullets.'This isn't right.Let's go on foot, now!'It was already eerie, tough now after holes came through, bile started pouring as they realised that the horses were decaying still, falling apart on the ground, just in front of their eyes.The paint was getting thinner, to the point of it being grey and dark, filled with ash under, along with the small insects that were coming around.'They were left there for a reason.'Though unknown, to them, and for a good reason, they started going as fast away as they could, unable to look upon the fallen paradise.It wasn't far, though Argus kept the gun.'Name's Dimitri, and you may have heard, she's Jane."Pleased to meet you, or might've been.'She stopped them with a straight arm, and already after the shock, they were filled with as much alert as they could.A small train just passed in front of them, filled with people, dressed in with, some wore red, others blue, hats and moustaches, with the fresh smell that remained there even after their leaving.Never before has he seen such a model of a train, not once, even if Argus was more than aware with the advance of their current age. 'No land wires, not even thin ones that I failed to see.'Said Argus even after a first step, which he had forced to come around and push itself against where it should've been. Perhaps above, though he wasn't tall enough to come around. The way the place worked, it seemed that it used to be a hill going down a slope and falling slightly to a bottom, well. If I run just rightly there and jump at the right time perhaps I could stretch my hands and reach for it. Such a decision and action would make me bring too much attention, though. 'Haven't seen a tram before? They're quite common from where I'm from, and by the looks of it, they'll run across the entire city.' 'What did you say right there?' Argus looked her, almost staring through her eyes. 'The tram?' Jane asked now, her eyes deepening from light blue to a lighter one just as Argus continued. Dimitri was questioned just as well, since they were stuck in the middle of the road, between a point where a palace was swallowed by the earth, decaying horses and all, a mark left on the ground that stopped to a point. No twins and no man waiting, since most likely they've taken the easy way out and started running away, heading further from where they were. 'Not the tram, the other thing you've talked about, the latter one. What did you say just right then, after you talked about your place.' 'I believe I said that those trams run across the whole city but I can't see.' 'Exactly.' Though even as he said it, some signs were made that he apologised, even in this place and in this time, it was rude to keep away from the charade. And Argus kept still a twisted eye of which he carried, concealing what he saw and what he'd do to them at the slightest sign they weren't human. 'You want us to ride the tram? Haha, that's new. Well, in case you haven't noticed, there's no station where we could enter in, and the chances of us hijacking one of them is just. The same as riding those horse we just passed by.' 'If I may.' With a pardon, Dimitri came with his intrusion and revealed a small thickening curved square. It didn't take long for him to recognise what it really was or what it was used for. 'A bomb, here? Now?' But before a rebuttal, it was planted there and he went back. 'I must admit Argus.' Said Dimitri, as both Jane and Argus followed to a cover. 'You're not entirely as square as I thought, just as much as this wasn't planned at all.' 'But how can you time that? Especially against a tramp with no lines to go on.' 'Just don't overthink it and watch.' Inconspicuously, a group of three stood right over the painted field of blue and red, making it seem like they knew what they were doing. At any time now it could come, only to be blown away by the set charge, sitting in, what it seemed as the middle of the road. 'Act natural now, they won't see a thing.' Dimitri was almost unsure of himself at this point, it was most obvious as it came with the heavy breathing and every breath being almost spilt out with every word said. The unrestfulness could've come from anywhere at this point, either from the glances from behind him, that even now he tried keeping away, or not to be seen as he thought they would. What then? Will it go as planned, what if someone will jump out and assault us? 'Nothing is going to go wrong, right?' 'I hope so, shhh. Here, it's coming.' The three looked in surprised as the tram just started going faster and faster, and out of their sight, only two or three passengers. Another thing Argus had missed the last time, though it was clear. No one driving, meaning it must've been automatic, making it still unclear how it managed to go without a conductor, especially this version. The wood seemed older, even as the white paint and the mark of the city, most likely, a golden crested eagle, pecking and dropping the gold on the bottom of the ground. Something might've been in that place, though still, this plan seemed as if it was going to fail. Dimitri was clearly sweating, Jane jittering as well. What have I got myself into? Argus closed his eyes, the other two averted there, and a slight sound of an explosion just came by as if it was nothing. Under the closed lids, red and yellow, brighter, though only momentarily and in a concentrated spot came to be. 'It's over, come on fast before it leaves again.' After opening them, there was a slight desaturation of the sky and the colours might've dropped some shades below. Quite awkward, though enough harm was done, both he and Jane were late to go around and enter by the open door. Whatever the device had done, it most certainly did the job, as a man stood at the bottom of the floor, knees cross and both hands on his hand. Only two others, though hard to recognise stood at the end of the tramp, cowering in the fight as they seemed as if they've seen death and barely come back. 'Go join them, or I won't repeat myself again if you get my meaning.' Before the eyes could lift themselves, they saw the dark jacket he Dimitri wore, black leather, with something just falling off, revealing the belt which had the firearm slightly cocked under. The man immediately sprouted, at the point where his moustache fell off and ran behind. 'Fake moustache, bad.' 'Dimitri!' It was almost a shout, if it weren't for a hint of control in the voice, managing to calm him down. Jane pointed at Argus and both whispered, now being slightly some feet away. Truly not far enough, though Jane was soft spoken and they were more than close enough as it were. 'Alright, the tram should. Leave now.' His voice was slowed, his throat was left with nothing but some slightly dropping sweat, after looking through the gap where no window laid. Joined by both of them, as well, as on the other side, the view took the attention of the other travellers as well, the horses now moved at free will. No horses, though, as three weren't enough, one still missed and for a good reason. Now, the tram started moving, back to a normal speed and the normal road at that. Shaken, they took a seat, though it was crowded, and almost like a snake, Argus slithered and slipped away into the front seat, doing nothing but fiddling over his belt. The thought of both being armed was more than slightly unsettling, not to mention the devices. And atop of that, these two. Said Argus, alone alas, in his thoughts, looking out of the tram's mouth, and slightly enjoying the scenery. Not as bright as it was before, though it could do. Both of them belong to something though what? It was just now, not only that he realised that they could be of an armed group, though also, how much more alive this town compared to the other two he had been through. The one above seemed to be filled with shallow faces that barely seemed to be alive, whilst the one below, despite how much it was to take the eyes, was quite. Another glance was taken, despite the fact he couldn't see through the wood and through the cement and the various layers of dirt and stone, one word came to mind. 'Below.' 'What what that?' It proposed the response way too fast as he could feel the breath just right over his head. 'Nothing, it's just a. Nothing.' 'I hope you're not planning though to abandon us after we're done riding, right? The ways I see it now, we've kind of struck a deal if you don't mind me saying it, not to mention the two revolvers that could be pointed at you at any moment.' 'I understood the first time when you started whispering to one another.' Though it was hard to concentrate on them now, the light being brighter once again, the tall houses orange, red, blue flowers to the bottom, people seeming as if they were more then alive. Eight coming out of a bar that laid on the street, seeming more than intoxicated, though wearing the usual clothes you'd see dirtied, in a place like that. Umbrella wearing ladies that just walked along, wearing nothing but dresses in the sun, along with men wearing dark suits and caps to match even those. A truly marvellous sight, and for a moment it took away, how it seemed too real to be true. Perhaps it was, perhaps it wasn't in, though there was no way it could be anywhere he knew, especially when Argus thought of the route he took. The way back was going to be a pain, though it might end up as if the way ahead might be worse. 'So where we going then?' Still, he didn't turn to face them, with no sudden movement, or anything to alert them of what he was planning. They've left a gun with me and that was their first mistake. It was still unclear what happened before, at the ford between the then garden and the horses, though he remembered well that two additional shots were shot and he hadn't shot at all. Have they noticed then, or will they? As he thought, Argus started moving his finger under, just so he could feel the gun around and try to figure out how many bullets were still left, if it were ever loaded in the first place. 'Somewhere safe, don't worry about it, there are other people like us.' Said Jane, with almost a sureness in her voice. 'Like them.' The hand flew out the mouth and he pointed at a merry group, singing as they basked in the sun whilst smoking out their pipes in groups of gentlemen dressed in black. 'Not like them.' She said. 'Never like them.' It seemed as if she was going to quickly go on, though for a second she paused to turn around, just in order to make sure that the people in the back were still scared. Perhaps she even lifted and flailed her gun at that, though that was uncertain. What was really uncertain now was where they were heading. 'Where?' 'Not far now, and just a few words.' Some steps were taken, lightly by her and still, he did the same, concealing what he had hidden. His vision was getting darker as it's been some long time from whence he slept. 'Is it farther still or would you mind if I took a nap before we got there?' It stopped her, in order to reconsider what she was about to say. A risky move, to be left there and alone or gotten ridden off if the tram suddenly stopped. 'Very well, we'll wake you up once we got there.' Her hand firmly planted on the seat, where there laid a chance for both of them to stare at one another. I have to be sure of it. His hand went on her arm before she could turn and go back to her seat. Dimitri was about to make a motion if it weren't for Jane's dismissal and turn. 'What is it now?' 'I don't suppose you're planning on getting rid of me once this tram stop, do you?' The expression on either of their face hadn't considerably changed by much, if anything at all, though something was being concealed, even as they spoke now. And the ride seemed to be going a lot more. It was a risk coming in, though he needed the sleep, the rest, perhaps food and warmth. 'You've got my word that we'll take you with us.' Jane! For a second, it seemed to have been a slip coming from Dimitri. Now Argus released his hand and turned around at him. Was he planning of executing me the whole time? 'What about you? Do I have your word, or you'll go against your partner and shoot me in the back?' 'Why aren't you turning then?' 'Look!' Argus pointed, out of both of them, it was more easily to see who was more surprised. People on the streets were suspicious and the three in the front and those who hid in the back, at the point of talking and pointing at it. It could've been worse, now, if it came for them to call the local enforcers. Even worse if he was left there. 'Act normal and wake me up when we're to leave and I will aid you with whatever I can. But I can't do it right now unless I've got your word.' 'Fine, take my damn word, no need to fear for your life. Especially from me, since I'd not dare execute you like a dog.' 'But you'd do it like a horse.' Before he could speak, Jane's laughter stopped as she finally settled down next to Dimitri. 'Settle down, can't you see he's fallen asleep?' Though still, the little trust could still be, no matter what he could say, Argus took the rest now, there and then. A last glance looked at them before he felt asleep. The harsh sounds coming from far away didn't do anything to stop his sleep, though they were getting higher and higher, at the point of becoming a problem. Some time might've been gone if any at all with his eyelids open though it seemed as if he, they stopped moving for a moment. His eyes jumped to being open and his body motion to fully alert, after feeling no hand nor any shake, or anything at all that would've normally awakened him up. There were bars and the room was barely lit now. The only light coming was from a light bulb that remained broken and flickered with sparks from time to time. A putrid scent came into his nostrils at the point where he was knelt and puked out his insides without any possible stop, calling his eyes and looking still. There were small blobs of red, though blended on the wall, grown or left, now it must've been as hard as a rock, grown on the wall, too far from his reach. With a purpose unknown, it's done its job and made Argus aware, looking around and seeing remnants that were either solidified. Or worse. He jumped back when he realised that he was standing on one of them, a petrified rock, bigger than the others, and something was moving inside of it, something alive. Something wicked was inside, resembling a human, a toe, a finger, perhaps something even more phallic and disgusting, trapped inside without escape. With that shift, it made the entire floor under him creek as he laid there still. The wood might've appeared to be hard and sturdy, as durable as any would deem, though, at the merest step, it seemed to make a sharper and duller creek. 'It wasn't made to last. Interesting.' But before Argus could turn around and watch what laid outside, past the darkness cloud, he changed his mind about shouting for help. His lips curled and mouth closed, realising only now, that the corridor, as dark as it laid could hold someone he didn't want to meet. Too thin, too dark, the eye could easily just stay there and watch him, even as he pondered. For a small section that was lit by the flickering lightbulb, it was obvious that that growth that laid in his cage too must've spread across everywhere and perhaps worse than it appeared where he was. No lock and no key below, there wasn't any way out, at least none that Argus could see. Though, even by more pressure, he thrust his foot on the side of the wood and manage to almost make a man like a hole just by the side of it. Would it make any noise if I disturb it, or is it still alive? It seemed alive, despite not having ears or a mouth. From what he knew, it might as well be true what it was thought and observed about the small creature that stood there, alone, perhaps not even living now. I can't stay here for long, though below it could be worse. Some sharpness came from outside, making it seem as if someone carried something heavy with wheels that creek on their way. Someone was indeed coming, making it way too obvious, even for Argus to figure out what was going in. Though he remained in luck, a corner laid forever dark, though whatever laid in it could've been more dangerous, or less. He took the gamble and walked, passing, almost with a leap over the small creature resting. More bumps were the darkest part, and he was barely fast enough to meet the minimum effort and hid inside the corner and look ahead. It was slow and had the likeness of a human, in stature and height, perhaps taller, though nothing that could rival one. For a moment it stopped right under the light bulb and started looking around the cell, carrying a cart that had broken wheels. Still, a part of him was in dark, the ones that matter worse. Though behind the contour of a human, it could've been worse. Argus quickly grabbed his mouth in order to not get sick, as the image was getting worse and worse with every apparition. He saw the end in that rusted cart, some hands, a pair of feet that didn't belong in that position, or bent as they were. Another sharpness of a creek came soon after, as it strolled slightly further away, closer to the light, only to make a reveal of its face. Indeed it wasn't human, though the poor sight was clear, and why it worked so hard to find out where Argus could've gone. It knew. It, as in no human that laid there, with a lack of colour in the eyes, almost the level of them being pale as the eyes of a dead man who had his last breath minutes ago. No open mouth but it seemed that all his teeth conjoined themselves into tall blocks and cavities that were forced too much that they permanently remained outside. It made a shivering sound as if organs were forced into a clutter as it tried making its grotesque animal like sound, even with an unopened mouth. Though, in that slight part that was revealed to him, it was also revealed that it was permanently stuck, welded as a part of the cart it carries with him. And suddenly, the seeking look seemed to be of pain, though for the wrong reason, looking more alarmed as it looked around. No Argus, and without me, what? Could it open the gate, will I dare come out at it? The thought was more than shimmering, to think that he could stand against it with no weapon, only but fear and luck. It was too dangerous, the only way remaining for him to wait and go below. For a second now, he thought of a motion, one that would go ahead, as the thing would enter. 'Ghuuaa Ghyuaa, Ghuuaa.' Said

he beyond the bars, the suit, old as it were made it seem like, perhaps it was once human, tied, ropes around his waist and some around his legs. The creaking began again, though it that moment when that deformed face came to light, it seemed as if that used to be the captain of a sailing ship. At least that was obvious from what he was wearing at the time. Though still, that was unclear, why a light still flickered above. It was gone now, the sharpness made it clear, though if I were. A second, Argus took another, just to be sure, the sharpness of the metal wheel being passed and forced against the bottom of the floor, from as far away as it were managed to add a distance far too distant for him to manage to twist that cart around. He'd have to make a full turnaround and that was close to impossible to catch him in time, even if he had a way to break through metal. First, Argus took a leap from where he stood and shuffled to make sure nothing had come into contact, though only but a glance in the light revealed how a tumour had already grown on his cloak. Without a notice, his disgust got the first of him. 'Agh.' He was almost ready to shout, to immediately two hands came and covered his mouth, not before throwing the cloak away in dismissal, though. Even before his sense, the instinct of self-preservation kicked in already. That cloak got tainted by that being, and if I wait any longer, so will I. The breaking point had come then, as the shrieking was barely even audible, to the point of being too dull to be heard. First came the knocks, that started doing damage and making more and more sounds as Argus forced himself deeper into it. A hand was faster than the other and all of the sudden, it managed to scoop by the side and pull out a wooden plate, untainted and untouched. For a moment, just as a part of his body was shrouded in the dark, he stopped to look around a listen for a while. His eyes went over to the sides and now he could feel thirst. Dry lips came to be, and he didn't too well enough to wet them with his tongue, finding a disgusting taste of mercury and fish guts that reigned over them. Other than that, there wasn't any sound, but the splashes in that, perhaps crystal like formation. Red, perhaps too strong to be a rock, though still, in no way would he touch it. 'Damn, I got distracted.' With that realisation, almost like a guard dog, he turned to sniff around, and it was more than certain as well, that Argus was still there. It must be coming, the shrieking was more than obvious now, though from where. Light perturbed through the hole he just made out of the floor, and now his face was lit by the flickering of the lightbulb. Still, it wasn't big enough and the time was standing still for both him and that creature. Though where? Where could it be? Blinking seemed to be taking away shades and at first, Argus thought it only to be an illusion. After another glance and the rubbing of his eyes, with the slab put rightly away, it wasn't clear whenever or not it was an illusion of he was going mad. Enough had the voice tormented, and for what? To be left broken in a dark place and look for the warden and how it moved its cart around. I'd end up inside of there, parts of me, or worse. He hadn't remembered seeing any head in there and perhaps there wasn't any, to begin with. It could've done a lot with them, and dismissed the torso to the bottom. It could've eaten them, though thoughts like that only made Argus more anxious and afraid, more distracted, until the shrieking came to its full power. Seeming as if, now, the wheels were walking on something harder, which made it worse for both of them. For one to walk and for the other to listen and watch, with nothing but a slab. 'Is it sharp?' A bad habit and I may give myself again, though it matters little, it knows where I am and what's missing. He looked, seeking for an answer if the slab could be worked back, though the edges were now broken, fragmented in pieces. And Argus saw something he shouldn't have. Below, he met that thing again, and for the first time, as he thought, it saw him. It was only the portion of below that wasn't blocked by him, from where the light came through and sat upon its face. Now it was more clear what it looked like, the various cuts across the face, the growths of skin that were falling, just under the chin as it lifted the head to watch. The cart was covered in darkness, at least only by Argus' silhouette. He wondered then, unable to even swallow as they stared at one another. A small step behind and the light started perturbing the depths. Argus stopped, then, unable to move any longer. There was half of a face that was lit, standing now at the crossroads between the shroud of darkness and the constant delays of light and dark. So did that thing shift its sight towards it, then back at Argus, recognising, most likely, that he was made of the same material, flesh and bones, same limbs, perhaps smaller or bigger, only good do be taken. Eye to eye was avoided, for, after it was done observing at what Argus was looking at, the part of the cart was covered in darkness once again. No shame whatsoever, was it ever human then? It looked as if it was waiting for something, though now, both Argus' lips and throat were dry, after the sight of what laid in that cart. The shrieking and sharp sound gave it away if it approached, and now, there wasn't any way for it to come up to him, at least not the way they were both standing. It couldn't speak either and there was a doubt that it'd understand or want to do so. The only way is down, but it's there, just standing and waiting for me to do there. And from the looks and from how hard it started clicking when he pulled out the wooden slab, it seemed as if, one more or two slabs of wood would call for the entire floor to collapse below. A good thing or a bad thing, though it would expect it. The point at which he gazed upon, was a tumorous bump around a whole, coming into its attire, perhaps a weaker point, perhaps not. It was worth a shot, though only after its eyes. Sweat now freely dripped and it accumulated so far, that now, it drops came below, hitting the end of the rusted cart, a part of it at least, while other drops reached the skin cube that laid there, just closed inside. Again, at the slightest distraction, its gaze shifted from above to below, before returning and waiting. Why is it waiting, is this a stand if I've not a weapon around to defend myself with? Will the flickering of light not dismiss it from watching me like that? Does he ever tire then? Will I stop sweating at least? Questions filled Argus' mind but no answers nor any plan of action, the decision if any would be even taken at all. There was only one way out and it was down. He knew that well enough, just as well as it had known it too. And already has his cloak been thrown and left to rot, with another gaze, revealing how fast it was that by now, it was entirely covered in pulsating and creeping tumours. Slowly too, the skin was becoming hard, almost as a crystal formation, though a lot slower than it happened in front of his eyes before, it was still too fast for his own comfort. Argus shifted his gaze once more, to reveal what laid rightly when he first looked, at the small creature he was thinking of, though it were none inside the crystalline. Just as it floated in the liquid that it conserved it, bouncing between its tight walls, it was then when he finally got a true glance of what it was. A toe, conserved. Immediately, after that, he looked below, just to find out that there wasn't anything there anymore, he must be coming back. And that toe, someone was here previously, past the flickering light, there was blood, the same one that was feeding the excrescence, solid and organic now. The sharp sound must've been silenced somehow, no wonder how I didn't notice it before. I can't stay and find out if there's a way to open the gate. And with that, he grabbed with both his arms, the edge, just as small pointy bits entered his side, with no way to remove them and keep going. Blood was being drenched on wood, though another slab was ripped, picked up and laid by the side. And with his luck, the second edge left between the gap and the other slab was empty clean with nothing sharp to cut his hands. Now he grabbed it fully by force, and the sound of the wheels, as silenced as they once were, starting going, round and round, past the hall, as dark as it was, the rider was coming. Though no horse, but a cart, a way to open, if timed. The fall wasn't high but low, and it'd still take time for it to come below once it found out Argus had gone, again. Another slab, this time ripped apart, one chunk fell to the bottom whilst one remained above. And as that happened, still, despite Argus's reluctance to stop, the captain did so, the sharpness of the wheel ended. 'Good!' Argus said it well, knowing after seeing it once, how thin, how wide the hall was and the inability for it to turn around, being forced to go on its made path every single time. Torture for both, or only for one of us, another slab, and still the floor refused to go, though now it looked as if it was a man-made hole. With a light, as wide and round as he could only but look around, after he was gone, though bones and a slightly cleaner floor laid there, just waiting and calling for him to come. And who could just go against such a calling now at a time like this one, especially after a glance above, seeing the edge, it was almost too fast, on the wheels, almost like it was blitzing through the halls to get below? 'Too late.' Argus almost shouted too, as he just leapt down there, hearing only the shrieking creak and the morbid sound it made as it rushed to get to the bottom. Dust was blown all around, just as he reached, and the clean image of this place disappeared. Out of the light, it was revealed just how much wider where he was, and how much time he had, to hide and wait again. Not in the light, no, he came and went blindly into the darkness and crept now, without any knowledge if what was above came and dragged itself towards the bottom level. If there were stairs, he couldn't have known by this time, neither if he wanted too, nor if he needed. Knelt and almost like a door, he stood by the wooden wall, now as it were no time, just to avoid being taken. Flesh could be felt, and bone by his side, he fit right in between and felt nothing creep from behind. And the shrieking came, and now he could swallow, through his dry neck and dry lips were almost cracked, especially from all the dust he inhaled. There was a desperate need to cough it out, but he couldn't. Those wheels were forced against something, almost at the point of being broken in pieces and abandoned where they stood. No, I must wait. Gloom couldn't fully mask him, though he needed to hope. Hope that the gap beyond wasn't too large to reveal him. Though now, whenever or not he wanted to, there wasn't any choice at all, it was being forced out of him, despite his liking. And in the middle, the blitz ended as that thing stopped. He hadn't seen his back now, though, that and the fact that it was so fast that it managed to cut his breath, which was already tainted told much of his foe. Rust on the wheels and his cart had so many body parts, though it was still unknown why he was collecting them and why from this place? He managed, though, the captain, and Argus gave him the credit which was well deserved, as he went so far through the decay that he got at the point where not even that infection could affect his body now. Neither that and definitely not his car which had its parts protected from. IT didn't take much time to find out just how limited he was. Though harsh leather was obvious now, on the side, it must've been for a slight tilt or his forceful entry, but now, he almost felt one of the corpses near him ready to fall. Two arms flew over him and stopped that just in time. It left a feeling of sudden release and content, to be so close to being discovered and all of the sudden be pardoned rightly. But, he wasn't there anymore. Glances around gazes through the damp and around the light, such a small distraction managed to leave him there alone in the dark. A leather band came across the body and the bones were obvious. Argus took the opportunity and snatched the bag, almost in a silent way, still suspicious to look around. The body was slowly placed and a bit of dust of the corpse remained stuck on his hands, not that he complained much. The bag, too, was mildly heavy, thought as his fingers slipped, still snicking and in a slow movement stance, he held the lock, a bit rusted, though a lock nonetheless. Something was inside though and it was more than a bulk that just popped out for the sake of it, perhaps a bit too heavy, though whatever it was, chances were that it was important. A creek stopped, though. Argus looked confused, unable to figure out where to look in the damp darkness. Instinctively, his gaze went towards the light, curved as if were, swear running still on his face, though now drier and at his taste, a lot saltier than before. The arc went just enough for him to watch the captain still, though now it was reversed and he could see only a part of him through the bars. Does he see me now? Can he see through the dark? Though none could answer those questions but him, and he couldn't now, especially since he did not want to doom himself at this rate. Damn it, damn it to pieces. No knife around the belt, those gruesome eyes had their lids look as if he was previously afflicted by with the pox, or at least taken by the infection sometime before. No longer could he watch, those eyes, slightly lifted above the lids, pale and seeking to end him right, adding him to the pile. I'm sorry, remained just a small thought. Argus wasn't able to see well, though he ripped and grabbed, felt around, there must've been a fully armed torso now laying still on the ground since, with a pull, he managed to take the collar bone, with a sharp end, and still slightly sturdy. I need it only for a stab. Or so he thought, but from what was seen, there might've been a bigger need than that. A few perhaps, though too many bones would make a clutter, and any sound now would make all his plans shatter. There must've been other cabins, if one laid there, near the light, it might've been, truly a wonder of design, though now, everything was covered in sharp and grainy debris, of stone and wood. The wall was close and his hand just move. It was wet wood, obvious too, his hand just moved higher and higher, though still on the ground. Glass, cold, dirty. He stopped. There could be something on the other side, I'm certainly sure. Though chances were too, it seemed to be too thick to be a normal glass of a cabin, just laying there waiting to be taken apart and for him to hid inside. He avoided again the sight. Creek, creek, so it went, as the wood was bent at the will of rusting wheels and the bodies that moved around without notice, being thrown from side to side again. Argus bit his tongue but couldn't muster his paint, looking but for a gaze just slightly above his shoulder and seeing the same motion again. Same track, and now, perhaps it could be confirmed, the captain couldn't turn around. A distinct and slight smile came down Argus' face, though not enough to taunt it, not until he was safe. He waited until the creature decided to move again and not stop from the glances. Again, he looked down to see the marks left by the wheels on the ground. They were so obvious now, though before, it seemed as if his mind fully blocked their sight and presence there. Now the captain moved again, and now, with a weapon and the sturdy bag, he got up, though there was no spit, nor water with him. Nothing to fully clean the glass. 'Dome?' The captain wasn't there, he couldn't have heard that. Though it was obviously a glass dome, if it were so, or something much stronger than it appeared to be. At least, if I can't clean it properly, let it be, just at a glance, it's all I need right now. With what he was wearing, the white undershirt, though already filled and dirtied with the mud from fall before, it remained slightly moist from the sweat. No wonder that the beast hasn't found him by the stench. One thing off the list, same track, without hands, it might not be able to smell. And just as well, that could explain the lack of disgust when he's dealing with those human parts. So, he started rubbing, harder and harder, though to no avail. So came the collarbone, which came with the first stab, which removed the thickest part of the dirt that laid there, just thinking away as it was taken. Two stabs were enough, he could see something blue. Though, just as his arms went again to rub, the dome revealed, clean, a light blue of the ocean and with it, the second source of light, blue in blue came across the room. Argus turned quickly and saw a stare through the bars, and heard another rush, at which he quickly retreated in the dark, without an option and whilst hearing what was coming from above, he went to the dark corner that laid just in front. It was clear now, from where he laid, in the corner of the room. That damn monster can barely turn the head around. Even when it did come again, it failed to go through and search the room, being forced only to look behind, throw looks and continue, not soon after. This time it was faster than it previously had happened, curious. Now, the hand slowly reached the bottom of the floor and started moving slowly across it. Just a little further. And it went until the point where he found the hole, the entry from which the captain came, still farther away from the corner. Fifteen feet away on the least, and it gave plenty of room to walk, at least until it came back. Next, to the opening of the door from which it'd come, there laid a free look, right through the just openly cleaned dome. 'It isn't so bad, is it now?' Curiously he asked, knowing he'd not be heard there, nor could he be found. 'Where to now?' Though he couldn't answer where he was, it was quite obvious, on a ship, from the curvatures and from the appearance of it, and from that dome, it was under the sea. 'A sunken ship? No.' Now he raised himself, looking forth, between the great above and the water dome. It was no ship, but a submarine, most likely, at least if he were as lucky to be right, there'd be a chance to go up. 'I must know.' Argus whispered and as soon as his words disappeared, he crawled back right next to the door, trying to find something solid to figure out if it was a submarine or not. Though wood inside? A leap came forth and it was under its nose, just as the captain went on, back on his track. So did Argus, moving more freely now, without a care for his bag or how heavy it remained, nothing he couldn't handle, at least without a care. Though still, he stood away from the giant entrance of light, the giant spotlight that came from above. Bones were crushed as well as remains under his feet and the soothing sound of the water and the fishes going just outside wasn't soothing enough. It wasn't a human anymore, just from the simple fact that it was driven mad to the point of going to those manmade tracks, over and over again without a stop or a care. Why was it pushed to it, who was he? Though from yet another look at it, it seemed as if it was, or must've been once his crew. Now there was less of a disgust after another look, though there was still some inside, nothing Argus couldn't handle. And from the looks of it, some might've been using uniforms, some red material was left sticking on the bones and rotten skin, just being wasted. The eyes inside one of the heads were still stuck open, looking but no fly, none that could live anymore. And even after it left again, the dust fragments were visible, almost like stars, just floating inside the light, fading into the dark soon after. 'I've got to escape, but not with you around.' It was time for it to die, but how? There were nothing below but bones, shattered under his boots, the ones who got the easy way out so they'd not end there. One of them had to have a weapon. Perhaps, he thought, if he were just lucky enough, as he previously was to come down there. His lungs were suddenly filled with it, the idea, one that could work or not. Though first, he had to be sure. Surveying the way around the wall, an image formed in his mind, another dome was revealed, though as he cleaned it, it was too dark to be seen. It changed a second, after figuring out that there wasn't water in the second, no light coming from the sea if they even were there at least. 'Interesting.' Though not enough to figure out what to do, or even get close to the idea. Two domes were there, one that had water, perhaps a base, and the other hollow and dark, perhaps a way out. His face came closer, almost being stuck against the dome, there the smell of ash could he felt, even through the thickness that it had. Whatever laid there, it laid scorched to the ground. Though, still, two of them. 'That means.' His gaze came to the opposite site, where the extent of the blue light came to an end. After waiting for it to come again and to go, twenty of thirty seconds at least waiting there and here, on average at least. Quite a small observation, though small nonetheless, it must've been doing the same amount of time above, or slightly less. Argus' legs moved more freely and swiftly now that he had a glance on his speed and time, knowing how it reacted when it saw him coming out into the light. A smooth radiance of cold came under him, just as he finally managed to feel less distraught and calm himself down. 'I almost got you.' Said Argus, now on the other side, past the point where there was light. Two more domes. 'Let's see.' First came out as being too. 'Dark.' A switch that he came across, it laid just in his reach, perhaps it could even work if he were lucky enough, even if it ended up acting the same as the one above, with flickers of light, it would still be better than nothing. Not yet. And Argus came to the last one, at which the edges of the blue light just came slightly to him, though still too far. The silhouette came and just passed for a moment as if the sound of the wheel turning weren't enough. He rubbed for the last time, and it came to be, a giant room, with only a small light at the back of it, with an ongoing furnace that held its light dearly. Argus looked behind and saw no light coming out from the furnace, perhaps just his face and hands as they reached, but he knelt and saw its range. Nothing too strong or any vibrant light that would disturb his crawl. Only a thing left was for him to check, the other side, past the light. Though even as he thought that he returned to check the wall, right next to the open gap he felt before, it wasn't that far now, just a few steps more. There laid a door, just slightly closed, though it wasn't made of wood but iron, as sturdy and strong like the iron bars. Did it move, though? Argus even dare to move as it made a slight noise, as the metal was rubbed against the door. It was heavy, as he couldn't deny that, and barely moved at that, though there wasn't any doubt what would happen at last. Left there, it came to a middle point, from the edge from which he first grabbed, now the door was left at the middle pathway, between what Argus could call, in the dark, the gate from which the creature came out. That meant the other way must've been the same. Though there was only one true way to find out, Argus came and looked at the tracks, up his feet he waited, just slightly some feet away from the spotlight, he waited. Past his shoulder, the creature passed, barely inches away from him. It might've found him if there was light. Perhaps the feeling in his body left him long ago, else how could Argus just breathe on his shoulder and face no consequence for it? There was no denying, it was stuck there. But now, now Argus had a direct look at what he had in the cart it so desperately dragged around, laying more than a had and more than parts, it was clear that they were rotting away, only for one. He realised that one was. 'Fresh.' Boldly he said so, breathing colder and getting warmer. Clearly, the head tried twisting, and so did the neck, though he couldn't turn around for a reason, nor try to go in reverse. It moved a little, then it stopped. A few more feet in front of it and it repeated that once again. Some steps Argus followed, but only for a bit, still he didn't dare to reveal himself, with his plan incomplete, it might've been the worst idea he could've had. Without a weapon yet, there should've been a door there, and go so, he waited. Until the point that it dismissed his existence, whence it went back. Argus quickly followed, though not directly in the middle, he kept close to the wall and scouted, up until he found the comfort in the darkness, laying so close, yet again. A dance of light and dark followed soon after, right when he found out how big it still remained. Two more doors he felt, as soon as he reached and felt the spacious gloom. Never has he felt as uncomfortable, though, as if needed for a rest. 'Not yet you monster. It's not over yet.' Again, with that whisper, he could only get a slight composure and peep around while searching, another door laying, certainly not in the same position as the other one, though made out of the same metal. First the domes, then the doors. Argus thought, with that plan of action, and a few more seconds left, he rubbed the first dome, empty and hollow, another damp room that laid inside. Then it followed, the room closer to the light, with another darkened dome of glass just standing there, holding the unknown on the other side. Without opening them, though, there wasn't any telling what laid inside of them, perhaps a furnace, perhaps something else. And it was getting certainly harder to concentrate, again on his knees, his hands went on the floor scouting for anything solid and made of metal, any weapon at all would suffice. Fate couldn't be as cruel, he thought, there must've been something laying around. Though stopped, he thought, remembering well, just as another track went on. The furnace, how could I have been such an idiot, right about now? Again, he went through the light, after waiting for the fiend to be gone, and right in front of the door and dome, his hand went down, looking for something, anything, until he found a valve. It was small and so close to the bottom, it must've been minutes until he found it, though, in that time of silence, the sounds of water dripping, his own sweat that still remained there, that must've come from his taken cloak. And the iron wheels, driven by rust, still went on something, it was clear. With each turn, he slowed down then went on, it made the sound of machines going, a system that opened it, surprisingly, even after the passing of so much time, as he could ponder, it still worked. 'Done.' The sudden opening of hinges from the sides, left some steam to come out. It was more than refreshing to feel a warm feeling. A glance around at that, as it was still above, from what he could tell, just perfectly, he pulled, as heavy as it were, managing to move it only three or four feet away, perhaps two or more atop of that, before going to the other side. It wasn't close, the air becoming suddenly hard to breathe through. At least, it had still remained, the fact that it was too rusted, the metal too old to be able to turn and close by itself, even the machinery inside it must've turned to something. Now, there was some light shed. The furnace was barely working, though coal laid by the side. Some bones were left and others burn to crisp, perhaps a rebellion might've happened, it could explain a lot. Not on as good as it should've been since one's still standing in that room, stuck and punished, though even that will come to its end. Shoved inside one of the piles of coal, laid still the shovels, black handles, the smell of burnt wood. A skeleton holding one and resting its hands still on the spot. 'I'll take this as being lucky if you don't mind.' And with that Argus took the shovel and plainly brushed the remains apart, leaving their final rest there, spear across the ground, up to some bones that just rested near the furnace. Scraping by the door, he looked for anything new, though nothing happened, the same routine over and over again. 'Left like a scarecrow, though not for long, my friend, not for long. First, let me take care of this.' Returned back, Argus started taking coal, mixed with dust and bones and threw it in the stuck open furnace, seeing both the light and the flame start getting bigger. The process went on for a few minutes, up until the light extended, almost to the point of breaking the sweat down across his body and the room. Now it was time, as he exited, bending down, seeing how he was alone, closing the small valve and seeing the machines turn, by the side, up until the point where the gate closed itself. From the dome, now there was another light source that overlapped over the blue one, stronger, perhaps even ten times over that. Now, Argus moved freely unlike before, perhaps even slow, after seeing how it was still above. The door, it must close. He jumped across the light, now with the shovel, iron lead, he felt the material, even as he went on into the light, without a care if he was seen this time. Shrieking and the desperate sound could be heard behind, but it was too slow to catch up to Argus, as he brushed over, felt the edge of the door and slammed it on the other side. With the back end of the shovel, he pushed forth, to make sure it was sealed, then he made a few steps behind and watched. His eyes gazing straight at him, how he went now through the red, then the flickering white. The captain stopped, still not realising that Argus was there, hiding in the dark with a weapon, ready to attack. 'Take the bait already.' Anticipation came to be, finally the vindication this creature deserved. Not even his thoughts could be settled and he could just as well see it happen in its eyes then. Going from side to side, taking more time. Has the slamming of the door made such a harsh sound that it made it notice? Though its tour ended, and just as he continued, past its track, there was a sudden shudder, at which, at the same time, Argus went behind, rightfully into the light and stopped. The sound of metal coming into metal, then the stop. 'You can't move, can you?' The pleasure that Argus felt then. It was, indescribable, oh alas. 'You petty one, you failed now, this is to be the last of your tracks that you ever get to do.' Like an animal with a broken limb, it started making sounds, though no audible words, the tongue must've been forced out through the gaps between the teeth. 'A well-executed plan I can say to myself since there's no one else to say so.' Click, click. Over the switch went the hand and immediately the room was illuminated, at the point where even the flickering light above stopped as well, going now without a stop. 'It was going on my nerves as well. 'There was a slight surprise over what he saw, first, how the door in front of him just ended up being sealed, even letting some steam out at its end. Metal seals, at the point of which it even appeared to be a door belonging to a vault rather than one of the ship. Then, the room wasn't as he expected it to be, other than the remnants of his colleagues that he felt previously, and the tracks, the rest, leading up to the separate rooms still stood out. Almost to the point where they did not belong there at all, especially with the strong white light. 'More time to explore for me, after I'm done. With you.' With a small star, the end of the shovel curved, and it made direct contact with the side of the creature's skull. A screech came as it was forced to the side, unable to fall down. Argus saw then, the two feet that looked more like a growth of skin, or stumps that couldn't be used for walking alone. Not to mention that, just as well, as were the feet useless, so were the hands, only used to push the cart. 'Why? Why are you still alive?' Trails of tears were visible on its face, going along the obvious pain it felt, unable to look from where it stood, on Argus' face, though it was obvious now. With his foot shoved firmly on the cart, it took more than some little effort, though he managed. The metal fell without a bounce, twisting the hands that were stuck, leaving the captain on the floor, with a cart that had all the inside and the limbs spread down there, laying with him. 'This will be your resting place and the punishment for what you've done.' For a second then, just as he could come and shove right inside the neck, like he did it, not so far ago, in the motion with the taking of the coal, he hesitated. Seeing it breathe, trying at least, with the busted nose, seeing the body try to shrivel away and try anything at all, it made it way too hard to go forth with it. 'But you're. You're a monster, I should be able to do it.' Though no answer was given back, just the hard breathing that went on and on. Instead of finishing his life there, he turned away and walked. The bag remained just as heavy yet there wasn't any desire to abandon it or open it right away. The mechanism seemed to be present there just as the one before, the one that had all the door, including the ones with the domes on them. 'Interesting.' Argus looked past the door from which the creature came out of, seeing a pair of stairs, one that was normal, accompanied by a twisted curve where there laid the tracks still resting. A glance flew behind, just to be sure before he placed the shovel on the ground and started twisting the valve. 'I'm just making sure it's still working, nothing to worry about, I won't be much of a bother soon after.' It still remained a pain, to have the image of those humans that were dead because of him, hence, why he stopped again, after picking up the shovel. Another valve, that was way too clear, that laid there, on the other side, with merely a twist, one could just lock the creature and let it rot there. To top that, these seemed to be different, other than the locking mechanism, they seemed to be resembling blast doors, made for their sole reason, to stand. 'I could just go and let you there, until. Until the next Buffon comes along to risk his life just as I did, to end up infected or worse, in your damned cart. No, that will not happen.' With that, Argus, as he held it, with a slight return, he twisted and forced the sharp metallic end of the shovel against the dome. Despite the layered glass and regardless of how thick it appeared, the sharp end managed to go deep, to the point where Argus started pushing. 'I can only hope there's not an ocean there, you and me both, though.' The pressure already had taken control and cracks started taking everything apart, with that, and smaller jets of water coming out, he removed it to see the water falling down and starting to drop inside the room. Now he ran and slammed the door, closing the valve, hearing and seeing the air pressure visible as the mechanism closed it in place. 'Whenever or not it's enough water, let's just hope for your sake that you drown fast enough.' The sounds were muffled, though, and he heard nothing more. He'd get to see, soon after, with each step, and with each step, another sight over the twisted set left by the trail that remained engraved there on the wood. 'I'm getting closer, I can feel it, just as well, it shouldn't be too far now, until the place from whence it came. The lights made Argus' thought even clearer now, that he could, not only see where he was going but get a better idea where he was. Two doors left there, one open, at the top, which left Argus only on a small block where he could stay still and watch. It was obvious that the one to his left, that door lead to where he was incarcerated, which remained the same one from where it came from. With a raspy voice, Argus thought aloud, now that he could do freely. There was a feeling of curiosity, he had to know, later he'd go seek the other, in case the water raised further, but the chess crossed the dark floor on which he stood, connected to the wooden one in front still laid curiosity about. 'How did you turn like that? You seemed to be so fast when you came from here to down there, though it makes no sense that you'd come out from where I came from.' Too bad I cannot ask you, I can only look and try to find out. With that in mind, he went on, step by step matching the trail inside the wood, seeing more and more cells. Rotten corpses, either to the point of there being only bones or covered in the crystalline growth. The positions were stuck that way, holding the bars, legs stretched, praying most likely to be left out of there. And that was left only in the first cell, the two prisoners that used to be there, kept still by the warden. It took no other explanation for Argus to find out that this remained the prison district, though everything else still remained aghast. 'Why all of this when he could've killed them more plain and simpler?' Near the next cell, two. No, three, as he noted after moving slightly further for a better look, three conjoined prisoners that were combined by the crystalline formation that seemed to have spread everywhere. 'Everywhere except here.' Where he stood, under, above, and even by the side, he saw nothing. Nothing but a small growth farther, but still facing and being, and from where he could see it, it must've been the same one that he had seen when he was in his cage. 'Still, it hasn't spread on its own, only there.' And that seemed to be the truth, after judging that it spread like that only after it had consumed something, henceforth it hadn't gone across the point. Another cage, though this one remained empty. Whoever or whatever it was, the scorched remains were left there along ashes and the marks of burn wood. Nothing but black laid around there, atop of the remains that were crisped past the appearance of what used to be a human being, even at the point of appearing more like a replica used in a play than a human used for torching. Same by the next, rotten or stricken. And the next one, and another past that and after. 'Mine.' There laid still at the bottom of the floor, though

Argus couldn't see the past, he saw the water already risen up to the level of its legs, just a little more and it'd start drowning. 'I'm still hoping there isn't an ocean laying there near you.' Though, that was also, the least of Argus's concerns, if it got to the point of conducting electricity as well. Emptied, the cart already had its part floating above, and the sound made it hard to look away. There was a struggle, the sounds of a fish trying its hardest to speak. 'Now, it's over.' The screeching below ended at that. When the point came, the water got to the level, rising slowly to the point where its body couldn't float to the point of air, being anchored to the ground. Argus didn't immediately move on from there, he waited. There must've been a stairway on the other side leading below, just like the one from where he came out of. 'If water came from there and drained by the sides, I might only have some time to throw a look around and make it for the door. Isn't that right?' Though now the taunt was wasted, no longer being able to see any sign of movement, no bubbles of air coming from there, the captain was slain and perhaps it was the called time to find a way out of there. Just a look, that's all I need, how did it turn then? Argus thought, and the thought turned into another distracting look at the constantly rising water, just to see how much it was until going up. The bars were still covered in something and there was no keyhole for him to use. It could happen again, but with a look, he observed, the ceiling that had all its lightbulbs attached, was made of solid iron, made to last. 'It did make me wonder why was it that the furnace still worked, the bodies were fresh, even the electricity was left on.' Though it might've been obvious now that perhaps there were other in this, still on the upper level, and already lost in his thoughts, the water made it hard for him to go back and check in hopes to go over and return in time. Argus turned around, seeing the water, almost pouring out of the hole and turning over, leaving how it managed to use the system and take the route he went on a mystery. 'For another time, if I even come back.' Though already there was lost hope for that, the place was going to be flooded, the infection that wasn't crystallised spread across the rotten and the burnt bodies. If there were people still alive, they were bound to their fates, though there was no denying, past his cell, there were others, too far and twisted from a line, it made it hard to see or even notice. There might've been people, hence he stopped. Looking again, Argus suddenly developed guilt. 'That face was fresh. That damned man was still warm there in his cart.' And the water was approaching even faster now. 'I can only hope I'm wasting time and I could catch up.' There wasn't a certain way to open up if there really meant for someone to be there, though he did it anyway. Moisture was already under his feet, even if water hadn't come, and perhaps it couldn't take just a few extra seconds worth delay if he was fast enough. 'Enough, dead body, body, bo..'. The last cell, in front, laid the opening with a device, an elevator perhaps, though not a normal one, but one you'd find inside a mine. The, a mechanism was obvious inside of it, not to mention how expensive it appeared to be. But here and now? It didn't matter how, though that question had only but a glimpse of its answer, this, however, hadn't. A chair inside the cell, a man struggling with a bag over his head, tied from behind, so were his feet. Why haven't I received the same treatment then? Why haven't the others? Though that wasn't the only thing he noticed, a clean cell, perhaps too clean, both inside and the bears, and the device that had its need of a key there. 'The ward must've had it.' Said by a whisper, though secrecy wasn't needed anymore. 'Can you hear me?' Right towards his ear, Argus yelled. It was, certainly unexpected to say the least. 'Who's there?' 'It's not important, who are you, though?' Though the man didn't speak a word, judging by those clothes he was wearing, though, silk upon harsh leather, it wasn't hard to find out that he had enemies. 'Kidnapped and left to rot here, ey? Trust me, I know that feeling way too well if you ask me.' 'Wait, you're not. Who are you?" I've already said it doesn't matter and if you don't cooperate with me on this, it really won't. "Are threatening me then? Should I be scared just because I'm tied up? Listen, buddy, I'm not one who easily forgets stuff, I've already told to your partner that I won't spill a word, hear me? Not a word." There was an interruption to that, in the fact that Argus threw a glance by his side. Something momentarily stopped the water for rising above and perhaps getting to the point when the drowning commenced. "Wait here a moment, just don't move." There was a reply, that Argus chose to ignore, not that the man tied up was in any position to make demands or even anger him, but this was more important. The water stopped rising, at the lips from his cage. Now, though, it remained too shallow for any to look through and be able to see what laid there, past the murk, the dirt and the fluids that used to run in those bodies abandoned there. Luckily enough, it hadn't evolved into an aquatic creature while he was gone. The key might've been attached to a keychain if any existed at all, to begin with, though there was nothing of the sort heard when he was at the bottom, listening to the captain when he was going. There might've never been a key, to begin with, no to mention that the man gave a feeling of reluctance and annoyance at him, and how he reacted. "No, he can boil there for a while now, there's no need to find any key and attempt to rescue him." Without the threat of the way, it was time for him to go above and discover, same as he had found out before, the valve turned to the point where it released the steam by the sides and the door opened. Just in time too, it was getting uncomfortable being there with him and the others, despite not being as chatty as that man was. The stairway seemed to be twisting around and going as far above as he could see. With the first step leaving Argus standing on a small area before the door closed itself, as heavy as it were, closing the steam between the room, to reveal the clean air. "This air doesn't belong here." And in a way, it way right. Clean, outside air, but where could this be and why is it here? A hint of light was above, but so were the edges of shadows. Almost knelt, Argus went on, and step by step, he bent by the wall and try looking over the corner in order to see past the veil of mist that laid between them and figures out whenever or not was there anyone there. His shovel was slightly dirty but just as strong as it had been, mostly likely during its conception, carefully kept both low and away of any other edge, of the stairs or the damn wall so no sound could be made. Pride was taken by Argus now, that not even he could hear himself walk, in such muffled silence, that at a point of stepping up, he forgot himself and the fact that he was there. And that was the door, slightly above the end of the stairs, just standing there, a gaping hole that had no door handles nor anything that could even block the entry or the exit. His ears immediately dropped to eavesdrop and listen, by the sides, the sound of struggling, without a doubt, the chances were that this could only be the upper level of a prison, with many other cells where they experimented upon hem. "I must get out now." Without a care anymore, a slight reminder came, that he still had a weapon, sharp at the edge, made of sturdy iron that could and might as well hold itself against anything that he'd face. Especially another fellow, at which he jumped and strike, the figure having a laceration across its body before it fell on the ground. It stood still for a moment before it fell down without a bounce, somehow it managed to bring an uncomfortable feeling to Argus as it stood there to guard. It was nothing more than a mannequin, slightly there was a sigh that he didn't just stab and take a cut at a fellow human, but still, a mannequin here and there? Two more were left near another domed door, there were plenty now that it ran straight to what appeared to be endlessly spread across a dim lit entry. "Sorry for that love." The clothes it had were expensive looking, though none would feel their loss, there was a key to be found perhaps and most certainly a way out. A slap and a shovel shoved aside both guards as Argus tried looking again through the dome. This one was cleaner than the previous entries, not to mention that the lightning was set inside too, past the figure. A sidestep that was followed in a fully turn towards his left side, only to have an armed view revealed nothing more than the fact that there was another dummy standing inside. 'It seems as if someone's taking me for a joke.' Even the knocks on the glass turned out to be less layered as the ones below, easier to dent, as it was revealed after some slaps on it, though the reason behind it was unknown. The next one had a small box with wires all over coming from every corner of the room, appearing to be a chain like as they held it lifted above. 'Could it be?' The slight turns and sounds made Argus more alert, as he thought of it less of a joke, seeing all the dummies reverted in their original position, two guarding and one standing by the door. 'Who's there?' The grip over his weapon grew tighter with each additional gaze of which he took by the side. Paranoia was way too obvious, though it made no sense that someone was so fast to pick them up and place them back in their original position. One thing is clear, Argus thought. I'm not alone in here, either them or someone's playing tricks on me, damn twisted animals. Though the box that was held in there seemed to be. A hinder of light came, going through to the end of the room, revealing both, at the end, the existence of an elevator and someone dressed in a suit. The suit had no scent and appeared to be covering every single part of the body, including but not going past the head. He might be just as shocked as I am. Argus noted, after noticing that neither he nor the suited man made any move at all. Still, no weapon in hand, the man seemed to have resumed whatever he was previously doing. Knelt by foot, Argus hasn't noted that he had a panel open, wires out and almost to the point of sparkling with light, repairing what was broken. Every slim of attention went towards something else, luck. The keychain hanging by his bottom part of his side, convenient, perhaps too much so. He saw me though refused to react, even when he saw the weapon, though a direct attack was worth a shot. Far too much did he stand still, that Argus could swear he started acting and thinking like those dummies standing next to him, that's when he sidestepped. Two or four to say the least until he stopped and waited again. There was a creek on the ground where he landed but without a turn or notice, he just placed his hand behind his back and hid the shovel before getting ready. Still, no notice from the worker, another set of steps in hope he'd get to land behind, that's when finally some thought was given. The worker turned around only to see Argus stand still, finding the exact moment when him too, had wondered what to do. Do I attack now and end it then, what will he do other than those welding tools and the devices? He must be a human, though, it only makes sense with those in hand, then why doesn't he move? It passed a little, though he couldn't see the expression that laid under, neither if he was truly a human inside, the same how he was wrong before under there. After some uncomfortable minutes passed, he turned around to resume the work he had been previously attending too, acting almost as if it didn't matter that Argus was there. He blinked, and all of the sudden he found himself standing at the different corner of the room, not too far but still far enough to have to put the same effort once again. What happened? Though he already had the answer, turning to see the dummies still standing there. Creek, creek, again he went, though this time a lot faster, catching him at unaware, this time closer, only to have him turn around at the last second with a shock of which the tools for welding were dropped. Another blink happened and he found himself once again in the same position, and it was obvious that not time had passed at all, his tools were still at the bottom of the floor, still waiting to be picked. A hand was being held against his own chest, just resting there as well as he was. 'This at least I can try, though I may not get it back.' There, this warning should suffice, if he understands, good for him, but if not. Well, Argus gave no thought, but almost strangled the sturdy wood and with a forceful throw, it aimed for the head. Before any possible reaction could even come to be, it was too late, being aimed for the soft part of the suit, it made a squishing sound as the shovel bounced against the ground. The head slightly twisted as the man fell down on his tools. Argus blinked again and glared at the bottom of his feet. There was no shovel in his hand, as well as that he had made a step forth and hadn't been taken away. 'Too easy lad and others might be looking for you I ponder if that thing remains unfixed.' Now he moved freely and another blink just enough sufficed, he picked his shovel and knelt to see, taking the welding tool in the other hand. It appeared like a blowtorch, though already his hands were busy for any other tools to be taken. 'The keys. I've almost forgotten, you can't hear me anymore, right?' Nor could he even see him, as he waves his hand around the visor area. Placing the torch to the bottom, he felt around, hard, way too hard to be pierced, luckily the force was enough to kill or at least stun the bugger. Enough, at least, to take the keys, which Argus did without a doubt, there was no one to thank for but at least he could be gone. A keychain with plenty enough for every cell at the bottom, perhaps some more too at that. 'I'm sorry, though, I just need to be sure.' Just as the keys easily popped out of his side, so did the head bounce around as Argus started smashing the head of the shovel against the helmet. It took a few hits, well enough to make the clicking sound of bone, though still it hadn't broken or shattered, there was a reflex of the hand. So sudden, did it come, that it made Argus go straight back and watch? Stretched with the shovel in his hand, he pushed the blowtorch to the other side away from him, just as the twitching seemed to be at a stop. Before he turned, one last twist, and base don his entire body mass, he grabbed the shovel with both of his hands and hit the head only to watch the entire body fall and be left, neck outstretched on the ground. Argus breathing became more shallow, his vision slightly daze, he couldn't open the visor to see what was inside, but at least, the keychain was held by a finger, as well as the blowtorch he just had picked. If it even were to be one, to begin with, it was shaped like it, and something might've happened when turned on, but in no way could he leave it near him, or at least near anyone who could come. He passed the dummies to the bottom and twisted the valves once the places and picked it when he opened it up. For a second, he stuck against the corner and tried to hear, looking to get only a glance, then looking at the bottom he saw no water, and it was obvious that the water was still there, left to rot. Before going to open the gate, a thought came, stopped right in front his cage. The domed doors, that were rightly above, were way too strong, or at least so did they appear to be from where he stood when he was there. I either use to open my own cage or try. But the memory of the box, something about it stopped Argus from starting the strange cylindric device from his hand. The reluctance was past his understanding, at a level that not even he could understand. Why is it so important? There'd be another chance for that, now he came by, with the keys removed and taken away, the cylinder left on the ground, next to the shovel, which already stood by him. 'Hey, are you still awake buddy?' Not even a flinch came out, but no one could even hold a torch against him now, who else could tell how much he was there for, a couple of days, hours, perhaps months. Starved, left to die of thirst, most likely infected. 'And now.' Just as the keys from the chain started clinking, making their distinct sound, suddenly the bag started shuffling and just as soon followed the rest of the body in a motion that was almost unknown to Argus. 'Oh, I get it, awake now, right?' 'You, it's you again. I can hear the keys but I thought you were the other one who came earlier.' 'What another one?' Forced to be aware, he looked by the side, left and right, it couldn't have gone past him, the way down there was flooded as well, which meant, when he wasn't aware, someone might've used the elevator to get here.'When did it happen and who was it?'How should I know, I was just as blind as I am left now, abandoned in the dark and left to be like this, it's not my fault that this happened.'At least tell me what it said, or if it was it, to begin with.Did you hear girgles or something of the sort or words?'Though it was late to ask already, as the man acted like a hound near a stake, after hearing the keys now and the ring they had as well with them.'Are those the keys mate, you're not missing this time around?'No, listen, I need to know, who that was, the warden that came around and spoke to you, what did it sound like?'So, indeed it wasn't you?I swear, he sounded exactly like you, if you're not actually the warden and indeed you're messing with me now.'I'm not!'Argus got at a point when he was getting frustrated, already with three keys getting the past and shoved inside the lock, only to obtain a minimum result, as it wasn't that.Not that key, neither that one.Another glance around, at the elevator, came just as well with every attempt, then one at just around the other side of the passage.'Tell me then, did you hear any noise of something heavy being pulled, dragged with a descending then ascending tone?An elevator, have you heard one just come when whoever that spoke to you?'No.'Almost monotone, he was getting sick just as much as Argus, and beyond that, the frustration continued with each failed attempt.'Here.'Finally, a clicking sound was made, there wasn't any way to express how lucky Argus felt when he found out that it was indeed the right key.But there was yet another thing he hadn't planned, with an attempt to slightly move it to the side, the key was shot out and then the clicking went on.Click, click, click, click, getting faster by the second now.'The keys.Where?'It didn't take much searching to find out that on the bottom laid the charred remained, chunks of iron, fragments, bits and other parts that laid either melted or broken on the shore.'What's happening?What's with the sound?'They came fast, but there wasn't a way to put it in place.'I'm afraid I might've started something I may not be able to slow down or stop.'Said, Argus, as he turned, then with a reckless swing, there wasn't anything but a dazzling tremor, a shaking that was absorbed by his arm.The lock was too strong to be taken down.'What did he say?The man who came here, or whatever it was, what did it say?If you don't tell me, I cannot help you.'Though already was the hope abandoned, as he realised, just how close was the elevator next to the cage he was near.It might not worth, but it was worth the chance, armed with a shovel and a torch, near the end, he saw that there was something there, close, though buttons or something to call it.Anywhere, from left to right, and another look on both sides revealed that there were none of the sorts to be pressed.The clicking still went on, perhaps there was time, perhaps not.The shovel was the first to be used, banged against the wall, to the point where the sounds of iron striking at iron rivalled the clicking sound that the device had.It went on into all directions until a sharper clicking sound went one.Suddenly, near his right side, a glowing plate was now blown to cinders, while the sound of something being dragged now was just as clear as the clicking noise.Though, it was mere luck again that shoved this small button, as its size and location, if it were to be taken by hand might've taken a lifetime.In other words, something that he did not have now.'Alas.'And the clicking seemed to be approaching just a flaccid point and something that Argus failed to notice before.The other cages had no locks like the one that was attached to his cage, not even close to it if that was even a concern.And it alarmed him of its intention to, just as he was backing away.'There's nothing else to do now, I'm sorry.'Being said as he went by, it forced the man beyond the bars to come in a fully formed shock, though not as much as Argus felt like he was going to feel.It will announce every one of my presence if they hadn't known already of it.Though why else were the keys and the device, if?He looked one last time behind, now that he ran as far, to say, as if to the other side, only to see the door open at the far end, with no one around, an orange light coming rightly from above. Depending on how strong the explosion was, shrapnel could fly rightly, he turned. There was a sudden pull of air, as strong as he could feel and even see, the smallest grains of salt and sand just fly over his shoulder. The sound was being driven out for a second, until the point of a flashing piercing spear of sound that came as sharp as it could come out as. The force that came from there almost emptied the air he had in his lungs to the point where he was forced to fall on the ground, just to be pushed again, closer to the stairs. Another, the stronger light was almost blindingly coming from behind, and the sound of fire and smoke was just as much as it had previously been, only amplified. It was a harsh place to get up, followed by a mist, shaken by it, Argus merely managed to lift himself in time, not to fall a second time and break his legs on the stairs. By the time his vision cleared, he looked past and saw a gaping hole in the wood, that fell below. It was a clear, straight view, but only jets of water were visible from where he stood. Left with a gaping mouth, seeing the destruction left, even to the elevator, which now remained out of order. 'They don't have a way to come now. But neither have I.' And guilt prevented Argus from going further to see the damage. Instead, he did the selfless thing, opening the door again, climbing the same stairs until he reached the same point. No change, not on their positions as all dummies stayed the same, nor the man who still laid dead. 'The box, I missed it.' The shock was perhaps too strong to take at once, despite standing still, looking through the dome, which resulted in him in dropping the blowtorch and never picking it up again. 'Damn you, I missed it.' And now, there still needed to be away, coming closer to the end, of which, it only made sense to mirror the bottom as well, strikes came, until a point. There laid a glowing square again but nothing seemed to move, though again, now that he knew the exact point, he thrust the shovel in that point, over and over again, until harshly he understood. 'It stopped.' Two steps back were taken, as slowly as he could possibly take them and watched from where he stood, closely he listened as well, after seeing the two gates open. Nothing but an empty abyss opened, with only two long wires leading to the above. Looking below, there wasn't even a light, though the debris and the remains left by the small explosion were still left there to rest. 'I.' Though there was nothing to say or to depart, not to them nor to the man. 'I won't need this anymore, so have it.' The shovel was thrown on his side, up for him to dig his own grave. He wouldn't need it any longer, and it was coming, he knew that well. 'I knew the water smelled awful, even from the side.' It came fast, once he realised what was coming as his reaper, a red glowing mist coming from the stairs, the veins would still come to spread after getting a new sacrifice. Connected through the other man, it'd only come further and perhaps even follow him. So Argus leapt and grabbed the strong metallic sturdy wire, starting his ascension, the stink was just about the corner below. After missing the box, and climbing for what seemed to be minutes, all was going as dark as it could be. Only one light came from above and he was ready to give up on it, having his body numbed down, his hands shallow and his legs unmoving. All of the sudden, the scent of the mist went away and he couldn't smell anything, but nor did he feel the silence. The noise came from the side, strange noises of movement over water and stone, fast, some faster, perhaps a legion of horses running rampage on the streets. It can't be that, though it feels too forced, too mechanic to be a living thing, it must be something else then. The first glance when he opened his eyes, the smell of smoke, as someone had a fire on the street came by him, just passed. One hand managed to come in time, just to block the light and sniff the air. 'Wait, I know the two of you.' 'Morning to you as well Argus. We're not there yet so you can have another nap if you'd like.'Vincent, the name struck him immediately, half of a moustache driven away and with his companion just standing there.'What did I miss while I was out?'A riot on the streets I wager, it happened quite more often as of lately."And it will happen more often from now on.'Both of them looked in separate directions and waited, and for a sudden fraction there, the people who stood behind looked as if they were sleeping too, more natural in a way than ever before.'They look so peaceful, don't they?'It was the first time Vincent turned to throw a look at them, as he didn't check on them in a while.He's not too wrong when said so.Though Argus managed to see more than he wanted or needed to, the small scar across his neck, running as far as it was visible, down from the ear, below, almost visible if it weren't from the darkness inside his vest.'What happened there?'Though immediately, as he realised what he was talking about, he covered it and said not a word.Nor did he look mad and confused, trying his best to change the conversation just as it went on.'Where did you get that bag from?'And immediately, three glances shifted towards that bag.He hadn't realised yet that it wasn't a dream, nor that he hadn't removed the bag when he went on.The tram was still going on, perhaps at a faster speed than before, it wasn't going to stop, even after a long sleep, at least not for a while.'For how long have I been asleep?'Argus, asked, seeming suspicious, especially with that old bag around his shoulder, big enough to occupy the second seat, almost blown out and taken out of proportion with its size.'Get rid of it, I can feel its stench."That's not it.'With a hand, quickly she interrupted him and almost stared through him with her undeceitful gaze.'I've a bad feeling about it.'Half raised to match his glance, stretching to get closer to him, for a whisper she went on.'I've got a bad feeling about what's inside of that.You may need to throw it outside if you don't mind me saying that."Very well.'Without a fight, it was said so, mostly since Argus agreed just as well as she did, that something was wrong about it, especially now.Holding it just about outside the gap, looking at the material, again, she asked of Argus.'What's wrong?Just throw it, I'm sure someone else will take care of the problem.'Something was clearly inside, though something prevented Argus from raising his thumb further and lifting up to see.The lock being there was a bad sign but what else could he do now other than let go?Which he certainly did, immediately letting it fall and roll over my the street, ending in a bounce and away from their sight.'Is it normal to be this fast?'Ask he, once he figured out just how fast the tram it was getting, either being too fast or they were too high, at the level where it had become a spear cutting through clouds.'It's going to get faster, you'd better be off grabbing a hold of something.Wait, Argus!"I only need to go and check the driver.'There laid a cabin, quite a small box located on the left side of his view, only a few more seats in front.'You're a madman, if you keep walking you'll fall and break something."I'm not a child.'Replied Argus, holding nothing but the edge of the seats.Truthfully, it was getting hard for him to fight against the current but there wasn't anything he could do about that.There wasn't a notice when the tram was thrown off its rails, but this was different.'There."Take care!"Came from behind, though the voice lost some of its volume and power as far as they both went from one another.More viewers from behind have become more aroused by what happened then and there, the man who was approaching the cabin.'What's he about to do?'Ain't that one of the?'Before he'd finish, the old man suddenly flew back below, waist down and his hat on his face, acting as if he was sleeping, after seeing Vincent's gaze falling upon his.Though farther away, he managed to lay his hands by the side of his steeled cage and inside laid nothing more than a machine.'A box.'Said Argus, unable to control his excitement, this time it was closer and its appearance was, even more, to resemble what he thought he saw inside the domed door.The large coils must power it, leading into the panel. Blue glow on a white metal, with crevices and hollow spaces, all filled with a dark greenish liquid, in any of the matter, appearing to be organic of a metal box. 'I know what you look like now.' Though by now, it was getting harder to look back. 'Argus, come back.' Almost lifted on a foot, Vincent yelled. Though farther away from their tram, a little more on their behind and most certainly not on their course of action, laid the bag on the middle of the street, giggling and shrieking but only audible by those around. People wondered what it was, what could it be, but none dared approach at all, for they all feared what laid inside. A stench, the evil smell was almost musty, followed by the spread of a liquid that fell inside. It opened and it managed to come out just in time to avoid being hit by a vehicle that would've ended its scornful existence. A bulb of meat, of a which a mother thought to be a baby, only to be denied her empathy after another glance. A pump of skin suddenly made the entire body expand, almost like an explosion happening from inside, the torso came forth to be almost as big as a balloon, as thick as a barrel, a worse terror they couldn't describe. Fear through, though none have realised it was still immobilised, unable to chase any, even if someone were to push it from behind. And it remained there, at the lower parts of time. Where suddenly the skin changed, from a large ball of skin, it suddenly extended, like a tendril or a snake, on four feet that now were just as functional as ones of an animal, chasing by the smell. Lifting itself on two feet was no bother, as it remained a towering abomination, starting to absorb, by the coming of the light and the ones who ran around. From that white drenched skin, came the pink and the red and green, the subtle changes that reflected, as tall as it were, acting like a chameleon, imitating even the smallest faces that laid there. Its stench and poison followed through, still falling apart until it managed to grab a hold. 'Monster, run. Call the authorities!' They yelled, some braver ones threw stones, which did more than expected. As it turned, it was revealed its frail attempts to absorb the stones and take them all inside, of which all failed and resulted in it falling on the ground. 'It's weak, ain't it? Come on, faster, grab more.' More started coming and be granted more courage by the fact that it couldn't fight back, the abomination was still in the process of being given birth, still far from being mature, hence why it remained to frail. And how it desperately learned what it means to be desperate, trying to crawl to safety with half of leg that had most of its muscle mass crushed. There wasn't any way anymore for it to go forth and escape, more cracks into the skin, the breaking started and stopped. The long body split in six smaller beings, all of which sprouted legs and started moving faster, and faster they did, moving in all direction and anything they could feel. No eyes were given but they had just enough for them to know where to go and what to do. One was already taken down, a barrel, as heavy as it were, with its metal ends crushed the wailing, wriggling small beast and after a bounce the skin blackened as if it were ashes after a burning, to break apart seconds after left there alone. 'Crush them before they get away I said! Come one, put some backbone into it!' Still afraid and disgusted, others moved away as soon as they sprouted wings and started flying. Their evolution was more than fast, and with the time, there was only time to crush two more before the other three left the ground and started flying in the air. No longer did rocks reach, not that there was anyone left there to watch them spread as they started chasing smaller ones, though, in the end, it did not last long enough. After terrorising the people, as they started, too, even as they were split, growing larger, they started chasing the source of their coming. The stone was already cracked and tainted by the blood, leaving nothing but a mark on the ground that couldn't be removed, just as well as the ones where the others have been crushed. It didn't matter any more than wild beasts that followed out of instinct, the honeycomb that laid ahead. More colour, more of form, horned fiends now rules the great above, the sky was theirs and the bright colours and the strong reflection of the light couldn't do anything else but burn and smoulder their skin. At least until it developed into a carapace around, a dark brown that cracked under the sun, it wouldn't kill them but left a shimmering sound and a stench that could drive anything or anyone away if they wanted to. So it was, the disgusting fiend still bored the faces of those who watched before, small feet on each, they walked in their pairs, knowing too well, as they were able to see the smell, in a sea of darkness, still blind. It was the first town in a long time that the people were forced to come inside. Suddenly one snapped and it flew closer to the ground, striking at a window on its side, so harshly until it crushed in, forcing it to crack open under the pressure of fire. Under the carapace it laid, melding some of the glass on itself as well before returning to the leader. Clearly, even to those who watched, they had a leader, the one in front who did not only fly faster but had a sharper horn and held its fire still inside, bouncing around the carapace as the light was coming out. The heat was almost demonic, even to her. Standing on the other side of the room, looking for the commotion. The strike was more than enough to frighten a fully grown adult for ages to come. Candles laid, not moment ago near the window, though now melted with the glass, cut in halves by the heated shards that were spread in an area around the room. She was only locked to be alive, for when the horned beast came, not only did she lean against it, but also facing directly where she'd be taken blind by the likes of it. Now that it was safe, coming closer with a blanket taken from the side, she lifted forth and watched above, seeing how they still flew, too big to be animals, though he dared no question anymore, she was alive. Scarring the sky, when safety was on and people could do nothing but look away or run in fear, back in came on its side, the two others connected joint. As wide as its head was, came a gaping maw, accompanied by a set of six wings, the brown shade of almost, what could be close to velvet black. It was a terror in the sky, growing in size and speed, now safe from anyone that wanted to hurt it, for, at this point, more skin, the shell being formed above became too hard to be taken by stone, rock or anything flung. The speed was receiving though it knew too well. 'We're almost there.' Said Vincent in the tram. It's been minutes since Argus look at the cockpit to find nothing else than the fact it was a marriage, returning to his seat to wait. Realising, as well as he knew now, it was only a fake, he returned to both of them, as he pleased. 'What is it waiting for us in there?' Carefully he watched, though it wasn't needed, as the ones that were standing at the end already understood not to force themselves where they did not belong. 'What's waiting for us, not you. Don't forget that you're our guest in this.' Vincent. 'Fine, fine. What's waiting for us in there, is our people, you may not have realised this but that horse, the mansion, none of that seemed to be real at all. It came close to being taken from a damn fairy tale rather than the real world if you ask me, not to mention how it was dragged down from whenever it came out of.' 'Your point being?' Argus tried his best to fake surprise, though neither of them seemed to be taking the bait, being obvious, close to even a fact that he wasn't from around there. 'Those horses did not die when we shot them, something was wrong with that, not to mention the strange occurrences that happen all around us every single damn day.' 'It's really hard to ignore, especially if you've lived here as long as we've had.' It was the first time Argus had a clear view on her hand, standing against the tip of his chair, with the ring standing clearly attached still on the pointer. Jane and Vincent? 'Have you not noticed how an explosive did nothing but flip over a damn tram? You noticed it too when I placed it, how could an explosive do this and do no sort of damage? What of the people inside who felt nothing?' 'I don't know.' Answered Argus flustered, as Vincent was already getting too forceful pushing through, shoving his nails in the fabric that laid around the chair. 'I think you do know what I'm talking about, it's way too obvious in your eyes.'Two pale round spheres that seemed to do nothing but stare at him, though at the same time, through him, as they spoke.'I don't know!'Came again from Argus, though forcefully as it came to an end.The tram just stopped at the station and there seemed to be another circle of people assembling there, who wanted to embark on.'Well we'll have enough time to find out once you're being introduced to everyone, ain't right Jane?"Sure boss.'Like three stinger flies, they skimmed right through the small circle of people.They stood out, even in the eyes of children who couldn't look the other way even if they wanted to, though that couldn't be helped.Sweaty and roughened up always came still against clean, dark and white, dresses and robes, hats of which all belong to a different class than what they appeared as.'Peasants.'One mockingly said though it was hushed by a whisper towards Argus.'Don't mind them, move on.'Like a band of thieves and certainly seen like one, they were followed by the eyes but only before entering the darker corners.Back to the lowlife, Argus thought, expecting to find more than a rat, perhaps those dwelling on the other side, even though they had more than enough to take care off.'Hold on and don't let go, this way will be more than a little rough if you don't mind it.'Jane put it to the best description she could give, rough and dirty, perhaps a little way too dangerous at that, if ask of anyone else.'I won't complain as long as we move swiftly alright?"Deal!'Something that not even Vincent could go against, as they both agreed, and moved past pointers, in the black that laid in front of their eyes like mist, only small parts of the road they were on remained.'Don't let go until we're there.'Said, Jane, as they both formed a bond, watching front as, slowly, the way ahead was revealed.Only parts started, first, there was the right side of a bridge revealed like a stage light circled there.Instinctively, Argus looked above, with a shock on his face, though saw no source from where the light came out of.Then, the second thing he noticed was the stream of water that ran through, most likely under the bridge.'Argus.Can you hear me?"Yes, what's happening?I can't even see you or your hand."I need you to take a leap of trust in me, all right?I know it's sudden and we've barely met, but this is important, to keep out the operation to a secret, so, do you trust me?"I do."Good."There was some water going at his feet, as well as he could feel, though not to the point of dipping his fingers.'Leap of faith, Argus, leap.'Leap of faith she said when suddenly he couldn't feel the pair of hands holding him.Darkness was unshrouded and he could see the great height from which he was falling.Embraced, both his got near his head, especially the eyes, and no longer did he look at the sharp metal around him and how it was all stuck together.He felt only the splash and the water dance once he fell down inside. There was some attempt, but he opened his eyes, seeing nothing too well at first in the shallow water, until there came, near his hands, a solid object.He grabbed it, soon released.It turned out to be a foot, a human one, standing in the same water, which forced Argus into a shock.His hands wobbled by the side, unable to figure out what the head to know, and attempted to come out, but as soon as he reached further above, there turned out to be nothing more but the ceiling.I will drown, remains the immediate thought, followed by two strikes in a desperate attempts to break through and escape, which ended up being pointless.His breath getting only more shallow by the second, almost to the point of rivalling the water.Fine then, he thought again, after he decided to dive, there most certainly had to be away, down there after diving, he started feeling around the bottom floor.Suddenly, it all seemed too familiar, almost driven by an instinct, he took the path he knew way too well, ending up to feel another wall.Lungs about to give up and still he were too far away from getting where wanted, then he felt the dome and remembered, as it were unbroken.And with the immediate thought and breath ready to give away, he came down and started twisting through the dark water. The pressure already came to it as it started opening, until the point when a sudden pull and he found himself standing, pulling at the door so it wouldn't be closed by the intense pressure. No other way was there for him to hold it any stronger, or open it to its full extent, but alas. The breath of air came with a sudden, right when his lungs felt like they were ready to explode. With that, he forced it back close, with the water being stuck only at the waist, after that, being ready to scout around as he was, he turned and saw them, a body floating and the various parts, almost filled by the liquid. 'Is it even water anymore?' Asked Argus as he looked down, trying to see a reflection that was too shallow to be him. The skin around them had started decomposing and changing colour for a while, at the point of even asking himself. How long have I been gone? For how long he couldn't answer, but the hole was still in the ceiling as he had left it there, though it did nothing more than take a few drops most likely and leave them on the other side. Going forward around the room, past the broken dome of water, it turned out to be a shell. Harsh at the first touch, though it was pulled nonetheless from the other side. No animal I know could have such a shell. And just as he felt more about it, the slightly spiked shell, there seemed to be heated inside of it. Possibly even meat, something he hadn't felt in a long while, food, though after a glance around, his appetite was most certainly gone. Down to the next dome, he opened the valve to free some space and empty some of the shallow water that was already there needed. The dark room seemed to be empty, so there was no need to take in what it was, though plenty of room seemed to be there, though this one had its valve broken. After several attempts, someone must've melted it. 'How?' Fastened by the discovery, he jumped to the next one and bent again, searching below the murky water, through a basket of parasite that all flew away as his hands entered the water. 'Agh.' Came with a sudden noise, after he looked around and saw them spread all across the room in fear, while he groomed and shook his hands to make sure none of them had touched him. This one was taken out all the same. Past the body, at which he slowed down and dared not move too rashly close to it, still, even if it were to be alive, both of its hands were still there, anchored to the ground. Two should've been there, but not, they were burned, by the feeling of the unearthly forms the casing of the valves had. A trail lead deeper below and it got thinner as his hand went deeper feeling it. 'Damn it.' Came with a sudden change of tone, this one too, and the one that had the furnace. Someone was here. 'Which could only mean.' And in a way, he was right, the exit door, the only one that needed to be open, wasn't there. Melted to taken away, to the point where only a small iron rod came out of it. 'I'm locked.' Above there, still laid two opening, a shimmering side from where there were an explosion and the door of his cage. But that would mean. 'Back from where I started.' If I even manage to get up there. Again, he bent and tried twisting the broken valves, each and every one of them, except the one he used to get rid of the water. I need it once again now, but, it's certain that someone did this on purpose I believe. But who? Looking around made it clear that there was no one around, no one alive in any of the matter. 'Have I checked that door?' Came almost as a shout, close to being a realisation on the matter. I checked all the door, parasite were still grooming and sweeping around, those who were not afraid even nibbled at his trousers. 'Away, get away from me!' Yelled Argus as his hand just splashed them all away. It was true that he hadn't checked that one, the floating body was too distracting for any thought of getting closer to be had. By the side, to avoid approaching or even being caught if anything were to happen, he came closer and felt it. 'It's not.' The surprise ended before it even began. He was being led towards something by someone who managed to win below and take care of every valve from every door before hand. Being lead into a trap was still better than starvation. Though, surprisingly, this valves turned around much harder than the previous ones, both at the rate but also caused by the strange shape it now had. Longer by the edges, almost sharp and pointy, with many ridges and fragmented holes between the skeleton like texture. Was this replaced too? Though a glance at his hand revealed no scratch nor a mark of infection if it were to be the case. Stopped now, he looked and judged by the eyes that there'd not be enough space for him to move as of yet, especially with that in the way. With his heart weakened, he turned around and started pushing the cart through the water, making the harsh sound of wood being ripped under it right about that moment as he placed his hands on it. Something could be below, Argus pondered, after judging that possibility remained of a hollow space just below him, perhaps even a room, if that was possible. Not long did it take and the metal forced itself into the floating meat, which, already decomposing as it were seemed to have lost some of its anchors. A hand just ripped itself from the cart, sweat accompanied by his worrisome approach. 'You're not alive, are you?' Asked Argus without even stopped or taking a secondary break from his task. As soon as he pushed it two feet further, bubbles started coming from below, cracks laying under wood just under him. Such a task was nothing for a well-formed man, which he was as far as he could be from, hurt and scratched, possibly infested now by whatever type of parasites those were, he backed away. It wasn't much but he started kicking through the water and kept doing so until he felt that something was about to break. A plank suddenly broke below and bubbles came to be into a vortex, leading to deeper below. Down, he pulled it just like he did below, watching it act just the same, though the water kept going there until it suddenly stopped. 'Is someone there?' And then, his voice echoed for a second, bouncing against the walls of the deeper laying catacomb that laid there. There seemed to be a strong light and plenty of space, though, without a hard lasting ceiling, it was hard to say. More wood was ripped apart by his bare hands, it was almost unbelievable how much of it Argus took out, even for him. At this point he jumped into the hole, disregarding even the place where he displaced the small wooden planks and managed to hit the ground. On a sudden dance of moves, he found himself standing on the other side and on his right, the stream of water coming in. There wouldn't be much time, and everything would be flooded. Though a door and yet another one just laid in that room and there was just enough time to open the farthest one. Books, manuals, a library down here? For a second he reconsidered his action, as, this room, as well, refused to flood and keep the water still on its walls. All of it just seemed to disappear and be swept just right under the rugs and the crevice of the door. Light poured it, though there was a switch which he had just snapped off. 'Natural blue light.' So this must be the end of my destination. Taking off a book off the shelf, it read clearly. 'Voyage Manual by June.' Another one was taken, from which a map came out of it, initials by the side. 'Scott Fingletwon. SF.' Written with silver on what seemed to be a silken map. Other books that seemed to be either a decade old, or perhaps even more than that, not to mention, the least of which would be worth a fortune to a collector. 'Nothing to carry in with. I guess I'll settle down with the two of you alone.' The map was taken and shoved firmly into his pants, as well as his other asset, the first book is taken for now. A globe on the side, though it couldn't be real, judging by the formation and the writings it had. All of which, and the running stream that came low in the opening, there was a harsh sound though barely audible, which Argus did not hear. It went on for some time, as he looked in the drawer upon which the globe was, pillaging it. Though, still, he wondered, what laid there. After a second, seeing how there were only clothes inside. 'Clothes?' Rubbing his finger against them, it turned out to be clean and fresh, too clean to be plainly abandoned then. 'What's there then?' No longer could he keep his curiosities inside his head, as he opened, a sudden cold wind chilled the wind and he almost fell off. Shaken in his boots, barely holding the edge of the opening and with the other one the edge of the door, he stood shock and looked everywhere. His eyes couldn't even be forced to stop from looking into the various directions of the ocean of the air. No water, but a sea of white clouds, accompanied by deep blue and a dark storm as far away from the course as he could see. There laid a dizziness at the point where Argus felt as if he was breathing a different air than the one he had. And then, he slipped, the water running through too dry. There wasn't any time to grab a hold of anything, as he looked away, afraid that he'd die. 'Aaagh.' He looked around, thinking he had fallen in the dark storm that laid below. Though the clouds weren't there, neither were the wooden steps he once held so precious to him. A blanket was around and he stood on a barrel. 'Jane.' 'You're fine, you're fine. I need you to calm down and tell me where do you think we're at now.' Breathing shallowly in her hands, he finally looked around, at the clean marble floor, the stone walls fragmented by bricks and the lavished deep brown doors that accompanied. There were more than a few people standing and talking to each other about various things that were beyond Argus. 'Awake I suppose?' As he turned, he noticed Vincent smoking from an old wooden pipe. He realised then, that he stood near Jane on a couch behind a table with a giant map of what appeared to be a city, without a doubt, the city they were in. 'So, why the secret hideout then? Who exactly are you?' 'I've told you he's an outsider.' Whispers and small talks emerged from all sides. The cloak of slight black that laid on the ceiling seemed as if it pulled all the smoke and darkness inside of it in a peculiar fashion. We could be anywhere from the looks of it. 'I understood well and clear, but now then, Argus.' 'I don't believe I told you my name.' 'You haven't, but this hand.' Barely caught, his license with his real name and dates was as clear as ever, though it was well too hidden to just have been pickpocketed like that. It only made sense too well. 'You've searched me when I was asleep.' And took your gun and everything else we just gave you since Argus, you came just in time for our operation. 'Operation.' Jane at this point already circled around the man, just as two others approached in. There laid an old man with a sharp nose, wicked smile that could be barely contained by the pipe itself, wearing a dark hat and dusty robe. And a younger woman that kept herself covered at the time. 'Can you explain who gave you the right to search me and take my apparel?' 'No one, but you've made an unspoken pact with us ever since you entered that door and I'm afraid there's no way back anymore, at least not by us.' 'I can't even remember how I.' There was a silence as his voice got deeper and louder, to the point where he stood out against all of them. Too many, I found myself in the same bird's nest again, too many for me to take on. Not that I'd have a chance with how well they're armed. 'Tell me what I need to do.' 'Good dog, we were in great need of dogs since the last batch failed.' 'And what exactly does that mean?' 'Well Argus, it means that it wasn't a coincidence that the mansion we found you out suddenly came to pieces and got dragged below the ground. We had a party of our people go down there and place explosives under. And I've no doubt that you came from down there.' 'What makes you say so?' 'Other than the suits, manner and colour in your eyes? How did you miss it for so long?' Dark brown eyes whilst everyone standing seemed to have, what could only be a shade of orange. 'Ehm, and now, you work for us and you will assist the other in taking down this one.' He pointed straight at another mansion that seemed to be located at one of the far ends of the town. Already had Vincent laid his hand, if that were his given name, that it was crossed off. Four others were taken down too at that. 'And the horses?' 'There were none, it's a common vision coming from the side effect of the hallucinogen we injected in you when you first came to us.' 'You bastard, how dare you to drug me?!"Keep it silent now, I still need an answer and don't think I'll go easy on you, after all, we've had a deal."And you were on this too Jane."Just accept it.'Came the man, and it was enough for him to speak that the others fell into an unwanted silence, whenever or not they wanted to.As he went on.'The way I see it, you either go on or it's worse for you.And you seem to have a glimpse of luck about you, something I can't truly explain at all, but it's there."Fine, anything to get as further away from this place."Good, you'll be taken for the briefing."The man paused as he took another deep smoke from his pipe, before letting it go and rise above and over his head.As well as he nodded and Argus felt the cold breath on his shoulder as he turned around.Too cold for someone for the temperature that laid inside.'Let's go.'Said a hooded figure.'See you soon Argus, it was a pleasure doing business with you.'Those were to be the last words said and laid on to him by Vincent as he expected not to return after they were done.Too many rooms to count, but most of them were most likely used for sleeping or other useless activities, nothing worth remembering after, other than the briefing room they spoke about.It stood out more than any other in the sense that it was wider, just as most likely the room were and the others around them were just more anxious, to begin with.'First, we get dressed, then you'll be instructed, understood?"'Loud and clear."Good.'As brief as it were, they seemed to have a glimpse of training, though there still had to be a way to ditch them, and avoid their suicidal mission as much as he could, if it were.The door opened and it was almost like there laid a rock from the bottom on the sea as further away in his neck as it could be.Suits, yellowish and covered, the same ones he had seen everywhere he had previously gone, including that man he had reached.And killed, how could I have forgotten about that part.And those men below, of who he thought to be just engineers, which he trapped before down there when there was a chance for them for an escape.No, they were not sinless either, after all, they sunk the mansion under water and in the immediate depths.There was nothing to stop him as he took a suit and equipped it from the back.'Let me help you with the zipper.'Said another, as it needed at least two.Seemingly, a problem laid there with the zipper, as not only was there a need for it to be dragged by another person, but small clicks could be heard in the back.'Give me a second till I'm finished twisting it."Ah.'That will prove to be a commotion once there'd be no need for them but I'll handle.'Done.Now turn around and do mine.'There was something that made the suit cool inside, perhaps the air vent or something else, though the feeling could only be described by him a being close to being divine.Sure, there was the problem that everything he could see in front of his eyes remained close to being monotone since the visor was included with the suit, though that remained only a minor issue.'Twist when it stops, it should be easy."Oh, right."Left side please.'First, it came into that, then again it could be unblocked and easily lifted, thought it seemed to be stopped at certain nodes in the suit, at which point it resembles the spine.'Done.'As for the others who were now waiting outside, he looked like one of them, without knowing just how muffled his voice was too.'Can you hear me?"Though immediately it triggered a response, coming by the twisting of hands and what not.'I suppose not then.'For such a big disadvantage, it certainly needed to out it in usefulness, which brought the question.What exactly are we carrying there, that we need the suits for?By the end of the hallway, they shifted enough without noticing for them to forget which of them was Argus, or at least that's what he hoped for.No weapon this time, though some engineering tools would do just fine if it came to it.Which they found, standing on a table, lit by a lamp.The floor was clean white and squared under the table, almost to the point of being dwarfed by it in the process, but plenty for them to take.Each took one, though Argus made sure he was the fourth one to last, to take his case and pick up from their mannerism in motion. They do pick them up the same way, sliding the right hand and grabbing it by the collar. Either they knew or they didn't but he had no way to find out, nor any of knowing where they were moving, and at that, they kept on going. Another set of doors opened, dim lit, with cold air coming from below. Whatever they opened and went through, it seemed as if there was going to be a long way to go, though a lot of empty space, enough for it to have been something once. Who carried the explosive then? Argus asked himself, as he almost started jittering in his boots. There was no time for any of them to do so, neither could he look around, though somehow they knew what they were doing if there even was an explosive at all to be set. Water under him, left, along with debris and giant sharp tracks that reflected the light from their suits. It seemed as there was a light that bounced between them from somewhere, which in the course, bounce on the side, at least on the side that wasn't affected by rust. Though why now? Why must I wait and uncomfortably go through this? Like miners going for coal, after the mine has been broken through, he had no way nor need to complain but wait. And wait, wait, wait, until something happened. Soon there'd be pitch black again, though not if he could help it since it happened before. 'I just need to.' And it happened, to his surprise, opening his eyes, he found himself with a sore neck, which brought an indescribable pain, out of which he couldn't even scream or shout. Immediately did his hands shift and twisted his neck back into the right position, rigging his bones and spine, in a painful daze. 'Damn it, damn it, damn it.' Rolling on the floor out of pain, he stopped and looked around, realising where he was after seeing the wooden figures, then standing still once again. 'At least I'm. Not stuck.' The first glance at the suit and he understood who he was, the same man he almost killed, though he didn't dare go below and check on himself. Instead, he turned, knowing, still dazed by the sudden commotion, he approached and called the elevator, though the same point from where he remembered calling it with the shovel. Sparks came by from the sides, though he still wore the suit and felt nothing. In an unnatural way, the two doors holding it were shoved by the side immediately, slammed against whatever spaces they had inside the walls. There were wires and small bumpy metal cylinders standing attached in front of him, and just as well, as there wasn't any point of describing the debris which was below. 'Out of order.' At least the elevator itself, though there was another way, as he grabbed one and felt nothing. 'This suit works ever better than expected.' Thought Argus, rejecting the call. There laid something behind a domed door that seemed to call him back, back to reality or somewhere else, which he ignored. Already have there been plenty, if not too many layers for him to take account of what was real and what not. He grabbed the other cable which already coiled around despite being anchored to the ground and jumped into the abyss. There was a sliding as well as the pain coming from the friction but two feet against the wall as well as he managed to entangle one of his feet managed to stop him from sliding away deeper than he went. Various circuits lit as he went on with his feet upon them, revealing the glowing light, of what seemed to run all across the elevator shaft. What laid inside wasn't important. 'I know I'm time though can they hear me speak through here? Are they close?' Chances are, just as I thought that I may be just under another mansion, just as I have previously been. 'No, no no, but we lay above, how could I have forgotten about it?' There was a sudden recollection of how he fell from the, seemingly airship he had previously been on. Though looking back at it, also meant that the body that was down there now laid dead, somewhere on the ground, crushed by the fall, never to return again. 'Well, only one way left now.' Greater above, lifting himself by the bootstrap, meter by meter, until he got closer to what seemed to be another opening. It didn't come as a surprise, of how much ease he got to get up upon, though nonetheless, it wasn't hopeless at all, for, as he got the right front of it, he saw that there was yet another level he could climb to. So, again, he went back to it, dragging himself greater above, towards the point where he needed be, if the opening was to be had. Steel doors, at least were there, not to mention that Argus was turned with his back against them. He'd have needed a miracle to get through it unscattered and fine, though there was none, just bouncing against the wall and noticing something. The glowing tubes seemed to get bigger and grow stronger upon pressure being applied to them, to the point where even the glow got stronger. Blue lightning seemed to be in there, at least the sparks and colour seemed to be that way, though not only was it mad to think that they could control the weather and run with what they took from the sky, but also harvest it and store in the tubes. Madness, at its purity, though the glow and what it looked like close, especially in the darkness where he laid, had to be the very worst. Nonetheless, it revealed more than he needed to know, just right above of him there was revealed to be just another elevator, with a trapdoor too, right under the bloody thing. 'Don't they usually come above, not under?' His voice echoed below, though there was no mention nor care of the fact that there used to be only two of them, or even close to the fact that he wouldn't have been able to open the steel doors with his bare arms. The coils lead inside into the devices that were attached, and right between them laid a small grabbable handle, waiting for Argus to entangle his forearm around it so he wouldn't fall. Such process usually takes more than enough time, especially for someone who's not been fed or given water, of which he failed to notice that he hasn't felt the lack of ever since he left the hideout. No hunger, no thirst nor tiredness, they must've been doing something to him whilst he was asleep, especially ever since they dragged his body without a notice. 'Damn you, open already.' Pulling through seemed to be hard and harsh, even with the suit, hence, his body slipped into the boots and hands, leaving his body weight to have a pull at it. It was a dangerous move, but he managed, just in time to regain control and not fall below the rubble, opening the small trap door, of which elevator was empty. No notice as he went inside, climbing between the ropes and in the small squarish door, closing it so he'd not be noticed, and through the filter the clean air. There was a panel which seemed to have numbers to be inserted on the left side, along with a star and a symbol that he couldn't have known what it meant even if he tried to understand it. Another one on the other side which had just arrows pointing in all directions, though the one in the middle being a red square. All other buttons were plain white, though not seemingly painted to be that way. 'Right and a code? Is it the floor or a code?' Pressing two immediately made one appear right on a small glass screen, such advancements said quite a lot about the place. After pressing the button number three, it immediately replaces the two with a sharp beep that could've been mistaken for a threat, if he didn't know any better. 'Now..'. Feeling as he was still not moving from where he stood, and looking back to the side, his hand slipped and pressed on the arrow which pointed straight above. It finally moved and vibrated all around, the pressure being felt even through the suit, making his little bones tremble as it happened. 'Stop this.' Came unexpected, though it wasn't like he hadn't had episodes before where his speech came away. The elevator stopped and the door opened at last. There was a red light that was as strong as one could come as, at the point where every side and object inside the room got covered by a red mask, floor, objects, vents, even the constant steam coming out from the ceiling and the pumps that went on had a hint of it. His suit became just as red as he could see, as much as he wanted to see more of it, the suit made it too hard to breathe inside. 'Not yet.' Left and one, came as the next command immediately after, and there was the feeling of a nudge by the walls inside. The next opening revealed the same room, with a red overlay on top of everything and steam still coming off from every side of the machine and pumps that ran there. Only a few differences stood between, as obvious as it were part of that room, only that it was an extension separated by the pumps. 'How long does this thing run?' Asked Argus, this time a lot louder, though still not enough to go past the costume. For a moment he looked at the device and thought just how much further could it go, just how big was this ship if it were a ship, to begin with? 'Up, as much as we can.' He said as he kept pressing the same combination over and over, nine and above, nine and above, it didn't seem to stop, at least not for some time, until, it finally did happen. Alas, it seemed to have stopped, without a doubt of anything at all, the elevator stopped and he could clearly see, the gust of winds, clouds cutting through as it opened in what used to be a cabin. It was long broken, smashed or worse by the looks of it, both at the point of the glass which either laid fragmented in the small squares which could only be called as small windows. Of which, only one of them survived, as the rest of them were just gone. The first step outside and his body was being pushed, which each consecutive step making it even harder to go further and make any possible progress at all. Such a task was already hard as it were, not to mention of the loneliness he started feeling there. There seemed to have happened something here, but what? Another glance above though there was no balloon there the ship in the air, though the bride seemed to be just well made and sharpened in the front to cut through clouds. Nothing else but broken pieces of the wooden floor and empty sacks of a heavyweight by the side. It wasn't worth much of the trouble, Argus thought as he returned. Now, the above turned out to be completely out of reach, as were the depths from what he could tell. 'Why am I here then?' No one to answer and not even the slightest comforting echo ran through his head and against the walls. He looked around to see that there was a blinking light that bounced all the way from the panel on the right. A dull four, followed by the arrow pointing below just ran up to his attention. 'Being called.' Peculiar, though he remembered too that someone was tampering with something that wasn't of his own accord. It might be the one who trapped me, though it immediately opened to a dark way. He stepped ahead and immediately a bunch of figures stood in front of him walking away. Before any reaction, he stopped and recognised who it was, hence why he didn't proceed in attacking them as they stood. Behind, over a thrown look they were the same people with who he came out of the hidden place, though the elevator space disappeared as it were. 'And none of them noticed even for a bit.' Said Argus, unheard. His voice was getting harsher by the second spend there in the unknown space, the sound of the dripping water from the ceiling made it a bit nervous. After all, they were all silenced inside their suits, and the only sound that could be heard in all the silence was the water falling. Argus made his choice already not to speak, though the gloom around didn't make it any less tempting and shattering to hear. The smallest insect sudden appearance, the crack made by it made the whole row almost fall off them and get ready for a fight, only to be thrown aside at the sight of the small creature jumping. 'This paranoia will be the end of us all, and none of them wants to listen.' 'That was close.' Said another, right as he was ready to fall off the edge, luckily grabbed and held as far as he could from it. If there were a way to properly thank the man, this wasn't it, as, other than the nod of a head, and another in reply by the other, not even the slightest sound. Scuffling and away from the dust, they managed to regain the speed and the movement, cutting through the blooming black at a faster rate than before. The way it seemed, a sudden bed of dirt came from the ceiling and just past them from where they stood, enough to have a dead body in it, that again, they stood looking at a bothered stance. Corpses were being thrown from somewhere above, and from the looks and feel it gave away, there must've been a graveyard just stashed somewhere.'No wonder why the city looked so well.'With that Argus looked below and saw just how much stood out in the gloom, how tall they stood and more certainly, the distance between them and the openly dug grave they'd end in. It was certain that there was going to be something like that once they reached their point and started working on that, they all felt it just as much as he did. But no way out, unless he jumped, the suit could've protected him from all the possible contamination if it came to it, perhaps even to the point of managing to escape. And not to mention that, they didn't know who he was. 'No, there must be something preventing me from doing so. There's no way Vince would've let me just freely go without expecting me to run on the first occasion.' Every moment was clear now to Argus, every turn he made and was being watched, and every glance they threw at one another as they forced themselves to go faster after leaving the mansion. Even the guns that were being pointed at him, Jane was clearly easier at hand than him, at the point where he wouldn't have known about the firearms if it weren't for him to point that out. 'Damn it, if only.' There was a creek and one of them from the group started wriggling and twisting himself by the sides. Obviously, something was going wrong as the others started moving further away from him. At this point, with all that space, he suddenly jumped down, still clearly visible and ran through the dirt. 'Renegade.' Shaking as he saw it, his muscles twitched unexpectedly, wanting, just so, so desperately to jump in and run, seeing that he had already some steps through and none of the others was following him. That's when it came as a shock, silent but still, it must've been long range and too quick for the eyes as he saw nothing but a red splash, almost like water come out of the head before he fell to the ground. The poor fellow hadn't even reached the dirt that he fell there with the remains. Around, he turned and saw the leader, he had a gun, pointed, leaving nothing but a shiver on the spine, at the point where Argus could feel it in everyone who felt so. Damn this man. Said, Argus, as he looked at the gun being cocked back in the toolbox he had been carrying without even the slightest notice. It seemed as if to appear that it was welded to his hand, though doubtlessly, there couldn't have been a firearm. It was only in his small box. Damn you again, though. It also meant for him that there was the chance that they all thought him dead, all because one of their poor sobs was driven mad and threw himself into the shark's mouth, isn't that right? As they went on he couldn't look again, nor behind, nor by the side. Walls made of flesh, the faces he had recognised just well before. Someone was most clearly trying to reach to him and he knew too well who it was. Or better phrased, what it was. The dirt by the side and the smell that somehow came through even the suit should've stopped it, made him sick, though he returned his gaze nonetheless to see the walls suddenly be pushed back to make some room. 'Come in.' The voice said, and beyond anything, he felt obeying the command. Ferdinand, wasn't that my given name? Asking himself propped no answer for anyone else but himself, and disappointingly, he remembered something else. 'I.' Glancing around revealed that they didn't seem to notice just how bizarre Ferdinand was acting up, nor just how he stepped inside, wriggling ground that almost started nibbling at the suit. The sound of closing was the one of a carapace being forced behind, just to merge with a wall of utmost refusal. Lured into a trap of which he couldn't do much to refuse, there was an attempt to return though the wall was too thick, the floor too slippery on the way back. Argus, but felt no pain, though as he lay there, he felt and saw through the visor how just plainly standing there was inviting the various veins of skin just to spread across his visor. Possibly his entire body if he gave them just enough time. Immediately, it proposed a response as he lifted himself up, to see the exit, a door that was made of raw meat, recognisable even to him, though he could only hope that it didn't belong to another human being. Where are you? I know you can hear me here! Tell me where you are?" The voice had left him for far too long and now he couldn't help but try staring in the empty movement of the skin around, the pulsating blood that was coming from inside. It fell onto the floor from one of the corners of the room, only to be reabsorbed once again. Pieces of raw meat started falling off, until from a squarish door now remained a concave opening just perfect for him to come in. Though the walls from the other side seemed perilous, he didn't dare stay much where he stood. Unless he wanted to faint and face the consequences of that action, there wasn't any way back for him or for any other just as himself. Through the gate, he jumped and heard in close. A thin voice came, almost sharp, guiding him through the broken hall. The walls seemed to move and shift, some had only a stretched face that made no sound. Still, Argus wondered as he plainly touched one that stopped right next to him. "Were you alive?" Though it couldn't exactly hear, and doubtfully that he could understand, the stretched eyes suddenly turned to face, rotating through the small hole, pulled inside and again pulled outside, though not where he expected. It was distracting to see their dance, though it seemed to be another one just behind, switching eyes from one another, moving through space from the bottom of the floor, right in front of his eyes. He felt like covering his own from the disgust he felt as he watched their dance, though promptly he refused and moved one. "Front and do not take off the road." "You, where am I, why am I here? Where are you even guiding me to? You've abandoned me and left me to die there and." Spoken to no one as he stared at them, out of a sudden switched, he found himself surrounded, with a clear path that leads only curved by the sides. Being lead on a twisted slope, Ferdinand started counting each and every single one of them, from left to right, each facial expression prompting a different response. So many muscles just pulled and stretched, modified to be stronger, though for what reason could it be? "Why am I not being answered? Damn you and damn myself for not staying home that day, I should've left those men to kill me then." Though it away he tried biting his lips on that, as there wasn't a chance that he couldn't be taken back there, as he knew it, though there was always a way for it to be replicated. His punishment for not finding the cage. Made of skin, again it came out of them, more details being revealed about it, as he went on. Though it was clear now, that it wasn't made of skin, or bone as the images that manifested out of them, nor out of grass, or bits of a tram. Pulsating coming into it from the sides, coils or cables, perhaps, tunnels. "Tunnels." That could explain, if it were so, why his presence is acting as such in here. "Are we being lead to there then? If so, I will find it and free you if it means my freedom given in return." Though the last steps were shallow, the light came out an opening. Ferdinand looked above and saw once again, the tremendous infinity of skin that spread across the sky, now watching him directly and only him in their dance. Clearly there was an uncomfortable movement and a desire for them to approach. Beyond that, the voice faded and he couldn't hear anything else but them. "Why do you help him escape?" A combination of more than a few voice suddenly came to be joined together, though it wasn't clear to whom it did belong to, at least not at first as, with every syllable, a sound spike felt like cutting through the bottom ear. It was mildly painful and below, beyond the edge of the bridge he went upon, the fall would be more than enough for him to die. "I can't help it, I can't take him alone." "Why are you so weak, oh creature of skin?" The intensity of their voices was more than enough to make him kneel and stop feeling for a moment where he was. If they were meant to continue any longer, he would feel nothing more than meaningless torture. Back on a knee, though unable to stand still, he looked behind, only by a look, to end up seeing the bridge being pulled back, leaving only a floating platform, on which he stood, watching the various shapes waiting for a response. What will I tell them now? If I give them the wrong answer I will most certainly die, if they're not even more cruel than it. Think Argus, think, they've got no reason to keep someone weak alive. They've got no reason stopping them from endlessly torturing you just as he promised if they would even think of letting you run or escape their grasp. Why are you so weak, oh creature of skin? Prompted Argus, the question once again. The sky was turning black and grey, like thunder the tumour turned, of which Argus knew too well that it was an illusion and the skin just forced itself into a point. As he looked, it seemed as if he was taking to the main body, longer than any of the other growths, paying more attention to the small human of which audience was called. 'What is it then? What will it be?' It was a peculiarity even for him to be here, looking back at it, seeing the gate close now, skin dripping to reveal the metal door and the tubes that held it together in the first place. 'I am not weak, after all, I've made it so far, haven't I not?' 'Skin creature. Blackened, the skin around became an enveloping carapace, and by the looks of it, the strong blue in blue, bright as it were seemed to replicate, at least to him, the feeling of lightning above. Of energy to be more precise, the thought having been sprouted out of the fact that sparks were coming as the various area suddenly got encompassed in the colour, only to have disappeared soon after, and repeat. I cannot wait for it to rain, not without expecting something worse to happen to me, already have I come to the point of succumbing to the pain. Said Argus as he looked at his hand, right after it felt, just below his eyes and nose, from a cough a little more blood coming out. The blood wasn't as normal either, as it prompted a surprised look, even for him, the yellowish substance that seemed to be circling inside of it was further than the norm. What surprised he, even more, was the fact that it managed to go right through the material and leave none of it inside, yet it managed to block everything he heard and felt, even the strongest fragrance at that. Though that was beyond the most important thing at hand, for he didn't care either how it heard him, still. 'Now, if I may ask and I do not care whenever or not you can understand me or why it's that, though I believe that I have more than earned the right to ask a question for myself, if I may.' No answer prompted, yet it seemed to have slowed down its rhythm, the various shapes around its long body now twisted beyond his imagination, at an utmost unnatural rate. Long pointed spears came out by its sides, as far as he could see, distracting though lasting only for a second as they stretch towards the horizon, the immediately were pulled back. If that was a mere distraction, it managed just well, now with a concave mouth, black carapace though no eyes developed, as it didn't need them anyway, Argus turned and asked. 'Do you know of him then?' No more explanation was needed then, it was, without a doubt, if they were real, to begin with, aware that a part of them was alive. A piece of the past, knowing of the future, at least that's what Argus understood from it. 'Yes.' Came it, sharp and simple, followed by a strong, almost blinding thunder, growths of grass appearing just below. Something was growing, perhaps, in their world, this was the birth of it, if he had remembered it correctly, though could it be that so much more of it was missed in the first vision. 'Then why.' There was a stop that made him stay and listen to it come forth, close, though, at the point where it entered the atmosphere, its texture changed. If it were skin, not it got whiter and more transparent, bits of slime being attached and grabbing hold of the air as it approached him. Closer to a point, there was only a slight horror of being swallowed by it or worse. The flashback of those faces, those children attached to it and talking in unison could almost be seen in it as it approached. 'It is our turn if we may.' And Argus nodded at it, and perhaps even wondered how quaint it was for it to ask. Is it curious then, of a being beyond its body? It certainly seemed that way, as, slowly, it came from the sides, wriggling like a worm or snake, attempting to calculate around its prey. Has it never seen a being separate from its own then? "Do you serve it?" "I." Again, was he at a stop, whatever he said now could, more likely either be heard immediately or forever after, in his punishment. As of late, the influences were too heavy and pushed to be denied, vision and forms of the cage, though no key there, and now this, an image from the past speaking directly to it. Though not a second did he think otherwise as he gave the answer back to it. "I serve my own needs if it comes to it." That was more or less to be the truth, as it would turn out, there was more to it than just a simple yes or no. He could be heard or he couldn't, he could be tortured and punished or not, though if he showed that he truly believed to be nothing more than a slave, what could stop it from punishing him anyway if he were to release it. From. "Where is the cage?" He asked as it bobbed back to its corner, seeing the slime slightly evaporate in the air and be pulled once again. The slime that wasn't pulled either died off, vanishing or just being crushed by the massive body, though against what? Was there a wall between the body and the slime then? No, though something did affect them if they tried getting inside, that was made more than clear by the visit. And just it time at that, the bridge was forming once again, and the gate was opening just as well. This wouldn't be the last time they'd meet, as it was made clear just plainly before, though what it meant now, as Argus looked for the answer. It wouldn't matter, though, now that he was being pushed behind against his own will. The sluggish creature that stood under him suddenly moved with its sticky substance almost completely covering his legs. "It's near." The words stood by for a second as he gazed in what could only be called the void, in wonder. For a second he'd forgotten but not in the least refused to listen to the departing words that were told to him. "We will meet again, oh creature of skin." Said in a unison of voice, more than a few by now have noticed his presence as well as his departure. None reacted at all, other than to leave him beyond the gate. "I should've never accepted this!" It wasn't as easy as one would expect, going through all of it, being expected to go on. Punching the wall resulted in nothing more than leaving an ugly dent against it and deforming the meat even further than it already was. "Why must I be forced to do their dirty work?" Another punch deformed the wall even further than what it had become, though bent by a knee, as hard as it were for him to hold himself up. The height he was in was just enough to leave him dizzy for a while, though there was no intention present in him to take it easy. Yet another and another and another followed soon after until he ended up too tired and fell on his back, hitting the back of his head on the hard ground. Argus could feel the skin crawling under him, even to the sides as it went on and on, creeping in all directions as he was ready to just close his eyes. Could it be so worse to wait? "Will I become part of you after?" If it meant avoiding the punishment, death was a chance. But looking at his hand, turning and twisting it in front of the visor, it was too slow to be able to even work, no, perhaps it wouldn't even grow on him if he wanted. Plus, it could've been way too slow, if it came to it. "I must return then, damn it!" With a fist firmly planted in the ground, he made his way back scratching and stretching the faces on the walls from the opened crevices that used to be their mouths. So far were they stretched that there wasn't any possibility for them to scream, no matter how much they wanted, he stopped to take a look. Luckily the walls stopped on a whim. Argus could look freely inside of it and see through, space where there'd normally be a throat, it was an empty hole. Some were shining inside of him, reaching far, and slowly, the sparks were present, and the reflection of the material almost gave it away. Slowly, resting the tip of the finger at the top of it, then around, he felt just how sharp was the point, even if he hadn't push enough to impale his own finger. Quickly he pushed in further, feeling the saliva go around his arms, dripping on the floor, at the point of the shaft. He pulled and threw it just a few inches in the air before quickly grabbing it and pulling it out as fast as he could. Without being able to see well enough where he was pulling, the needle managed to cut through the mouth, leaving an opening which opened the way for blood to emerge, as well as the split lip. The strand of skin fell to the bottom and the needle shined through, simple and appointed, only small sharp spikes came out of each end, the one at the bottom and the one at the end, leaving only the middle point between each other to be grabbed safely. Now saliva and blood ran freely, fading on the bottom, back to its own. Looking in the other mouths that laid inside the room revealed that they all shared the same needle, at the point where he thought. 'It might as well be part of the anatomy.' Though feeling though another, after placing the one to the bottom, he took just two additional ones. Strangely, perhaps too peculiar, they blood didn't stick but completely avoid, falling just around the material of the suit. 'Now where?' 'Do I put them?' It was a question he needn't ask nor answer for he had forgotten that he was carrying, no, it was carrying itself around his hand, having close to no weight at all. The tool box they all shared. Will it fit, though? That was next to be found out, other than the tools in there, they went on just perfectly, three spikes that seemed to be more than sharp, more than enough. They'd come in handy if it came to his escape. 'They're waiting for you.' Said the voice shaped through the room. It wasn't the one he'd expect to hear, though somewhat, he was still in their domain, hence the reason why they'd act so much stronger. 'Very well, I will leave.' 'Do not forget, we will be watching. Noting over your progress.' A nod was prompted and the wall opened back into the dark set of brick and the bottom floor, dirty and rusted by the dark water which stopped dripping from the ceiling. As a matter of fact, not only did that stop falling, but they all just waited there, in the middle of them there was just enough space for him to slip right through. 'I could end it just right here.' Now he truly felt the tool box as his arm muscles pushed forth for it to emerge. He'd only need the three spikes, the rest he'd attempt to wrestle through and dispose of him or of her after they were gone thorough with their bodies. But did I need this now? The plan with the explosives didn't seem that out of the way, and there was already one which they could've seen him, just a dead man. 'Not yet.' He said, unheard, trying to muster the desire of backstabbing them and trying to escape. Though it turned out that they didn't even notice at that, which was more than enough for him to go on with his plan. As another turn was taken, the wall of skin being by now fully adjusted and hidden from sight. The next turn and a staircase just laid there by the side, just plainly and unmistakable for anything else. 'So soon?' Asked Argus, as he looked curious and at the same time, his desire to stay and continue the road was far greater than what he expected to find out there. This has to be it, inside the tubes and the cage, but I cannot escape yet. Bound in-between them, he went on ahead and followed, at least until the change to escape. A trap door opened and the light suddenly came in, this was nothing fancy yet, other than the daylight if he could even call it like that now, in a secluded place, perhaps the lower area of the town. The lower area, perhaps, but after some exposure, the light came back to being just as strong, the colours bright, though it didn't change how oiled and worked out people looked at. What Argus failed to see at first was the fact that there were no singular tall houses, other than the fact that they had tenths of windows and apartments, all crowded in one another, just like animals, all caught together in cages. 'The working class.' Immediately the thought came by it, perhaps at the point of explaining why none of them seemed to be any more surprised by them. 'Were they expecting us?' Though even as they close the hatch, Argus noticed the colours change, the suits no longer wore a colour, but a multitude of them, roughened up, appearing as dirty cloth. He looked at his hand and noticed the material twisted under his eyes, becoming more flaccid, seemingly falling apart on itself, only to bend again in various shapes. Quite reaching for whatever it was, and flexible at that too, it covered the body, remained flexible, changed colour and look and utmost all, it acted like business armour, more or less at that. And no one would even dare think of them of anything else than a couple of metal workers, just going back at their job. Returned on the surface, they were waited and accounted for. 'Less than expected, so I presume either one of you had to go back or he's ill.' A moustached man with a certain style of a suit came as if he was waiting for hours, longer than what was the norm and presented themselves. 'You may have heard about it, though, if not, let me introduce myself. Timmothy M. Fly, at your very service. And if you may take a look and follow me, I promise you not to be disappointed, though I have promised the previous lot that there'd be a safer way inside, when I decided to sneak in, times changed. Not to be alarmed or anything, the plan still on, but a few minor alterations.' By the side, hidden by anyone who wasn't searching for them specifically, and most certainly hidden from the sun laid a pair of industrial hammers. 'We'd have to go through about to get to the point of breaking through with the bomb.' Though even the wind was sharper than him, even there and even at this point, the only down part remained, no sound. They'd have to deal with it, each equipped with a hammer, hand in hand to one another, no doubt that they were already paid for, as he'd now have to sneak them in, not to mention the informing part. There was time, more than enough and the town was just as far and wide as one could ask for, filled with districts that couldn't even be traversed by mere foot, if it wasn't for the tram. Eighteen districts, to say the least, towers, the mansions of the mayors, houses of the upper class, lower class, middle class and at least a hundred more classes in-between and above. It was a society that was left on its own to evolve after so much time on its own and with so many resources left. And even though it felt so out of the order, Argus knew that this couldn't be hidden somewhere in the world, though it appeared it was. Someone was with him, though there was no doubt by now that she had died and joined them at that. And if there really were a friend that was released just as well, from now on, it was beyond his care. No voice came to him, other than a manifestation, of which he had no control upon, nor could he deny it either. 'A free man.' Which came at a price. Indeed. 'A free man.' 'There there, no need to stay all day by the window, you'll catch a cold.' There was a curiosity at that, after the ruckus that was heard, something had been going in the town ever since the beginning of the morning and the heads of children could be seen being dragged out to watch. Long and pale houses, dark and seemingly shimmered in the moonlight, their appearance made them look more like stolen boats than of those where people lived. Perhaps that's what even draw people in there with their bussiness, the fishermen having their stalls, the other ones trying to sell their fishing nets and strings. And speaking of strings, it appeared as if, from one side to the other, and not the adjacent ones, the buildings were connected with what now seemed to resemble fishing lies, that dragged at that. Perhaps just a coincidence, though it didn't hurt the business, especially since its glimmering pale white against the dark wood could be seen from very far at that. 'Ehm.' 'Sorry.' The window closed, and the boy returned to his deck, among the various others who actually stood and listened instead of being so pulled in by what was going outside. Not that it stopped them from boring into him with piercing eyes of confusion. 'What is it miss Dufranne?' 'Nothing just gets back to your studies, we're already late at that.' Velvet black, and failing at that too, her dress was nothing more than distracting for some of them, just as it matched the long cocked hair and dark glimmering eyes. Some would do nothing more than pretending they were reading, only to sneak a gaze and spoil themselves at that. 'Milford, Jones, get your noses back inside.' 'Sorry, ma'am.' Often you'd get to hear that inside the class, more or less at that, if it wasn't paired with the flying glasses across the room, to see and looked and even point and count at every creaking plank and at the man upstairs. 'Miss Dufranne?' 'Yes?' 'When are we going to get a new class, like the kids from the other schools are?' There was a silence at that, though she couldn't stare in a different direction indifferently and just forget that he'd even had asked a question. It may have worked with younger children, though this wasn't one of those cases, not at all. As it turned out, more of them were aroused by the question, even those of more introverted nature who'd do anything to hide, even when it came to an action which deemed their whole group required. There were almost tears in her eyes, if you weren't to could the dripping water that came from the gaps in-between the planks, which more or less found their way on her face. 'I don't think we'll ever get a new one, the council has decided that there aren't enough funds to be spent to relocate us to a new and more decent place.' There was the scent of death permeating from somewhere outside, though as far away as it could possibly be from the classroom, it made no difference whatsoever. Death flew in the air, as far away as it could be, the bearer of the beetle skin kept searching, now having lost the scent. It was a dark alley, perhaps a few hundred or thousand tiles of the bottom floor that separated and perhaps threw away, though whatever might be the reason, the track was lost. Just as it laid, lost in the shadows and confused, as much as the people who've seen it fly away and search for its target of its own doing. It's been a few hours, to say the least ever since it has happened, the entire incident being sealed off, with the last remains either being charred to ashes to the very ground upon whence once laid the remains. Now, after the incident, and perhaps closer to a few hours behind, people once gathered as they witnessed it all. Some claim at least, or those who were more dull-headed to not forget what they saw. Those who did, on the other hand, were already gathered and sent a while ahead in the small caged standing like prisoners or madmen, dressing just as they were just a while. 'Stop it already. I didn't do anything wrong.' 'Just calm down and let it sink, they'll release us in an hour or two, this ain't the first time I've been here.' At least two of them stood in adjacent cages, three in opposite sides, though at least one or two remained empty, with the addition that most of them were already, by now bathed in rotten fruits. One already had remembered and wondered why, as well as he was at that. 'Why put me to remember this? Ah, if only my memory was at the end of a pint in the morning.' 'Hear, hear.' Said a jolly companion, though, despite not being any reason for it, clearly, he had his share before being caged or becoming the target practice of those fruit throwers. 'If only I stood in my bed in the morning and forgot all about this bothersome day.' 'If only.' Though a big city, old habits remained the same, those who didn't turn their ears or look the other way would end up being shamed. Dinner in the high palaces that would be royal and, to the highest of the mansion who'd tower over the others, all alike from above, seen as if they'd be placed on a platform, as old as one could tell. Districts upon districts, clean and dirty, perhaps laid depending on who'd rule the other, though if seen as perfect, it was far from it. Tall towers, sharp and pointy, piercing the sky with their might weren't as sturdy as they'd appear, now that threat was avast. Already two mansions were sunken to the ground, though slightly upon the trims of outside the borders, where hills roamed freely and apart, it'd still be a threat. After all, one would only have to go apart and keep walking from that point and in the fraction of a second one would get to the town and cut through the edge. Oh, a perilous approach that'd be, for the devastation left, that broke through the land seemed to bring fear and taint everything as far in sight, even to the point of others fearing what would happen.Indeed, what would happen if that tremor, that open gap inside the earth would just stretch out and swallow the entire city like that?"The second one, I tell you this one.There's no doubt that those fools will attack this mansion or this one and it won't stop until they'd have the entire town surrounded and fallen into the deepest depths of the earth where it'd be crushed and stolen."That's madness, can you not hear yourself talk of the entire destruction of what stood out for hundreds of years?Perhaps more at that, by a bunch of imbecilic and petty small people."May I remind you, Marshal, that those petty small people, or whatever you may think it's fit to call them, already managed to sink two mansions?And, if I may, please beg you to remember that those were a lot more than the mansion, for that's not the entire wholesome reason they were taken down, but the fact that they hold hidden inside the heart of our very city?They knew where our heart was and when to strike at it so don't be mistaken when asked why or what they're capable of doing, but utmost all, don't you dare underestimate them, at all!"Laid upon the table, there remained the map of the city, further than it, past it, the key points and more than that, an under level separated by a thick glass, inside of which laid the system represented of the various machines that ran under the city.Even lower there seemed to be more, though it was tainted by something a long time before the meeting and remained so ever since.It was important to be pointed, Marshall Straughter standing at one end of the table, Captain Rick Von Emberberg, and various others standing either on their feet or on the chairs, yet to contribute but stand there and listen.As far as they were concerned, nothing new was said, nothing new was made and no effort whatsoever from their part or side, other than the small notices of their actions.Twice already had they failed to stop their forced, either taken from under their noses or having gotten there way too far to be able to do anything at all.Like toads being boiled alive and unable to notice it until too late.'The city is far too big for us to know where they'd strike.'A sharp nose was more than needed and welcomed to cut through the tension that floated all around them.There had already been enough smoke lifting up to the ceiling from the previous patrons that had previously been there and left just as sudden without a notice.It was more than bizarre that the same brand of cigarettes found its way on both camps, whatever they knew it or not.'Les Chroillex.'Made for the use of others, upon the farthest reach of the city, past, what could almost be called a maze or twist and turns, upon, following and missteps, for even once would lead one to the farthest corner of the opposite corner of the city.The darkest corner, perhaps even the most hidden of them all, if one would compare them with the hideout of those so-called insurgents.Though the black smoke ate through air and cloud, none could ever forget or dismiss the fact of its utmost peculiar nature on how it managed to act as neutral, almost faction-like location while maintaining its untrustworthiness.Smoke rising up towards the heavens but never rising up fast enough nor far enough to make any difference at all.It didn't matter how much any of them wanted or sought to gain dominion over it, as their attempts never even matter, to begin with.Somewhat the smoke retreated back, as the black cloud just came without a notice, only to be taken again, dragged inside without a notice or care and swallow it with the entire might needed by one, hidden in sight.Either taken away or switched inside, it appeared as if, the small emporium either changed placed or was flown away slowly by the dark smoke.Little did the matter concern as it posed no threat to the dominion.Nor did it matter that it posed nothing than a small joint for the rich and the plenty of the famine like people who entered to buy, at least those who found themselves in the vicinity.As for the so-called nobility, they didn't do much, other than find themselves impeached by their own desire for the small objects that held their happiness at the end of a spark.None would approach either, as they dared not leave their high towers, other than sending small little dolls in hopes they'd search and find it, with a bit of more luck that they'd find a way back with the most prideful possession. Harshly, the weather seemed to have gone to the bottom, with a harder wind and strokes of dust that were thrown by the side. And the alleys were just, perhaps even more deeply coveted in the dark smokes, almost aroused by the burning, considered by many yet living. For those above who were plotting, just as well as the ones hiding in shadows, none were aware that the black smoke coming from there was considered to be coming from the belly of a bottomless ravine. Holding inside the ravine they served as a thought of the immortal creature, whispering through the smoke. It is said that the emporium is nothing more than a shrine, perhaps an entry to his realm. 'Damn those rumours, and damn these people.' Said Argus, finally with the delay and as he fought against the wind. Still, in a company of eight of them, to say the least, minus two of three, he managed to pick up on the rumour just merely seconds before he passed inside and listened as well. A few hours, perhaps, at the entry of the gates, standing tall. They were expecting, with the tools to match, none really seem to pay any attention as they went past the main districts, even to the point of passing a high tower and its sharp raspy edges. He had the conversation almost memorised, to the point that filled him with disgust to the most unaware expressions. A few of them stood still, smoking, as it were to be more obvious by the small trails coming from the bottom. 'Bad habit.' Argus thought of it still, though he wouldn't have dared said anything if he were to be heard. 'Right in time, aye?' There laid, a moustached man, on the brink of having his own wired from burnt to ashes, he thought of nothing more than what he saw. Eight of them, dressed as workers, boxes and almost covered in dirt and rust by the sides, quite and odd choice, but I cannot argue with the boss. Thought the man as he continued to keep glaring at the one leader who seemed to be the tallest of the bunch, though only by some skewed centimetres, nothing more, nothing less. 'Ah, quite odd, I take it that.' After a break, the man took a few more smokes inside his lungs, as deeply breathing in, and just as long as it took him to expel everything, rightly outside. 'No wonder why they asked us to wear there, this is too much hazardous to be taken without protection.' With another observation, Argus became more alert, feeling something inside his hand, almost vibration at the scent of the smoke. Could it be the teeth that I feel as such? Is it possible that it reeks and wants to be free of me and alive? The spikes, truly taken from there were something he hadn't seen before, nor used or touched outside. If they were to find out what he had, the only edge would've been lost. 'It's jolly enough for your bunch to be going, so tarry not anymore, it's about to be raining outside, at least I wager, and.' The grim turn as the small cigar became ashen to the bottom of the ground made him sigh. A bad sign, altogether, a bad sign to be had. 'And a terrible night too at that, you seem quite new and silent, though I don't mind the silence that much, at least, not in a long while since the mood was made.' With enough hardest and distractions for me to make my escape. 'Just be careful, as you'd end up being just like the unlucky few that never found a way out.' The man let out some giggles as he said it, without a wonder why it was that they spread, apart from one another, as soon as they entered. In Argus' defence, it happened a lot faster than he'd expected, just as soon as they entered, a smoke balloon popped out and as soon as they saw that, like ants, they've spread, apart from another. There used to be a signal sometime before that would be given, or a warning about just how unstable this place was, though none of that remained here. 'Only my protection, though at least, I'm safe.' Just around the corner, he managed to see an image out of his memory yet again, perhaps just as strongly as he had first seen the other ones, though not as peculiar in nature as one would think. 'It's harsh.' 'Let go.' 'Stop dragging me by the hand.' 'Smoke became so thick and slowly in colour that it became a sudden mist of vapour that reacted a lot different there than he expected. Stuck in a corner he peered and looked just how much they seemed to enjoy watching him drag her across the street when he was younger. 'Is this when we split up? And the two of them too?' They still resembled or had the small hints of the madmen he had previously encountered, as no one could deny that, even if they wanted too, though these ones were different, and a lot more than that. Too peculiar to be simply ignored, that couldn't just be a coincidence either. A small hint approached in his mind, just why was it that it happened now? Why was his memory being brought back to life in this time and place, unasked for and certainly misguided for he never desired such a fate, to begin with? 'Why, why?' Though none of them answers, he could approach and touch them, even push his own body to the ground, though another blink and he was there. 'As if punch myself wasn't necessary. How far does it go?' Though his voice never left the suit, he ignored them as they teased one another and right around the corner noticed the enforcer of law just on his way to catch him. That day rang just in his mind as well as it did now and despite the fact he couldn't change it, there was still something more important that was to it. Going round another street, taking two left and a right, passing by two other enforcers and without noticing, his arm just went to them, pushing each other in different directions without a care. 'No consequences.' Argus said, and at the same time, he wondered at it, just why was it then, that there were no consequences to be had, but still. 'I can hear you whisper.' He said the dark sound could be just as venomous as his act were, and for a purpose that wasn't known to him. It was deep there, though it had to wait, just a few block, and the sound of popping could be heard. The fresh breath of air was soothing, though repulsing at the same time as soon followed the smoke. It wasn't much of a surprise that his suit was falling apart, though not from behind, the armpits popped out, followed by the full extension of the hand that slipped. The visor and helmet like were dragged by the wind and his entire body seemed to have been blasted by the joints. Argus looked below and saw the suit fall apart, and he resumed going, though there was no need to take the tool box either, as other people from the town might think it still peculiar, he opened it first and kept the sharp shards. 'I'll need you. My voice!' There was a surprise as well as wonder at his own voice, that he felt it like that and then. 'How could it be?' He touched his lips as well as heard himself speak softly, as he went on. 'Just enough, a few more steps to be taken. There.' A little roughened up as the suit was taken apart, though not enough to slow him down nor his approach. The door remained a little more grim, though, after this journey, he finally found it. A rain started, as expected, though it ended just right in the area near the door. Coming in front of it, there was the desperate need to knock, despite knowing he could just enter it without a care. 'Here goes, nothing!' There was a strong gust of the wind that almost ripped both him and the door by the side. Argus immediately covered his eyes to protect himself from the strong dust that was thrust against his eyes, only to feel it happen all over again. The pain, the power and the striking wind that hailed him in pain, for he wasn't sure what to expect. Though dust turned into rocks, the wind became smoke again, though it didn't feel remotely the same, not in a bit, rather, it felt like knives being thrown and thrust against his skin, penetrating his surrounding. He opened his eyes, being taken back by the sight of it, standing there in its infinity of skin, crawling with the many impaled head and spoke once again as the dust and rock settled. 'My prison.' Said the many voices, yet all seemed to have the same strength now as they spoke. They were changed just as well, covered in a strong carapace now, appearing as if to be more than real, more than a vision that forced itself in his head. It seemed to be real, more than he could say about anything he had seen before. Down to a knee whilst he tried resisting didn't do anything to the pain that he felt. Pain, real pain that forced itself on his knees and joints, throughout the body, soon to overcompensate in his mind. Knowing that impending pain was about to come, hearing the voices speak, closer and closer to his mind approaching, sharper and harsher to his ears, his hand shifted towards the belt. A tooth was taken, though only one, exactly at the point of extraction, the voices started receiving, as fast as they come. Something was recognised, though neither him knew nor what they thought. Receiving strength couldn't stop him now, nor here nor there, though he couldn't throw it there, he tried. It snapped as it fell to the ground, merely inches in front of him, though its impact was colossal. Enough force came to produce an explosion of fire that ate its smoke as soon as it came into him. If in a second Argus's vision was covered, if his lungs were immediately filled with black smoke and shrapnel, it was immediately taken back, even sealing on its return whatever wounds were made. 'Throt, throt, throt and a pop.' Those sounds came from the bottom, as the crack made an explosion, which was taken back, another level and another way underground. Ferdinand needn't move a second further, for the small piece of hard stone that laid under him was coming to an end, cracking just rightly under. Before smoke could come, his knees got strength, he resisted and thought as well as he could, if he were to be reached, he'd be taken back as a slave or worse. No was laid forth so he took behind, having only a small glance at what was coming from above. The sky was pale and endless, and it seemed as if it forced itself in this world, only to catch him now, at this very present moment. 'The cage, I know where your cage is!' Said Argus, now, awakened, confident in his knees and his strength, seemingly taunting without any thought on the confidence. I still have two, only if they last. With that in mind, his steps were calculated, though it seemed to have a strong effect, perhaps too good to be taken back and forth for what he initially wanted to use them for, he would've failed anyway. Not to mention what it would happen from this point on, only a misstep and he'd end up blowing himself up to smithereens, or worse. Light blew out as he approached, though they weren't torches, they seemed to be detecting his movement more than well. The walls were black, striped with green, rotting and rusting, though they weren't made out of the skin. Behind, everything was becoming a unit, which he only realised now, after another glance to know his surrounding, light being present only and merely some steps forth, before disappearing once again. The ground became white, though the material was now dirtier after the contact with his feet. Wet and dirty, slippery too, at that, not a single bar where he'd try to grab a hold off to prevent himself from falling down. Yet, that wasn't enough to stop him, not even after his attempts. It was coming from behind. 'You're on my track, I can hear your whispers just as well. Your cage is near, I can feel that too!' Again, taunting him, there laid another fear, though over left and right, taken apart, a crossroads, which took him no second to make a choice, the thought of the others being just rightly above seemed to be a lot worse than he thought. Their mission was to blow that mansion up, he was to escape. Though behind of him followed a bickering devil, one that left him no break. Not even clean air, nor any chance to explore, the handle dirty and a door seemed to be closed, as he attempted to pull, over and over, a light seemed to be slowly coming lit. It was a sign, though barely coming up to full motion, it said. It actually read. 'Retreat!' Could this be an escape? Thus was the sound of the coming of age incoming, as sharp as ever, almost like talons, shaping the walls, Argus would hear the sound as well as he could. In his mind, occupying the blank spaces in the dark, he'd see them grasp and hold, long and point, eyes by the side, sharp with nobody to belong to, forcing themselves into it, rubbing the wall. And in the end, leaving falling bricks that shattered, a bleeding wall that must've been made out of skin behind, though it didn't matter

now.'Light.'He saw, almost blinding, it was the same one from above and by the sides, reflected against the talons, his eyes being so forcefully focused on the talon, that had more than half of the room encompassed in its full extent that he forgot himself for a moment.After a recovery, he fell on his back or at least forced himself to trip on his back.It came fast and cut through brick and blood, the door in halves, the sign was broken, the circuits coming apart.Not turned yet, it kept going but Argus didn't wait, he went on ahead now, turning as fast as he could, knowing that there was another way in the crossroad, waiting for him.Hand tried coming, feet resting through the cracks, eyes were bleeding and crying, just as tall as they could be.The light coming was now broken on the side that laid cut, only two remained above and to his left.'It had wings, that must've been it.'Wings and eyes, it could fly and see him, even listen, though the agony and their bleeding couldn't and wouldn't easily stop, not for him, nor for anyone else at that.A terror roaming through the depths until suddenly a shriek of pain and anger came and roared through the entire lane.Small bubbles of skin were boiling just to his right, ready to pop, with a block and track, a throttle, Argus heard it come from miles away.So he dodged the long ranged small burst of liquid that came and perforated through the case and melted light by his side.And they were getting worse, the shrieking having been revealed, it was time to turn, and the echo of its pirouette could come as no surprise.'This place is falling apart!'With a yelling that gave out his location, he went, grabbing the hard bricked wall that stood, cracked as it were, touched by the flying creature, turned around, only to see a glimpse of the glowing, winged, sharp like talons that came for it.It couldn't be helped, that he remained out of breath throughout the whole sprint, barely as the water was drained from above, lights kept coming and it seemed as if this was the dead end.Rightly, and justly behind laid the terror, with its dark sounds still being made, to point out that it was still coming for him.The dead end was near and Argus knew very well that there wasn't a chance to return.'What now?'Though as he asked, looking around, striking at the wall until it left a scarred, bloody pulp of an end, he finally heard.The sharp needles that pointed at the wall and cut through them, the agony that was to come, the pain he'd feel before he'd die.And after he was done pointlessly striking at the wall, in pain, he lifted his gaze and saw the trap door, giant and sturdy, tall and strong, heavy but pointed at the side.'Freedom!'Argus yelled, feeling a sharp heat on his sides, forcing himself to not feel anything anymore, at the point where he leapt and tried grabbing, holding still, at last.It couldn't be easily pulled.Something must be there, but what?He could feel no ground on him, holding himself, barely above the ground, on the lever and then, looking behind, hearing and feeling once again throughout the dark, he saw it approach.Two feet came and forced themselves against the wall, to push, to pull, to make him bounce.A silhouette was being made, and a light seemed to be coming from above.It was no trap door, but it seemed to resemble more like a giant gate than anything else, opening slowly, but perhaps in time.Bounced against the upper side of the wall, he added more weight, pulled more, grabbed by the bricks on the side while trying his best to survive, just long enough.There was rust but it started falling, dirt became mud and in a sudden split of a second, just as the light seemed to die off from the small devices that laid around, another one replaced them.Reflection died off from the talons as the iron door fell though it left Argus enough room, barely to move behind it, he felt the track.Another throttle against the shield, as if that thing charged at the stroke at him, bouncing back.Taken out of breath, he couldn't take the time to celebrate as he held and could barely take his lungs back.The water stream was strong enough to be called a waterfall, taking a wager on his clothes and arms.Argus still half the gate still, feeling the power, being splashed by the sides, if everything seemed to be flooding, under him, another glanced revealed the water rising to his feet. Though no sound of agony, no whisper and definitely nothing else, the water came to a stop and finally he turned around. Nothing on the side, both left and right being inspected as he thought it was safe to go. Whilst keeping track on the sudden motion, he passed through the shivering space between harsh rock and metal, rightly so. Above of him, he saw the dome, and most importantly that. 'I'm on the ocean's floor!' His excitement was ten times harder brought and received, though the flapping of wings turned into splashes, slow but it'd come. He grabbed the metal wheel that stood in the middle and lifted himself, up to the edge and in the room. 'I need.' He looked around, still minding himself, rather finish, it was a room, plain and large, ending with a roof of glass, many maps and globes, tables, all too heavy to be lifted. 'The cabinet!' Another shout came, though there seemed to be people coming and going, he grabbed his mouth with both hands. There was light being moved around, rightly around and past the door. Though there was no time for him to be shocked, none, if any at all, left, as a matter of fact, he rushed and grabbed the cabinet, feeling it by the sides, around of it. Large enough to stuff the door, at least in hopes that it would block for enough time for him to make an escape, he pulled until it broke off the table it was nailed on. The various bottles fell, both on the table and on the floor, everywhere around, though only one of them got cracked and spilt across. Argus didn't mind it, other than going about and pushing forth, before it was too late, he threw it, falling roughly one sided but blocking the access anyway. Now he waited, with a hand on his waist, looking on his left side, with a sharp eye by the door, gazing still as he tried seeing if someone noticed what he had done. And, with a return to see if the beast would fly again, wondering if it was a spawn of the bigger one he had previously encountered before, he stopped. 'Come on, come on, come on.' Was being said, though in a whisper still, looking forth and pondering next. One second past and the sound of splashes came to a stop, though the rum never stopped dripping to the bottom and through the opened cabinet. There were the dry moments, as it seemed that all the rum had run out. And so was the table, just standing there, across the entire room, on a huge piled map, perhaps resembling the one he had seen while dwelling with those people, though judging by its size, it encompassed everything the small one had. Even more than that, the noises coming from outside stopped, he didn't notice. A perfect opportunity, as he kept sweating like a pig, that, if it wasn't the water alone the cause of that. 'Where did it come from?' So long as it saved his life, did it matter? This might and could've mightily been a pocket or a giant bottled water from what he thought, that it didn't as much matter at all, as a matter of fact, what was more important was to make sure it wasn't about to come. Before sidestepping to reach the table, the cabinet bounced before being ripped in half, as the beast threw itself through it, flying as a disk. It was fast, though Argus managed to avoid, a few inches more and there would've been more than a brow cut. 'Stop!' He yelled, though it was heading fast, and seeing how it cut through wood and stone, it would've had no problem cutting through the glass, especially with the speed. Instinctively, his hand went into his pants and he grabbed the second sharp tooth, throwing it like a spear directly aimed at that, though the change was shimmering, almost as much as the air. A warmth stood there, in-between, the wood slowly fading and falling down. Splashes of water and the last moments before either the tooth, thrown sharply as a spear or those sharp talons cut through the glass ceiling. Either way, the burst came quick, followed by a glimpse of smoke, both have reached, at the same time the ceiling as he looked at them reach the point. A blast was more than enough to reduce that to smithereens, along with half of the ceiling and the shards of water that seemed to be falling, slowly, near him. 'Water?' He asked, though his breath became suddenly colder, the shards that he believed to be glass were actually of water. 'But how?' Before he could touch, the wind from under his nose was being pulled right back, along with what seemed to be a pair of black spines and some black blood that now roamed freely in the water. 'Damn it! I wasted another one of them.' And now only two remained, from the looks of it, they'd be more than needed. They heard that. Came a sudden realisation, though the way back seemed to be the first place they'd look, not mention that it was not blocked by wood shrapnel remained of the cabinet, and a trail leading to it. The mantle, Argus noted and thought of as he came under it and lifted it from the table. It was just enough space for him to crawl and hide, and just in time, he entered. Tight, but it would hold, thick enough for his feet and body not to be seen, or noted at all. A burst came again, though it was only made of sounds, clear speech, voices, he noted. It was way too long since he has heard someone speak softly and normal, far from what one would sound like in the town, and in the under depths filled with those mutations. These must be real, or sound like that, matching even accent and sudden shifts in them. 'What happened here?' Asked the first one, soon followed by another voice, heavier, harder, sharper than the other. 'There, it must've come from below and escaped back there.' At least a few steps were made, to say the least, though the sound left nothing more or less to be held accountable for what they were like. Other than heavy boots, the only thing he could see, other than some glances over long shadow, iron or some harsh material, to say the least on that. 'Why?' Call the Kalhan, quickly. 'There was something that didn't sound right, not in the least with that name, nor with anything he had previously said at that. There was no way out, only a set of boots left it, as the other remained, barely standing by the door. Not even an inch did he stay closer to the only way they seemed to think there was the escapee's route. Did they realise that I'm here? Suddenly asked Argus, seeing how both of them must've seen already that the way behind was blocked, chances were they've figured out immediately or close to it that somewhere in the room I'm hiding. Damn them both and that Kalhan. Space was hard to go through, but the chances of the table falling and crushing him were low, almost as much as them finding him. No immediate danger, though they all seemed to be approaching. First crawling steps and came the creaking sound of the floor, as it was being pushed by him at the moment. Hard did it become to swallow, as he couldn't help it anymore, he wanted, desperately, looking at the feet to see any sign of movement, though they were pointed at him. This is it, no path to escape, I need only a clear shot as it. With a hand standing by him and another shot of saliva by his throat, he came closer to the rim and the edge, looking for any sign of his upcoming demise. Still no movement. Did he find me then? Will I take another life? Even now, against the floor, beautifully crafted without a doubt, he could hear his heart beat. His own heartbeat was going down slowly a drain. The stream was almost as clear as the one going down, full of rum, upon which his reflection still could be seen. It was then that he realised, that, now there really was no chance. One hand pushed forward and at the same time, the other tried slipping by the teeth, few having remained there, though one more. Just like that, he came out, blood rushing through what could only be called paranoia combined with another burst of emotion. Adrenaline rushed through, making him feel afraid, then followed another stream of confusion. What Argus then saw, was an angry stream of strings attached in an empty place above empty boots. 'What is the meaning of this? Could they be, invisible?!' There came a laughter from Argus that settled him down, almost as if the storm had faded away, letting him be still like that. At the same time, he was afraid, confused, ill and still a bit calmer than before, to the point where he had thought of doing something a lot worse with those teeth. Though little sense did it make, as the reason for the abandonment of those boots was hard to ponder upon. 'Where to now?' Glimpsing at it, the door cracked open as seemingly a lady girl wearing an umbrella came, glancing around almost as if she hadn't seen the wet man who had his sweat run over his well-cut brown forehead. She looked around trying to notice anything out of the ordinary though of late, little of that was seen or believed to be on the matter. 'What's that? May I enter? Do you mind if I may come in for a little while, for you see, I'm desperately trying to escape and hide from my parents? And this mess I believe is the last place they'd think of looking.' Surely, it couldn't be that she'd be trusting him so, could it? 'Enter my abode and stay as much as you want.' His lungs couldn't matter even more than he ever wanted, though nonetheless, he thought of it necessary as well, too, both introduce himself and act as natural as he could. Despite being an intruder, she knew nothing of it, as well as the fact that he wasn't trying to defend his intention. Which was and remained. 'My fair lady, I'm called Ar. Ferdinand.' The door knocked itself back to the place. 'Ar Ferdinand, a peculiar name, are you one of the odd ones living in the quarters?' 'I guess you could say this, but why?' 'Why am I asking such a thing? Well, my parents told me to. Well, you see, I'm not entirely sure how I could say this without bothering or mightily offending you. But they told me I shouldn't talk to commoners.' Said the young lady almost sniffing at the rum marks on the floor. Already she was inspecting and watching it well enough from the distance that she coughed from the dust. An empty hole, that seemingly seemed to be blocked, even after the flying disk came out of it. Or so they said. 'Was there a fight here?' 'Could you speak any slower and get to the point already?' There was little movement, even in Argus, that he thought of and already he had seen how well she acted towards both of one another. She had a sense of something, bobbing her head from left to right, investigating there. Perhaps it was just a hunch, but there was a slight chance that she'd be able to sniff him out. I might as well try to figure out something out of her as well if my turn's about to come. 'So.' Argus said, thought barely approaching, or even making any move. There seemed to rag on her too, though on another glance, it turned out that it was a royal silken, almost robe, almost a dress, something in-between, though dark like an opal, almost as blue. A drop of moonlight perhaps, as they were still under what seemed to be an ocean of it. 'Look!' Argus pointed, and she did as she was pointed towards. What laid above was a black tail floating in the distance, as fast as it could be nibbled upon by the creatures of the sea. Her umbrella seemed to be fully functional and atop of that, everything she had seemed to be turning down a frown. Something was wrong, and both of them could feel and share in their moment together. 'What is that in the distance? This never happened before, ever. Have we done something wrong and angered the ones living above?' 'Sure kid. Sure.' The last thing that seemed to be coming out of his mouth was monotone, almost the point of being taken from inside his lungs and played with. Still, he looked around more, trying to find something to take, a way out perhaps, other than the door. It saddened her, but this wasn't his problem, none of them was, as a matter of fact, the only problem he had now remained. 'Them.' 'What was that? You need a way out don't you? Are you hiding as well as I am? Could it be because of your clothes? OH, I know, you're the escapee that came out from down there, aren't you?' It was a moment later that he noticed the fact that she was circling around him without a notice. 'When did you?' 'Now, just about now. Or are you talking about when I found out that you're not from here? Well, that was the first time I laid eyes on you.' 'And you've said nothing kid.' 'Anne.' 'Right, Anne, you won't turn me in, will you?' Suddenly without a notice, her umbrella closed on itself as she smiled away and glimpsed at that with a wink. For a little lady, she seemed to know more than she let out. 'You may want to turn around then if you are so willingly to make for an escape. I was thinking of doing it myself before discovering that you were left here."Did you also see the two of them get out before coming in?"How else do you think I would've come inside if it weren't for my simple observations then?"I think we've been talking for far too long and I've got to go."Not so fast mister."There was the extra way out, that if it even were true, to begin with, though this came out as a problem, as she was still here, watching him careful and glancing about.If something was to come about and someone came inside, seeing both of them there, trouble would be more than pleasantly acquired with or without his concern and desire.'So, I presume this is the moment you're about to tell me that you're coming with me."Uh-huh.'Argus had already jumped on the table, almost in a particularly peculiar manner, even for someone of his stature.Though the other way out was to go round the table and he was severely pressured by time.'Now, am I to go out and called those two other men that I believe aren't acquainted with you or can I come?"I don't even know you kid.'Though already she had abandoned her umbrella near the wall, just hanging and started climbing the edge of the table.It seemed as if she was going to come with or without, and such.'You'd slow me down.'Continued Argus, trying to soothe her before pushing her away, though it seemed that it'd be a complicated device, even as that, it definitely looked like a way out.Two mouths closed, appearing to be able to be opened only from a close approach, as, from the distance, it appeared only like a statue, tall with two hands and a mouth.'Does it lead directly ahead?"Guess again.'Argus stopped in time to stand near her, side by side as they both inspected the heads.From where they stood, somewhere on the top of a wide foreign land or a wasteland, they both seemed to be the same height, or at least so it seemed from his point of view.'Aren't you too young to be running away with strangers?"You don't even know how old I am.Or where I'm from, or even where we're going."Enough, I got it, none of my business."Good.'There was a slight bicker, though he went ahead and asked anyway.'How do you open it then?"Unfortunately.'Paused as to breathe down, ducked under and grabbing by the edge, she started trying to lift it.Clearly, there was a struggle which at this point he ignored for some reason.Another hand shifted by his side, his gaze being twisted as he looked behind of his shoulder, over the table and right around the placed down umbrella.The door knob twisted and someone was to come inside.'Wait.'The girl said as she recognised Ferdinand for someone who was about to do something most peculiar.'What?"It's my sister.'By now, it would've been a matter of muscle memory, as he'd only have to go into the motion and attack, the target being hit or not wasn't much of his concern.Though he was stopped in time, she entered alas, looking exactly like her, both in appearance and mannerism.Those small hands, almost like crawling spiders shifted ahead and closed the door, locking it with a key.'Where did she get that from?"Vivian!"Yelled one, only to be called back by the name.They even seemed to sound the same at a first hearing break, though her sister hadn't made a move as of yet, she was still waiting for Argus to stay near without return.Perhaps she knew then, both of them that there wouldn't have been another chance to meet if he was left alone.And now.'She's coming too with us."What?I haven't even agreed that you're coming with me."You're either letting us come down the old passage or we'll call.We'll call on the high council to come down on you."Oh, I'm sure you would, little twerp as if I'd be afraid of you and your silly antiques. Go away and take your sister with you before I knock both your heads in and leave you both bleeding.'There was a serious evil look in his eyes, twisted and cut by one side, skin overlapping by the edges too, in a curious attempt to frighten her.Certainly, it didn't work.'You either take us with you.Or you'll have only but enough time to catch one of us before the other escapes and calls the council.And I doubt you'd make a move."You can't just blackmail me like that you small crab,

I'd get both off. Agh. 'It seemed that enough time was being wasted, and an eeriness still came from the whole in the ground, as it was being seen by the crawling skin on her sister. If they so certainly want to come, let them.' 'Go on inside then, both of you. But you'll listen to me when I tell you, what I tell you, and whenever I tell you to go. Understood?' After the other side, there'd be no way for you to call to your parents or anyone else and I. I do not want to take care of some home lost children. "Yes, father, we understood. Right, Vivian?" She nodded as the path ahead of her was being made, even for someone of her size and appearance, her sister seemed to be the bigger spawn of something eerier than the damp hole from which the horror came. Down the hatch, they were ready to go without any real knowledge of where it went to or just how further below they'd get. You'll both listen to me now while we're going on the way to the bottom. So did Argus think of the scenario at hand, at least of what was about to be said? Though lifting the mouth, to the point of it being pulled back, it was indeed revealed that there was a mechanism inside, a machination of some kind. Chains lifted by the side as the rest subsided and finally he could go back. The twin sister had already made her way and stood by the side, as they could all hear the knob being turned about another time. 'Company, were you expecting anyone?' Asked Argus, with a strange voice and a strange peculiar manner he had. It was clear now that someone had to have called upon them. And it wasn't them, at least he didn't think as such. 'You haven't been followed, have you?' There was a silence from Vivian, though Argus knew too well that they were those guards that went on and left the room to alert the other, though it no way could they return as fast as this. And in no other way was her silence comforting to him. 'Damn it girl. "Wait, perhaps this can work in our favour, if we manage to escape." And how do you suppose we close the mouth after we jump in? They'll follow as soon as they can.' 'I know how.' Said Vivian, with something that could closely resemble her sister's voice, yet as farther away from her as it could be. 'What exactly do you propose we do? Hide?' 'No, but we can grab that.' Her hand pointed and just in time as the ones beyond the door were about to begin their assault at the gate, to the point of striking it down. It was more than serious now, two fugitives and him, the stranger. It was worth the shot. 'You first, then your sister.' 'Won't it close before me and my sister get there?' It was Anne the second time, or her sister since she abandoned her umbrella and both seemed to look alike, and be silent at the time being it didn't matter. 'You're both thin enough to not close it if it works, but just in case.' By the side he looked below, though it seemed to be a long way down, that would lead down a sturdy and hard path, it seemed as if there was enough space to slow down. 'Put your legs against the wall in front of you, it seems that the chains are. Wait a minute.' Grabbing a hold of the chains, though it was dangerous if the mouth were to close and cut down his hand, he looks in awe at just how easily he could pull on them. 'Help me, and do it quickly.' Both of the sisters grabbed by the chain and started pulling through, trying their best to lift it to their best of abilities. It was clear that something was on its way, as hard as it could be, coming from below. Perhaps an elevator of some kind, though it turned out not to be that. It was a small cage that had its side attached to a device that, in its turn, was attached to the chain. A key laid inside, though the reason for it was unknown. Now again, it turned out, judging by that it seemed to be, a long distance and some sharpness that would've made it a bad idea to take it down. 'Take the key, what are you waiting for?' It turns out the cage is too small for my big hands, unfortunately, said. 'Let me.' One grabbed and held it turned, whilst the other just shimmered her hand through, almost like a small snake going for its prey. It was quite nimble, for a child, at least of the sort, and it turned out that the key was held there by a set of strings, almost invisible to the eye. The light reflected itself on them as it continued.'There.'She took it out, though it the cage fell.'Come back.'Grabbing both of them, Argus managed to get them before it turned out they way he thought it would, the mouth's gate close and fell down, almost cutting through the air as the iron fell below.Luckily both of them stood close to one another and their waists were thin.Though the sound of the door being turned, almost on the outside remained unnerving.'What's the key for?Come on, come on, come on.'There wasn't any time for thanks, though they acknowledged, though the other mouth was still there, and there had to be some separation, else he would've seen it from inside the mouth.'Open the other mouth, fast I say!'It turned out that the second mouth, the one on Argus' left was a lot heavier than the other, at the point of visible effort being made at it.'Damn it.Let me just push through.'It didn't seem to bulge at first as he tried lifting it up, though this was different than the other, in a lot than one sense.Where lifting it up seemed to fail, pushing through hadn't, it just took a lot longer and a generally lot more effort than thought, as it became more of an effort to return those that tried breaking in.'Faster Ferdinand, faster, they're about to break in too.'I'm doing my best.'Came in the piece as most of what he had was placed as an effort to push through the gate.It was hard, almost too as such but he was doing the best he could, at least so he thought he did, even though it wasn't showing on the outside.Something heavy laid on the other side, that was clear.At least heavy enough for a man alone, though Argus wasn't alone in this.All three of them pushed together, neck in neck and side by side.It gave in with a slight sound as the metal was pushed by, inside of it being revealed a way down, next to a staircase and a see through door.'The key put it in fast.'As close as they were, it shook and almost fell off her hand, at the point of managing to land on the ground, almost on it before continuing further.'You're asking for it.'Moments passed before she picked it up, one of the at least, afraid as they were, just as much as he was, perhaps even more of being caught, they started forcing through the glass, only to miss the keyhole by a few inches.'Let me.'Without a delay, this time it was his turn to attempt, and done.On the first try, he managed to stick the key right through and open it, as fast as he could and just as well as any other would've done in his place.'Let's go.'It wasn't as thin as a thought though behind the metal gated mouth closed, just in time for Argus to take another look past his sight as see that there was none beyond.They'd get to enter and find none, especially since he made sure not to leave any mark or any clue behind.'Is it safe to go through?'I thought you knew that.Vivian.'There was a change of looks between the tree of them as they stood still and waited.Now there was just enough time, as they locked the glass door behind and looked below.'We're in a tower."A tower?Here, underwater?"Yes, Vivian is actually right about it.'As she said it, a few steps below, down to what seemed to be a long way to get to an endless bottom, with windows, first being revealed to be depths.Depths that weren't flooded, even further below than the sea, than the city and perhaps, going even lower.'Where exactly do you suppose you'd be going, girl?And it seems already that you took your site with you, not to mention that, most likely you asked her to steal those keys.'As they went on, speaking as well as walking towards the bottom, he didn't seem to expect anything else from them, not to return, perhaps an explanation, though least and beyond an objection.He didn't want them back, though it was obvious.'I don't know what drove me, us, here, to this room and to the mouth, especially since they're spread all across the city, but none of the others seemed to be openable."City?More of them?A city underwater, why?"That's not water.'Said the girl with a grim, as seemingly like a feather floated against the steps.Perhaps a trick of the eye, or not.'Perhaps a lie, at that too.By the way mister, our sister's waiting for us down there."Another one?Is she?"No, don't worry about it, she's older than us.'Though the tower seemed to be decimated, it was only to what seemed to be a quarter through it that the aspect of a tower kicked in. Or better said, its long neck had its bricks many and spread across, thin and strong, other heavy and some in-between. Things were written and the lights of the torches, just beyond Argus' reach made it clear that someone was there before them. 'Did she take this one?' 'No.' 'Are you going to place the key in the device once we get to the bottom?' 'Perhaps.' There was an echo now, and a slight hint of just how much more of the way down there was, though Argus didn't question nor wonder why. 'Why is your sister silent? And don't tell me your older one will talk as much as you do.' Before turning, as the towers seemed to have been created just for the purpose of being used a facade for the stairs, he saw a blush. 'She acts that way near other people, mother says she's just a little bit peculiar, though just at times. And please don't be rude once you meet her, she gets annoyed quite quickly, for no reason, I dare say.' 'Very well, we shall go get there as fast as we can.' 'No doubt there.' Though it seemed as if, the more they went towards the bottom, the worse it appeared to be, darker, more shallow, even the stone had a pale green, dark aspect now. No bricks but stone, almost as if it was now part of something bigger, unnatural, cave-like. 'Do you come here often?' 'Just venturing to the depths with my sisters, why?' 'Isn't it dangerous to wander about?' 'Only if you're a security-cat, and I doubt you're one of those, at least not by the way you look like.' 'Has something strange ever appeared in the dark whilst searching through?' Please, it's important for me to go before we reach the bottom. 'Sir, there's a long way to the top and.' Anne paused for a moment, rubbing her under the chin and staring through the glow that found its way through the cracks. White and pale, the light out of the moon, though there was no way for it to travel by then, nor any reason for him to believe it was night yet. Could it though? Wondered Argus, after all, time passed, so much has happened, hunger and thirst seemed to come then to disappear with or without his concern. Even now, he just felt it, ravaging his belly, even to the point where they both heard it so. 'Here. We still have a long way to go and, well. It's better if you eat now, since we may need your muscle for later.' A small pack that was hidden from somewhere below her waist, opened to reveal some bread, well pocketed, honey, butter, some sandwiches and a pouch of water. It wasn't much of it inside, per speak of certain provisions, yet they weren't entirely refused either. Argus was heavy after a hard day and already he was feeling numbed and dizzy. 'Trust me, this happens quite often, it's the altitude.' Indeed, perhaps it was, as neither did he know where they were or what they were doing there, and already they've gone past the edge of the broken solid stone. It took enough for a step to be missed and a death fall would come into motion. Indeed it was, the pointer of the world and they were at it, several other towers could be seen from the opening though nothing more, nothing less and certainly no ground. They were high. 'Whoa there bud, you must've been starved if you're acting this way.' Argus hadn't noticed, perhaps for the better, though the two girls caught him just in time and held him so he'd not fall to his death. The cracks were just far and sharp enough to rip him to pieces, the echo being the last thing to be heard as he'd have fallen. 'Any longer?' 'Just stay with us, we'll get there in no time, just keep going.' He was being handled and held like an old man, though with no cane with him, as he wanted and needed to go on. It wasn't entirely what he planned or what he wanted, though, then again, nothing was. 'Simple!' It was so much more simple, or so he deemed to be, the memories appearing to be so much better than they had previously been. Shame, though, even to him, an old hound, even they were pups at some times. 'Have you even changed? If not, why did you even decide to come back? It's not for our mother, it's not for me, so why did you decide to return? Revenge, is that it?' The barrage of deprivation came as quickly as he could remember, even when he knew he deserved it. There wasn't any grudge held against his brother, only to the man who had his talons over him. 'I came for him.' From his memory, they stood somewhere outside, not a single dark sky, no rain, nothing but plain dark and starry on the outside. Not an open house in sight, nothing else that would proclaim the same, yet he could remember the most important aspect of the memory, his brother. What he looked like, older, much like he once was, almost at the point where he saw himself as a mere reflection of what he could've become. 'I see that you've become a well-fed brother. Has he kept you like this ever since the plot to send me to the penitentiary? I've had nothing more to eat than the insects we'd catch between the flying chunks of rocks, perhaps worse, and if it weren't for. Ehm. My insight, and to your lack of luck, I would've been dead.' 'So you came indeed to tell me of your endangered adventure?' 'No, as I have previously said, I want to talk to yours. Your master, that, if the professor is home, though it isn't entirely unpleasant that we found ourselves sitting in front of one another. Don't bother, by the way, I know where to go and, even better, where he lives.' He wore a jacket, dark, with at least something hid by the side and underneath, a dagger as sharp as one could snatch, perhaps something even grimmer and darkened. At least his hearing seemed to ring with a sharpness of bullets, of which he wore on either side of his ears, which made a layman who managed to find his eyes falling upon him think of a soldier, rather than. An inmate. 'Were you ever sent there though? From what I've heard, you've avoided and even escaped that.' 'It's none of your business, for I have not forgotten that it was because of the two of you that this has happened. Because of both of you, I've become this.' 'You were always scum.' Said Argus brother, and for the first time since they've ever spoken to each other, there was a threatening spark inside of him. Something that looked as the promise, the promise of pain, of anger, of hatred. That's it, the thing that laid in him, and was more prominent in the older brother, hatred. It bore through both of them now, jumping from one another, even at their end of the tails of their eyes, little dark people were jumping in the shadows. Some standing and watching, other grabbing hold of small dark daggers and needles. For a second, his brother seemed curious, though, at the first sight, he realised that those little daggers that they held in their hands resembled the one he was trying to hid. It was clear that he could see them as well as him, perhaps being more than a coincidence that both of their heads turned around at the exact same time, to take a look around. 'Wait, brother.' 'He's not home if that's what you're asking, and it will be the last thing you'll even do if you dare break through the house. We've set plenty of alarms all around and don't you dare that I will hold myself a second from going directly from the lord Pro...' 'No!' As the almost shout like screech came, he managed to grab a hold of his hand and hold it as hard as he could. The muscles were visibly being jerked hit his face, as much and as closely as were his bones all around his body. One of the last things he'd ever remember or at least both of them did be the punch he threw in his brother's face. It was quick and fastened, almost like a horseman riding a horse and throwing a punch against a bystander during a horse race for no reason whatsoever. Yet he had a reason to his brother and drag him by the side. Whilst checking his pulse, he made sure he wasn't going to be seen, though, again, he wasn't dead, could be barely called alive, to begin with, though breathing nonetheless. The memory was clear after that, the bushes near the sidewalk, over the small fence between homes, the way he ran away, striking the ground whilst making his way towards where he knew the house to be. And then breaking in and stealing the research. There might've been a system of alarms being set, though he entered by the corner and broke through a window. The pain could still be felt upon reminding himself as he touched the window, breaking it thoroughly, grabbing the edges they had before catching his hands still and cutting bits of skin. It was painful but worth it, as there wasn't much he had seen, though, in his attempt, he ended up entering the professor's study room, especially where his research were. 'Here, almost there.' The girl's voice almost came as a key to breaking off the spell, the trance he was in, almost having it realised that he wasn't walking with them for a while. He came out of his lucid dream nonetheless and woke up to the gleaming darkness, the door waiting for a key. It seemed as if it was ready for a blast, though the same out, clearly wouldn't work. 'Knock three times Vivian, like I told you.' She walked and squeezed herself against Argus who hadn't even realised that she was there, to begin with, only to reveal the pale light in her eyes. Still, she avoided looking in through his eyes, almost, at any point leaving room for her hiding of a blush. It wasn't clear what she wanted or needed to be, which Argus promptly ignored and checked again. Two teeth laying by his belt, hidden well before, not suit and armour, though still, he either needed to find a cage or get out. 'Ehm, as you said sister.' She came out, almost in a singing voice as she proceeded to say. 'Knock, knock, open up. Knock, knock open.' Almost returning, to see if anyone was looking at her, again she hid her sight away, unable to continue for some reason until her sister came to clear the deal. 'She can't continue unless we turn around and don't look.' 'You can't be serious, can you?' 'Just do it, you don't want to return all the way up there, do you?' Indeed it was a long way to return, and Argus couldn't deny the hospitality that was provided by her not so long ago. 'Fine, you may proceed.' Said Argus, not sure about himself or why he was endorsing her to do so. 'Go on ahead Vivian, no one is watching.' There was the sound of metal and a bright light, followed by pain. The last thing Argus remembered were the bottom stairs laying at the bottom of the floor, everything seeming much larger than they were previously. Quite bizarre he thought, that someone drew the darkness in now, leaving nothing but the fragrance and taste of dirt. There was a dream he always had, whilst reading or at the end of the darkest nights, it was the failure of stars. It was clear now, how he remembered, walking down a road of steel, people who were walking just as he was, at a faster pace, in an empty desert with nothing but a large road that was well enough waiting for all of them to get to an end. 'Who are you, people?' The words came out like sand and ended up on the ground, leaving nothing but an empty threat. Each step made him lose his water and feel much sleepier than before, slowed down, weak, unable to continue against the thousands who could it better. They all tried to reach something, in the distance, a black malformation that was moving around, though never left its place. Some fell beside him, unable to continue, though never in his dream did he help the man get up, barely having enough strength to give it to himself. Other tried but none fell whatsoever, not him, at least not yet, nor anyone he ever knew. There was a maiden, lost there with her child, both walking as she slowly cried the sand out of her eyes. Her child was dried up to the point of being nothing but a pile of bones and stretched skin. 'My cage, where is it?' Came a shuddered voice, though Ferdinand looked around, he could see nothing, nor anyone who could speak anything he could understand, unless you could count sand. And none reached the end, ever, at the pointless quest, all become sand, brittle until they reached it. At least that's what he could remember happening in his dreams every single previous night he had it happen. 'My cage.' And its repeats, almost to the exact same predicament, all happening, to the point where he realised, that, even with control having being gained over it, he still chose to do the same, walk, just like everyone else. Even when he knew that it was pointless to the point of repeating the same dream, which made no sense whatsoever, ignoring everything, until it went away. It had to go away, he thought. It has to away if I choose to ignore it long enough, I need to have faith in that. The least of what he could do now was only to hope and look ahead, the sand was already running down and he could see no hands attached to him. He fell then and awakened on the other side of the door. Standing from below, Argus saw two fuzzy figures standing in-between moving white shapes that resembled spores. Could I still be dreaming? He asked himself after seeing so many of the shapes just moving, floating and touching one another, only to push against and spread across the air. 'Shh, he's waking up.' 'Hey, can you hear us? Hey, hey, eyes around here, if you can knock your head if you can understand what I'm saying and don't breathe in too much. They'll mess with your head.' The flash came quick, from white, he remembered yet again, past what the figure said, and the whisper that came again and reminded him of the cage laid the end. The sand still going on and everyone was heading towards a giant man, as old and shrivelled as his skin fell on its own, making room and paths for the sand to move through, around and around, coming in his mouth. The flash suddenly burned his vision and the figures were revealed to be the girls. 'You!' Said, Argus, as he grabbed her, despite having them both look so much alike one another, he remembered the hit and knew who Vivian was. Immediately her throat was grabbed and almost in a moment, he started choking her, though not with the intent to kill. Still, the rage took him on, his expression being changed. 'Let go of her. She saved your damn life, damn it!' Both of them were pushed away as he released, still confused. 'How, what?' Around his back, now, as he raised himself up, he felt the hit and just how much it did to him. Some blood still laid in the spot, though most of it had gone already if it weren't for the possible brain damage he might've sustained from the hit. 'You've got twenty seconds to explain why did you do that before I lose my temper again.' As he said it, he gazed at them as they stood on the ground, both comforting one another, whilst her sister laid in terror crying. Ann did her best, or at least as such, judging by the condition and the pain she was caused by Argus. No word said she anymore to him, though what could one say in such a circumstance? Argus laid there, more than ill-willed and waited. 'Take a look for yourself then.' There was a pointer, almost laying behind him, though it wouldn't work again. 'I won't fall for that again, trust me, I'm well aware of your intent by now.' 'Stop being stubborn and, walk then with your back, just look at the wrench laying on the ground.' Despite not knowing whenever or not they were trustworthy anymore, he still came without a surprise and did as she had asked for, walking and walking until the point of which he felt the door on his back, cold metal, closed. Just laying not far from him, the wrench actually did get his attention, at last. Perhaps it wasn't for it alone, but a dark accumulation of skin, dark is the least that could be said had attached itself and was still moving on the metal, grabbing a hold at it. There was at least a fragment he had recognised, a bone, the part which belonged to a bigger spine, which made it at least obvious to what it did belong to. 'Give me something fast, we need to kill it before it grows.' 'Grab something yourself now, my sister is hurt. Can't you even see that?' She asked, spiteful, though he understood too well that perhaps he just misjudged it. His eye-hand coordination came to be, as he was looking around. 'Sharp, hard, stick, anything of the sort.' Said Argus as hard as he could without even a care about who listened or what they thought. 'Shh, it's all right now Vivi, she won't hurt you anymore. Shh.' Her arms were wrapped around her, almost as she sank deeper in her sister's breast. Out of both of them, she had always been the most delicate ones, though no mark was left around the neck, it was enough for her to never trust him again. No room was left for spite, only the fact that Anne managed to cover them after seeing just how desperately she tried hiding them. 'There.' Came to the prize, as he took a brick off the ground. Despite not being earned as such, especially now, she still felt the need to warn Argus. 'Careful, it may spread of that too, it seems to jump from object to object upon impact. "Is this what happened after she hit me?" It wasn't on purpose you dimwitted fool.. 'A pause came, as the bickering fight hadn't ended as of yet, a trail of tears now running through her hands as she looked through the cracks in her hands. It was almost as if she was looking at wood right then. At that point, she saw something she wasn't supposed to, perhaps what could be called, a fragment of the past. Fingers seemed more like wood than of skin, a window laying barred. Past it, her tears came off as the drops of rain, as she saw Argus now, and previously, perhaps just as much as a monster. 'That's what happened before.' Anne answered then, it was clear that a monster was about to strike at the infection that had held control over him, though its roots might've still be planted there. Both asked themselves if it was too late, as they had refused to tell him, even now, that there wasn't any blood at the end of his head. But something darker had filled it, the remnants of what used to linger on top of his head whilst they had tried to remove it and succeeded as such. And it turned out that Argus remained as hard as they've thought him, refusing to believe what they said. There was a spark then a strike at it and the rock was thrown, splashing against the growth and crushing it under. Suddenly, it deflated, expelling outside its everything, down to the worms and small vein-like sharp and long smaller growths it had inside. Slightly transparent, it seemed as if some of his blood flew threw them, along some of the metal that was previously devoured whilst it went on. 'Damn it, it actually did work, as I told you so.' The shock on both of their faces was an immediate response to both his action and desire to continue on. The loss of colour and form was disturbing, though was treated like any other growth of the depths, abandoned there and then, as they went on. Or at least he did, as his sudden approach still made a sudden shocking response from her sister. 'You go that way and she's going to stay as far away as she can, understood? Ar Ferdinand, I swear, if only I were a bit taller.' 'Enough, I don't want to deal any further with your games, we've plenty to go already. Plus, I wouldn't have attacked her if she didn't.' Forced through, and seeing how he was going to whine at it, she interrupted Ferdinand as she went on. "Save you? Because if it weren't for her, you'd still have had that thing growing inside of your head. Perhaps even worse at that, you'd be dead by now. Should I keep going on or you got the point?" 'Indeed I have, crystal clear.' Speaking of which, barely now, as they made their way, he noticed the crystals, blue, as dark as the material their small dresses were made out of, which did more than prompt a question. 'Is your sister dressed just as well as you are?' 'Why? Oh.' It was clear, by now, as they stood on a giant bed of crystals, blue, tall, small ones, spread around, small bats just spreading around, with them growing on their backs. 'Is that not dangerous?' Argus asked though Anne hadn't figured out what he was talking about until he pointed at the sky. Not as dangerous as the dark spot on your head. Though in her mind, it went much more different than she thought, the previous encounter having been properly thanked for. It couldn't be helped either. He was ill, and she didn't do much. But she's my sister too and didn't deserve that. 'Look, I feel like I'm caught in-between two extremes, and it's getting quite awkward.' 'It's going to be worse once we meet your sister, as the party will turn on me, three against one I wager.' 'She's not like that.' Promoted again Anne, whilst her sister was still silently staring in his direction, from glance to glance, then hiding away. There was more than enough space, and some more blocked mouth that just laid there, closed but going through the bottom of the cave. 'Who built those?' Quickly he changed the subject, trying his best to feign interest, without any knowledge or wonder if it would've worked or not. He went on nonetheless. 'Quite old, all of them appear to be the same.' Some of the architecture seemed to be present in all of them, more or less, out of which, the most common feature remained that all of them were closed down. Something must've happened and even she refused to talk about it. Why thought? No thought shared on this? Do you know nothing of what had happened here? Or is it that you're not sure yourself either? "I know what happened." Don't. We're not supposed to talk about it. Vivian broke the silence with a sudden shuddering inside her knees, soft and tender, even by the look of that. It took a lot of force to say that and flash her head the other side. And a return to silence commenced. 'She's right, we're not supposed to talk about it.' Then it is dangerous to dwell here, right? "I suppose. That was more than enough, though still. What drove you here now, to that room you've found me? And still, even after what I did, you still decided to take me on with you and guide me through this place. Why? Again, it was quite a peculiar thing to ask, now, this moment, at this time. Peculiar too at that, as none of them could deny him anymore or even attempt to send him back, none of that would work. It would've been more than welcomed by Vivian, as she wasn't sure herself either, looking at her sister, and in her turned, looking at the ground. There was someone who told me to come and take that access room, and. There also came a muffled voice, almost in a whisper, that was more than inaudible to Argus who stood at the other side of the rising edges of the stone. And, that's mainly the reason why I came there and called my sister to come and find you. Who is this stranger? "I saw no face and could barely recognise that face hidden inside a fallen cowl, though it was someone I thought to recognise. Who did you recognise then? "It wasn't only a person, but I swear. Turned around, he saw some sincerity inside, though nothing could be trusted now, even if it were true that they tried to save him, both lied. She did too, on a second occasion, not to mention the fact that she admitted, properly at that, that both of them refused to trust him too, in their turn. So now, as deceitful as both of them were, he still had no choice but to attempt to trust them. She's there. "Past the sea? There laid a shallow river that went as far and wide as he could tell, too much it was, as it appeared like poison, muddy, pieces of blue rock already swallowed and dragged to the bottom, only to glitter. It was obvious as such, even to him, that if he were to fall to the bottom of that, he'd end up chained and grabbed to the bottom by chains of rocks that weren't floating. Perhaps he'd end up the same as the captain. The site was muddy, though through it there seemed to be a sunken ship. Odd, as it appeared, coincidences rarely happened then and there, especially where they stood, and still. It could be the same one or not. Argus looked around as both of them stood in silence, pondering and scouting too for something. There was mouth just as close as he thought, and suddenly it connected, the ship, the elevator, where he stood. The location was a bit far off, though it seemed to share the same design he had recognised before. Alas, where to now? Argus managed to brush it off, though just how nervous he appeared, it was unknown, as both looked at him and wondered too. What crawled up inside of him? Anne quite often by now wondered, as for each glance revealed the black goo had already sunken if it even were for it to be that way. Not even once until not had she thought that, perhaps, chances were that it was produced by him, not invaded, no growth. He could be either the host or the parasite. Listen, Ar Ferdinand, there's something we need to tell you. A sudden shake of the head revealed that Vivian disapproved of the decision to tell him, though it would've been fair, she still had a consciousness. Listen, rub the back of your head for a moment. Excuse me? Just do it now. Though it appeared as vague, bizarre, he knew that something was still wrong with them and what they've done. Now both of them looked at him, after being settled, even Vivan, despite the fact that she was still feeling peculiarly awkward near him, she decided to look. He rubbed the back of the head, still feeling something there. Something seemed to be lodged. How have I not felt this before? Argus asked himself, almost to the point of saying it out loud in a whisper. The water and the cold wind could only get much muddier and colder, as he suddenly shifted both of his hands and grabbed a hold of the thing that laid lodged deep inside his skull. He pulled with a sudden thumper and took it out, though easily, he felt a release. 'Both sisters seemed disgusted to see a sudden burst of liquid, coloured with white, black, even some slight hints of red in red blood, all released along with some smaller, longer veins that were lodged together, at once. Turned around, he saw that now, in his hand laid a part of the spine that once tried entering him, disgusted as he was. Still, he couldn't deny it, the disgust being apparent. 'Was this inside of me all along?' Turned, even further to their side, he saw just how frightened they appeared to be, more so than needed be. 'Calm down, I'm all right, you don't need to over exaggerate. Though there actually was a need for that, as he revealed, after they pointed at it, the small fragment of bone tried lodging itself inside his fingers too. It pricked him, to a drop of blood. 'Agh.' A sudden reflex managed to let it fall into the water and fill him with a shimmer of rage. 'I'm sick of these little parasites, already have I spent way too much getting rid of them.' Turn around for a second, I need to see the back of your head. 'Despite having the best intention, there still laid a peculiar look on them, fallen from him. 'Later, now we need to the past, and do it fast before it grows. "It can grow?" "You saw it yourself back there, right? When did you tell me to turn around? Thank by the way and, well, sorry about, you know. "There was still a damp field all around and floating small white spheres just floating like spores. If the blue overnight wasn't enough to confuse his senses, the white now remained like that. 'Well, we should go one ahead before the weather gets worse, right?' Vivian had already chuckled at that, though turned away with a shame on her face, it hadn't passed enough time for it, and it seemed as if a boat was approaching from the distance. It was plain, small, and a cowl stood inside, rustling to come through and pick them up almost as if they were expected. 'Were we expected to come or what?' 'Perhaps, or perhaps now, she doesn't seem to be our sister. 'No, she couldn't be, though. For a second, Anne thought of the man, or the woman, the stranger that appeared to confuse all her senses when they've met. It could be, or couldn't. There were many people walking around, and it could've proven to be a trick of the eye as he was lost in the crowd soon after. Not to mention that they stood near one another, only for a few seconds before running off, standing only for some information to be spread. Whenever or not it turned out to be the man, it mattered not, now or then, or even after. 'We're going to the other side, so beware of what now lays below, I've a bad feeling about this, and the ground beyond this pool seems too shallow to be walked upon. 'Both nodded and agreed upon the invitation soon to come. There was a slight hint of relaxation inside the air, as they waited. The man was still rowing the boat from the other side, or so could Argus figure out from the silhouette. A hint of tinder that had been burnt in the air roamed, but here and then? Nothing in sight to suggest such a thing. 'Listen, Anne, do you know where your sister is supposed to meet you? Us? Anne. "Right, right, on the other side, near a spiral created stone, it's hard to miss, it's the only rock that sticks out. "Are we really going on that?' Again came forward Vivian, still reluctant to go forward as the rower was about to get to their part of the shore. There was the spine, somewhere in the water, still trying its best to wriggle and escape, though that remained past and beyond their sight and knowledge. A thumper announced just fast he had gotten there, as it almost broke the shore of stones, being lodged as hard as it was, as a metal blade in dumbfounded armour. No word spoke, though the lower, the cloaked figure backed away to leave some space for them to go forward. 'It's either this or we'll swim through it, and I doubt we could possibly do that after, you know what. 'There was a slight hint of remorse, but he pushed her forth, as she fell on the front of the small boat, being met face to face with the cowed figure. Nothing but void laid inside the cowl, though inside her nothing but scorn for Argus, which still she hasn't caught on the lie. 'Damn you.' Vivian came after, without a problem, and without a notice, no force having being used on her. Last of which, he stepped on it and closed his eyes, reopening it to see a face on that cowed man. A beard came as long as it were, two barking glowing eyes that seemed to be as piercing as he were. No word was spoken, not even now, but by the way, he was looking at Argus it, eyeing him through both of them, it was clear that he was waiting for him to speak, not for them. 'Have you called for me then? I've been told that there was a figure standing on the street, who met with Anne and told her to me and where to find me. So, I'm to wager that it may be you, as the chances are, both of which wore and still wear a cowed cloth.' Argus looked just slightly below and saw Anne furiously nodded her head from left to right, anger in her eyes but dared say nothing. The old man still made them both feel uncomfortable from having been approached so closely, almost to the point of being placed. 'No.' There was a raspy voice, though that wasn't the worst part of it, something made a sound from deep inside his neck, metal, perhaps, something he had eaten or swallowed. A voice box, that was it, he had remembered seen people before who used them. Though by the sound of it, it remained an old model, as the machination could still be there, preventing him from speaking at will. It was long ago since then, but, if chances were and he remembered correctly, the device was created to be more than a box, as it had multiple tall pointed pillars inside, pushing forward, up the jaw, forcefully moving it when he spoke. There were others, such small pillars and tiny bars that rolled and pushed on both sides, only to replicate the normal movement of the human jaws, though it only managed to make it look unnatural. Later models were always removed, or replaced, even worse perhaps, some people were still forced to use them despite not being any way for them to be changed or replaced. There wasn't any possible way for those who still had the old models, as they were considered antiques in the eyes of any other layman, or even those who worked in the field. And with no maintenance possible, if it broke. Well, it was now that Argus paid attention to his mouth and face, trying to shimmer through a small glance inside his mouth and neck. Though clearly, he waited for him to start at once. While going on and rowing as slow as he could do. Both the girls heard what the man said and figure out, somehow, that the voice was pointed and would speak only to Ar Ferdinand, and no one else. Sure, chances were for them to try, but being forced to stay too close for comfort didn't leave much to speak of, or to even try. There was a menace in that empty void and the scornful voice, which they couldn't explain why. 'Ehm.' Broke the silence, Argus having coughed, before, though not even once had he felt so awkward. There wasn't anything on his mind to ask about, especially since the meaning of it was nothing more but to stare in the old man's mouth. That pale face being shifted by the sides and shaking, almost like a bigger grub had taken the form of a human then hid away. Alas, there was still a long way to go for all of them, and clearly, by the look of the head bobbing, slightly visible, only from his side, even they wanted to hear him talk. 'Ehm.' Came to Argus again, at which now both Vivian and Anne were annoyed by that. No remark given yet, he refused to wait for one, though, he went forth and asked. 'Who exactly are you then and why are you rowing us?' The man stood there for a moment, finally having shaken his glances, from staring relentlessly at Argus, to the bottom of the sea. It didn't take much to figure out that he was looking at the ship, the scent of salt still laid upon, at the point where some of it could still be seen, long and wide on his beard, giving it the white on the grey. There wasn't the lifelessness he expected, though it wasn't far from it. Obviously, the old man still had some years behind and as of

yet, nothing else seemed to have disturbed him. He just looked at him, and Argus knew that in no time they'd be on the other side and he'd not get, perhaps, another chance for them to speak again. There were some features that were slightly recognisable, though, then again, they could've have belonged to someone else just like him. Wrinkles, big eyes, stretched face, there was no one who didn't share those small features after going through old age. The boat hadn't stopped for a moment, up until some seconds forth, so the man could finally release a cough. There was some blood running down down the cowl, spreading all around and leaving no mark as of yet. Still, he pondered what was going on, both him and as they approached near him, scared not to get a disease, it was not that he saw something in his blood. Blue crystals, same as in their dresses, without having realised just how close to him they approached, he notices the same pattern of small shards of crystal, blue in blue, embroidered all over their dresses and in that blood. Up, still, there were those bats, blue almost cobalt, to the point of some not even being recognisable from the rocks. It's a sickness, though he thought of asking. 'Is it a side effect of living down here?' 'It is.' The man saddened as he looked down, right before Argus could ask another question, he just sat down and waited for him to say something, anything of the matter. 'Well, you see, this is what happens when you spend your life in the depths, sitting and rowing the boat, all over and over again. People use to come but now they don't.' 'What are you even eating?' For a moment, the old man pondered, surprised at that too, that she decided to talk about it, though it wasn't really that much of a shock for Argus. 'Well, it's not hard to figure out, just take a look above and you'll notice. Oh the scoundrels, oh they're just well and away, from time to time, terrorising the sky.' 'How can you even reach them then?' 'I don't my dear sir, for you see, I've but to wait and take the meat away, smash the rock on another rock down the shore.' For a second, the old man became more jolly and awoken by the, almost invitation Argus had, it was quite an interesting thing to find out and ponder about, at that too. Meat in the rocks, rocks with the meat, over and over again, smashed and broken, eaten, and the only side effect. 'Rocks in the stomach, though they always find their way out, they've always had and always will, for you see, I've not a problem eating and reusing, throwing and catching fish with the bait made by yours, company.' There was some disgust though nothing out of the ordinary, yet. 'Fish in the pond?' 'Deep sea creatures, aye. This is more than a river, more than a pond, it goes as deep as the ends of the earth, all here, as you can see, my ship lay down there, taken away from below and spat out towards the upper world.' This could've been the beginning of a long story that would drag itself, on itself, perhaps forever, if it weren't for them to pause and ponder. 'Wait.' Argus said they had stopped just in time to reach the shore. 'Perhaps the next time.' Though there was a bleak expression after as if melted by the lack of interest Argus showed in his story, reflected on his face, his heart was close to being spat out, though none of that seemed to bother him. A master of illusion and of plays, though Argus of the captain. Though, nonetheless, he pulled both girls and again, pushed them through. It was quite distracting, though he needed to get them out, and as far away as possible. 'Let's go.' 'Less rough please.' They were a force, despite looking behind at the man, now they could both see his face and a dark grin. There was something in the water. 'So fast?' Even Anne was surprised by the fact that there was a hint of dark water shimmering by the side, it was something unknown to them both, though not entirely. An eeriness already filled them even before they left the boat, though it was confused with the feeling of uncomfortableness that they both felt whilst seeing the man rowing the boat. 'Damn that thing, it will spread, come you can both walk on your own.' 'Shouldn't we announce the man?' 'He'll be fine, as long as we're far away from him, we should be too. It seems as if it's tracking me for some reason I'm unaware of.'Argus had realised that, even then, that he was almost had, running away, the bats seemed to be alarmed.'Duck!'He yelled and at a moment that was stopped, the company of three ducked below from the swarm of bats that flew, some seemingly falling and breaking apart, leaving only rocks on the bottom.They flew in pairs of eight and spread around in the cave like swarms, leaving nothing but small chunks of pure blue rock near them.Argus covered his eyes, though not entirely that he had seen both Anne and Vivian just spread around like small racoons trying to get as much of the gemstones as they could.Somewhat they knew there was something about them, picking only the purest, the most blue and the shiniest of them, whilst avoiding the rest of throwing them away.A bigger rock seemed to be taken from above, at which Argus pulled both of the back, by their rigs, each one and each time.'We need to make it to that cave!'Argus had keen eyes for the dark, or so he thought, else he wouldn't have managed to see the yellow light coming from outside an opening inside the depths.Somewhat left the lamp there and doubtlessly, it wasn't the old man who did so, as he seemed to never leave his restless place, nor have any desire to do so.Both of them nodded, with giant bumps of shiny stones hid away in both of their clothes, smuggled from below to the above city, most likely to be sold.So this is it, the reason why they're coming down here.Though Argus on the run, after managing to stay away, punching and kicking at flying bats and rocks, a cave in could or seemed to happen at any rate now.It was dangerous and getting more so with every second that passed, sharp stones, blunt ones, hitting even one another during their fall.Like anvils in the depths, the rocks made sparks and started frightening both the bats as well as the three of them.'That power.'Argus noted with a sudden interest as much as the sense of danger came through him.Sloppy seconds to say the least, as they turned and he managed to hit the lamp along the excavation tools that laid on the table.The wood was sharp as he even managed to let out some blood soon spilt.'They'll make a return, run!'He announced their arrival, as well as the departure as the rock bats, seemed to be coming, forcing themselves to follow through caverns.Still, the place was unknown to both girls despite having been dwindles for so many years in the depths.'Vivian, stay close.'Said she, whilst looking around, everything looking the same to her.Stone, upon stone, bat like a bat, even some mouth that laid closed in the distance.'They won't stop for hours at least.We need to make it upstairs and take another tunnel.'That seems to be the closest one, no funny business though.'It was at least in reach if it were for a sprint, though wherever those mouths gave into, could end up anywhere.'Oh, no, no no.Not that one.Not the bronze ones.'As they approach, Anne recognised something she hadn't thought of seen about, out of all the things they could stumble upon, this could and might as well be the worst of them all.A bronze mouth, slip opening, only one seemingly to open on its own as they were approaching, the other one having two giant metal hands covering itself up.'It's opening, this is our chance.'Rightly behind them, about some feet away was the swarm of bats, out of which some had already sparked and got in flames, at least the ones that had their meat still far away from the stone.Those that avoided the flame hard themselves sharpened after the impact with the pass, it was already narrow, even the three of them barely managed to get through.But now, it was ravaged, destroyed, almost caved in without a chance or doubt of a chance for any possible return.'Why?'Our father told us never to approach it, or get into contact with that type of mouth.Despite it being rare, he told us that they're dangerous.'We've no choice anymore unless you want to be eaten alive or abandoned.'And they felt, all three the weariness of constant effort, the promise of pain soon to come upon them if they fell.Yet, hand in hand so they'd not fall, almost like a protector he pushed them forward, despite having hurt both previously. All was forgotten as the desolate place and the sight was soon to be abandoned and left behind. The mouth opened a final time as they approached and it seemed to wait. There were no stairs below, though worse, an empty abyss. Was it safe? Could it be safe? Argus asked himself, though either it or them, he leapt through the sprint and saw only a light from above, as he had already pushed them both in front of him. They were indeed the first to fall, almost like the balls of a chain, left to fall, in the bleak, almost smoke ravine. It was hard to breathe, though the light perished, now there was only a pale blue light and the sound of stone being smashed against metal. Echoes came after the impact, though now blue lit the place. It was indeed a long neck, transparent walls with such a sight that they could only dream of seeing. Such depths made it seem and appear like a kingdom, of stone hills, swallowed from above and claimed by kings. A statue covered too, broken and tilted by the side. 'Is it still dangerous?' Asked Argus, hearing they carry. There were empty dark spots through which he passed, though he could still feel himself falling, until a straight point and a slope. Metal, going straight forward, leading him now, as within a giant pipe, ready to be spat out. Already he had lost sight of the two girls, but soon he felt a liquid running aloud, near his hands. Lifting both his hands up he noticed that it was blood, as his eyes widened. No wound on his arms, no pain on his body, and the blood was fresh. Most important of all laid the fact that both of the girls were now gone and away, as he was thrust outside, hitting himself against something hard. Sand had already entered his mouth and nose, at last. He felt the wooden floor, fresh air, the ceiling that seemed to be harshly carved and possibly sculpted by someone, the architecture of the depths. There were some whispers, and again, Argus wondered if it could be, or not, that the girls were alive, blood on his hands, and a desire to know, he fell asleep below. He brushed it off though, even if the impact would've been enough to knock a bigger man than his build, by strength and wit alone, he forced it off. There were only footsteps audible before he regained full sight of the area and some crates around. Shadows formed as a light just laid on a barrel, as if someone was just hiding behind them at the sight of him. Despite not moving, he thought, whenever or not it could've been the two girls, hurt and hiding, misconstruing his intention once again. No, they wore long hats by the looks of it, and more than two, smaller figures hid and waited. 'Who's there?' Asked Argus, as intimidatingly as he could be, with enough breaths of air to appear twice as bulked than he actually was. He stood tall and waited now, knowing still that the advantage of knowing where they stood was more than enough to spark a bargain. Then there were the surrounding, of which he failed to recognise the mistake of not taking a look around before even deciding to engage with the rascals. It was a pitch of a voice that came from there, right as the wax was melting on the table, being lit by the candles. 'You first.' Said the voice, shrivelled by the cold, no doubt about it. Clearly not the proper voice belonging to a girl or anything like that, but a creature of some sort. Either that or the people who dwelled around wore hats with pointy ears and hid behind crates. Though the marble floor was comfortable to sit on in, he declared himself. 'Ferdinand at your service. And you may be?' No doubt that now they had the chance to trust them, first of which came out, standing tall and gloomy, with bigger eyes than expected. It was a small man, bearded with a hat of bats and feathers, all that were already processed and used for something else. Indeed the strange man looked and scouted Argus, being the only one in front of him, slightly intimidated by the stature of the man. There were most likely a few feet away, until another small one came. From the looks of it, without the moustache and all, it seemed like it was a smaller version of the man, younger, his son perhaps. 'I presume that is your son, am I correct?' There was a sudden shock as if he had guessed something that was not short of a guarded secret, perhaps even to them, as an outsider was at hand. Thinking of that, at the right time that they were both distracted and looking only at his stature, Argus hid his hands. Not to leave a short impression at all, 'else they might presume I'm going to eat them. Still, it seemed as if, even a step forth, triggered two behind them. They were both intimidated as of yet, questioning. 'How did you know he's my son? No one else that had seen him un-introduced has ever told me that before. Not even his poor old mother, bless her. 'It was a particularly awkward pronunciation of the words he spoke, like an accent from a foreigner, though forced through the teeth and lips. Perhaps even the slightly chance of a lisp that went then and there. I need answers, thought Argus. If it weren't for the threatening hallucinations to return, he'd not make a move. Around, just further in the cave, there was already the constellation of cages in the stones, spreading across to form patterns under the arrow of his eyes. There needed to be a way out, and behind, at the end of a glance, the mouth closed and received in the wall. Speaking of which, there was no neck visible, but the pure stone. 'Where did I come from?' As he asked, he noticed that they were both, in actuality, four of them scouting him and trying to inspect about everything that was of him. They were the same height, one wearing glasses, of a pair, the other the same but cracked and pierced by a small screw that laid lodged in there. It was indeed a party, and they all seemed to be a part of something similar. Being spread apart didn't help much, with each step forth, again they backed again until he stopped. Though one of the had failed to take the hint and had run beyond a group of rocks, attempting to make a clever move and hide there. 'I can still see you, though I've no time for your games. 'They peered now at him as he walked away, between, then behind, a tall dark figure, barely grasped with his hands in his pockets, hiding them away. Even if they saw the blood there wasn't a point of showing it further. 'Wait. 'The voice told him, though not enough conviction laid in there to make him stop and follow the speech. Well, if they are to speak, so be it. Water, even more of it, fresh air, to the bottom and shapes formed in stone, like tunnels from which they came. A deeper tunnel, bigger as if something just as big was to be carried away and inside, though it and throughout. Bolder ones came and stood near the tall figure and looked in the same direction as he did. Argus take little notice of them, or their action, knowing that they didn't appear to be as dangerous as they first had been encountered. 'You go there and find out our small house. We're hard workers, me and my sons and have come through everything and saw just as much as we can, though never have we seen the likes of you before. You're as tall as bridge tower and you're just as clever as one, who are you if not a messenger from the stars?' 'Stars?' 'Yes, stars!' Towards the rock formation, at which the man pointed if one could call him that, glittered blue rocks, some whiter, other shinier, though all indeed sharing a resemblance to stars. Rocks were falling, as it was normal, from time to time, scraping and leaving a trail in the great rock formation. Even the falling stars were mimicked by the small blue dots, and the vastness of it, as it spanned across a surface that would even stand against the starriest of nights on its own. And in the moment he recalled darkness in the falling tunnel, he couldn't see any star, no glitter. Not even a light could be seen from there, no bat anywhere to disturb or to take, and despite them falling below, he saw no stone-shard nor any mark on the pristine floor. So where did they all go? 'It's a mystery to which we often wonder, who put it there, to begin with. The pillars, you see, they're still there, hanging without a foundation, twisted in spirals and marks all across them, and yet none of the stars touched them. 'They were plenty spread across the ceiling, left there by the previous, as he could perhaps think or guess, predecessors of the caverns. Those who chose to dwell behind and stay there before them, and yet, after so many years, of which signs showed, still remained there. At the bottom laid no mark, not of dust nor of any stone that would even hint at the pillars of being come from there. Fact dictated it too peculiar, as it were, the stony floor, broken and shattered, like dust or sand on which they stood laid connected with perfection, a sea of stone, almost reflective. Yet no light to the bottom, far from their feet, Argus laid unsure. Should I walk or go beyond the tunnels? Will I hallucinate or be taken away? Perhaps the answer lay in this smaller kin, which he asked. 'Is it safe to go forth?' 'No, especially when the beast's about to come.' Exactly then, was the candle blown away, as it happened in a split of seconds. They were already on the way, managing only by the darkness, hearing only the wet splashes that were left by its awakening. Argus was grabbed by the leg and pulled only as a courtesy before deciding to follow him and hide with them in the darkness. Evil, disturbing sounds were amid as they barely managed to come inside. If it had been at least as worse as everything he had previously encountered, it wasn't going to end well. No way out, but the darkness in which he held only a small figure on which he relied on leading him to a safer spot. 'Will it follow through here?' 'I do not know, but never look back dark man or you will be taken away like the rest of them.' Tribute or not, others were lost, judging by the way they treated it, with fear and by feet alone were they carried, carrying in their heart the memory of them, said in a whisper. 'It takes our men, from out families and children and certainly, it hates when we carry out of our homes.' 'You've seen it before?' Though perhaps even more important, he felt of asking if they could see through the dark then and there, little sense did tell otherwise. By now, as they were old, it became close to being muscle memory, even if Argus felt nothing but the abyss, comforted by the glass wind and its cold touch. They lit the torch and everything finally laid revealed. Bars, long, on bridges and small holes, covered by long, time-worn iron rods and openings. Machines laid there, half-way stuck inside the wall, as if for excavation, their legs were broken, as they needn't any wheels in order to progress. And from where he stood, there were bones in the cabins. It was a giant, concave, room full of them, all so much stumbled and crossed with one another, that their twist made it seems as if they were brought from far away and merely deposited after no longer being needed. 'What is this place?' 'Shhh. Don't let the beast let you know we're here. See those spires and those upper floors? The ones made of long plates of pressure?' It seemed as if that from where they stood, air pressure and steam was still released, boiling hot by the likes of it. Furnaces, on a side, that shared the same design, on which Argus's eyes almost grew cold and pale at the sight of it. From the same design on the doors to the wooden floors, he wondered too at that. Was I here before? Though that made no, to little sense, there was, perhaps a chance of him getting out, the clouds, the falling, though there was still a city and clouds. From what he remembered, and through so many twists and ends, there wasn't much left to believe or to think of as a rational man. There was only madness ahead and atop all. Stop and beyond, even the speech laid the cage that needed to be found so he'd be free. They were now in, a few feet of dirty metal, filled with rust, and in between the rust, in the spaces on the metal walls through and beyond which they went, black oil laid. It was pure and still smelled quite bad if it were old, to begin with, or not yet another black blood of some creature who levelled there. An explanation was missed, as he looked at the man below. The others now stood closer to him, almost asking for protection from the taller, much older man who seemed, in their eyes to fear no beast. 'Now do you understand?' 'Could you repeat again? I seem to have missed it.' He threw a wicked look of annoyance and quite a bad second impression, of a dumbfounded, dimwitted man, though there was enough patience now. Again, he repeated himself. 'Look at it, as you may have seen it, the beast enjoys walking on the platforms above and playing with its prey. There are plenty of pressure plates that make grim sounds when touched, hence why it's driving others mad. So sudden would one randomly go off, raised by the on-going pressure that it made it certainly more than hard to figure it out whenever or not the beast laid around. Well, or more than well behind it laid and roamed, and if it were to follow, perhaps they couldn't have noticed it. Even with the silence, there was steam, their whispers only but a slim and dimly hid away from its ears. Certainly, they couldn't risk any further, though nonetheless, they tried it still. 'Listen, if it draws in close, see those ones?' The man pointed at, in the least, four or five vehicles that laid lodged into stone, caught into traps, and locked away, unusable and perhaps out of the necessary fuel to start again. 'You go into one of them and open the doors, immediately after, lock yourself and count if you cherish for your life and if you know where eighty ends.' 'Why eighty? And what about the rest of you?' 'We're more than enough to fit two or three in the space there, as we were in the olden days required to manipulate the machines. Don't worry about us if the beast comes, for it will surely come for you. No offence intended, but you do seem to have more meat on your bone, a fair pick to give it to it as for appraisal.' 'None was taken, but could we move faster then? I don't feel like waiting to be hunted and forced to lock myself in a tight small space.' 'I get it alright. You're one of the folks who hates small places and being locked in there. As I am one of those folk myself a bit on my mother's side.' A chuckle in the deep wasn't enough to draw in the beast if those harsh whispers weren't, though already had they passed the machines, in which they would've hidden. Above them laid the floor now, spreading and spanning across far, and by the halfway point, if, judging by the dark, were even to be true, now it laid fragmented. Crossed, and squared, empty spaces, as for air to come through was laid open for any to see. Now, if the beast were to attack, they could plainly see it, if it even there to begin with. It was hard not to remain paranoid with those who walked around him and were just biting at his boots, looking for protection. Now and then the floor above would end and leave much and long empty spaces. Spaces that would allow someone to climb to the upper floor, or even worse, to come down. 'Look, down that point and after that gate we should be safe, at least it knows not to enter anymore.' 'How can you be sure?' Asked Argus, as he looked at him, still his name wasn't known, nor how did they know, but surely a good reason had to be. It would've been a shame to return and face a beast alone. And from the shadows it left behind or thought to have seen, it was enormous, far too much, not at the size of that towering horror. Even the thought and memory of it being free caused him to shudder and shiver. Nor air, nor land, not even the sea was safe, and certainly not even the furthest ends in his mind were as free as he thought. The more the came in, the more twists he took, the more he felt caged, and he was being reminded constantly. It wasn't just a coincidence that cages were left, set on bars with skeletons inside. 'Who were they?' Argus asked at the first sight, they seemed to have the same appearance and worn out clothes that resisted, even if they skin had left the bodies long ago, way before them. 'Those unfortunate to find a good hiding spot.' There was something else Argus had ignored, or simply refused to think off, until now. Bones, brittle, scratched and lodged, inside of them, as broken as they were, he had barely noticed, now, despite their fractures, that they shared a resemblance with the iron doors. Iron doors, the ones from those machines. He muttered to himself, as not so far behind they laid closed with marks on them, long and curved, from all sides, assaulted, yet all failed to even penetrate. Only a layer of paint was taken off, even the glass being more than safely, slightly damaged, made most likely to withstand more than that. At least, there was the certainty of. 'A howl?' He asked it was one of the smaller, slightly older men, the one who wore the shattered glasses. Not wrong entirely, it was a piercing howl coming from behind, far away though certainly not. Everyone but Argus became less tense than him, with a sudden release of their muscles and expressions. 'Will it not come, shouldn't we run?' 'You can relax now, usually, when the howl comes, it recedes back to its territory and leaves us alone. We may even be fortunate to keep behind for some time. Perhaps you could help us scavenge some supplies before going back, right?' Their party was grabbed to a halt, Argus being, again, the dark and tall figure who stood there and waited, suspiciously looking to waste no time and certainly not his sanity. 'Well, only if you're fast and I receive a light. My eyes are not as trained as yours are, nor is my mind, so.' The group came together, neck in neck whispered, then he waited. The bulkier one of them grabbed something from under his cloth and lit it on the end of the other torch. Now the torches were in pairs and they nodded. Before spreading or even deciding, the leader of their small ravine made a moulder of dust and pieces of metal, like a totem of some kind, just in case one of them would be lost. 'It should be seen from far away, though just in case.' A small lantern was placed on the dirt made totem before going on. That could be seen from at least miles away and glittering metal had already made a point on how much further than that could the light travel. All around the scrapyard laid plenty of reflective material, some objects even left the impression that they were polished for that reason alone. 'It goes as you see it, you watch the light flicker and follow it. If it disappears or goes out of your sight, something has gone wrong and you should either make it to the hiding doors or hide away.' 'But you said the beast won't come here once it starts howling.' It was a question that almost placed the small man into a slumber-like thought. Indeed, there was something off about the ordeal, though he seemed to need them as guides, and to them, he looked more like a donkey in terms of carrying the luggage. 'Is it a deal then? That you want to strike?' On average, we're merely making for two or three bags of the useful and the glint. But with you on board, we could do so much more than we ever wanted. 'Or needed.' Came another, as they spoke of the light. Now he knew not what to expect, nor what the light meant, thought one thing came to mind. 'Wait, you've said something about the beast preying upon you and your families.' He stopped, though it was a risk, they both did seem untrustworthy despite being girls, and above that, there wasn't any possible way for the two of the sisters to stick and go past the small group and him. Everything was in his sight then and there. If there was indeed a beast that took them, it was too late for that. 'Forget it. And let's get going already, I'm afraid I've not the time to spare, so as soon as we're done with it, the sooner you can lead be through the dug holes.' There finally came the spark of joy after the confusion, there was more to this man, they thought. Tall and just as smart, he knows what to do for his own good, perhaps he'll prove more useful when brought to them. 'Come come, shake on it and give him a bag.' It wasn't a secret handshake, though almost tradition-like for them to spit upon it and go on with their doing. They shook, a bit too hard for the man as he shrieked and turned his brow, but what else could Argus do in a situation like this? With a hand as double or triple his size, he sighed and went on. 'Ehm, I'm Ferdinand, by the way.' The voice, though he failed to realise, almost triggered the spark of a caged outline in the darkest of the depths, almost like a fragment of a dark storm just being sprouted there. Still, it kept power over him, a shadow that played near the edges of his eyes. 'Boorut, Loris, Kin and Gargandum.' He said, in the order of the eye, Boorut being the one he had spoken with, Loris with a grey moustache and glasses, Kin with the broken ones. And the last, the boulder one, though afraid enough to go away, Gargandum. Just at the right time, that he'd been found, he brought and gave him the bag, wanting it to be so much more. It wasn't, as for them it might've been big, but for him and his hands and arms, they were nothing.'Give me eight of them then.'The Gargandum, as of which of lately would refer to made a shocking sign and spoke bluntly.'We've not had that many, we've had perhaps two to spare, but only one for each of us.You must excuse us though we're nothing but a small party here and now.The others who had come had a bigger one of eighteen, perhaps even two battalions at large, to get everything in sight before they were.'"Gandum!That's enough.Listen, dear Ferdinand, you mustn't listen to Gandum over here, he's done more than plenty of tinkering in his life, to an extent, even when it comes to the recalling of stories as such."Very well, you can bring me forth to them when we're done, but.'Argus paused, looked around, all of them standing in a circle of children, listening to a story.Just the right person, laid another though, at the sight of The Grandum, he wore plenty of shirts and heavy at that and largely extended, with a heavy embroidered material that could hold something if need be to take it off.As he said now.'No, I cannot depart from my shirts, they were given to me as a gift, made by hand, given by hand and worn by the end of my hand.Please Boorut, you can't force me to do this, here and now, please.'There was a silence, but the looks they gave one another and the switching between them. They were trained in the art of speaking without speaking and without a delay, after a long conversation of not a speech was given, he gave in and relayed onto the others.Plenty was given and taken back, exchanged between one another, small things, shiny things, things that glittered, stone and coins, suddenly and with a quickness hid away.And after, he gave in the two shirts he wore underneath.On the outside, they looked like nothing, but the feeling as his fingers touched and felt the, almost royal like silken material, it made him feel the majesty behind it.Not only did they feel like they were made for a king, but almost they seemed to be heavy and expandable at will, without a doubt they could even fit him if he stretched a little.It wasn't any wonder why he had to be paid for him to give them away, though something on Boorut's eye made it seems that he knew he'd get his investigation back.They spread out immediately, not even a glance was given back, nor return, each taking a random direction before trying to stick about.Plenty of corners laid dark for them to look around, and it wasn't any wonder than two or three managed to come up with the same idea, going around and waiting in the dark.Just a few, and he'll take it to the exit, won't he?Said a voice in the black darkness, waiting and sniffing around his area whilst having a direct view in-between the man and the tall door.A bad idea to betray his trust, though Argus didn't seem to notice the sparkling eyes in the dark, nor was he interested in wandering alone.There was plenty of that before, though, so was the other side, with either madmen or revolutionaries.He climbed instead on the level above, and just as a voice was to yell from the dark, giving another advice, he was grabbed.'Shh, the beast has settled already so don't worry about my fair price.I've paid more than enough so don't stop me now, not until I get some of what I've bargained for.'Two coins were rubbed against one another as they looked at him go.It seemed like nothing to him, just grabbing the ledge and going just rightly above on himself.No questions asked, no one around, just a platform and old machinery that didn't seem to work.Steam came on the occasion, though it wasn't hot enough to burn his skin.'Now this is interesting.'Muttered Argus to himself, whilst getting ready to manoeuvre the machine.Tall and red, scorned by blue, multiple clocks like white spheres, though now they were more of a pale yellow than anything else.Grass cracked, though not by the steam or by pressure, those were the marks of a pipe or something blunter.'Someone was recently here.'Around it was no marks of claws if it were to come from a tiger or a mountain lion, whatever might've played on the poor fellows.Strings and long pipes, empty but for a small metal round cylinder that would've been pushed up and down

if it were to be turned on. Something even more peculiar was melted inside, most likely blocking it, black wax from what could it be noted. Argus took out of his pocket two napkins, dirty, though they weren't needed clean, as he laid the two pair of shorts around his shoulders, almost folding them to become pad-like, though not too far to ruin their forms. 'Here it goes.' It was a rubbed, wet and soft with the help of some spit, as it went off immediately at his command. And, just a few more of those actions and he took out his hand. The cylinder started moving, surprisingly, on its own, after the wax that was blocking it came off. He hadn't noticed, though there was a steam vent that laid just above his head, having seen one before in the factory, he recognised the purpose it had. At the end a pair of rods, all tied together, like chimes or bells would start making a dire sound once enough steam came to be. Think that he already started, there seemed to be more parts clogged, either draining or blocking some parts from doing their jobs. Of them, he had to get rid off and do it quite fast, those people still had him gather stuff. 'I will have my fun before I will do your dirty work.' The voice hadn't travelled far enough to be heard, nor did it matter if it did. They would've sunk their heads into the ground, though now the cogs, large ones, almost colossal, laid across the span on the wall. Whatever the purpose, it must've been important and yet Argus didn't stop from reviving the device. The napkins soon fell as he cleaned the giant cog, smashes in-between the colossus of iron and his smaller sons. 'Fucker!' He yelled, though covered his mouth soon after, noticing that more steam travelled between the pressure plates. Again, he wasn't heard, though the amplitude of his voice was more than enough to give him away. Harsher did it get once the wind started spreading the steam around, and under, and in-between the cable-like wires that were twisted above the plates started being lit by a fire red, with sparks that laid between. There were plenty enough for the cracks to spread, as the machine was barely at the start. If it were slow, the giant cogs, now they started picking up both in speed and seemingly in size. Though that was only an illusion made by the steam rising up from under him. A few steps back were taken now as the moving platform under him revealed a stream of water that was placed in a straight line in front of him. It just laid there, being pumped about, never stopping and coming from a place from his unaware. Now Argus went away, jumping from pressure plate to pressure plate, trying no to trigger any sound, plenty more just laid there, and more and more, as the machine went on, others seemed to be lit, though not entirely. Powered by steam, interesting. Argus thought with a questioning look around. They still couldn't see him from above, though it was more than certainly that they heard it go on and still. 'What is that? What is he doing up there?' Two paths crossed as Boorut and Kin came to one another, silent but in speech, he said. 'He's going to alert any little and small beast from the dampest depths out there. I hope it was worth your investigation if it meant an exchange of our livelihood. If he lights up the entire place and started the refinery, you know what will happen after. Don't forget how I have known what had happened ever since.' A dance of steam soon became the main attraction, the stairs lifted, just barely held by chains. It seems as if there was another level inaccessible, not high enough to be an extra level on its own, but something just rightly above the floor. Not long ago it was almost covered by a blanket of moss and dusk crowds, though they have long been blown away by the sweet kiss of steam. And just after, so did the pair of stairs start raising themselves about, hovering in the air with the help of steam. 'Is everything going alright up there?' It was a voice that came from below, one that could belong to any single one of them, if it were indeed one of them, to begin with, though the voice was muffled by the pressure and the slicing of the chains. Now the temperature was rising hot, as was his temper when he answered. 'Well, I'm about to head above there and look for something you might like. I'm more than certain that there must be something there, something worth our time, or is it not the reason for you sending me here?' Prowling like a beast he waited, though made small steps. The two sharp, little pale moons just sat there and thought of it for a moment. Too long did they stay near one another to belong to anyone else other than the one who spent something on him, to begin with. 'Proceed.' He said, almost in an accent, as old as an engineer or the son of one. The ground shook and just above of him seemed to have fallen some of the dust and worms that freely used to roam. 'Did I do this?' Asked, though saw nothing else go on forth, other than the vibration that shook him seconds more. It wasn't now that he'd stop, looking just for the dark hole, standing in front of another, both of them appeared to be the same, the one from whence he came and the exit. It was much too obvious now, that as much as he judged, from both sides, he couldn't figure on his own, which one was the right path to take and the other. He needed them, and they'd not bring him with an empty hand. So up the stairs, without a fear, though they were heavy and wobbly, upon his feet reaching forth, he could feel them shake over the added weight. Argus got to be more irate, upon a burn, the sudden touch of the chain left a sudden deep pain that came to be. It left a feeling of pure anger deep inside, as he did so, the iron marbles connected upon one another, almost to the point where he could've fallen backwards if he hadn't chosen to go forth. 'Damn thing.' The steam had already almost boiled the chains, and it seemed as if it was only going to grow hotter than it was. A few steps forward and he looked back, then around. The entire area seemed to be now lit by a dark red, deep yellow, a silent bright pure green of emerald, and others gems that were now visible all around through the spaces in-between the plates. Some voices here and there, as their excitement, could only be read not heard. 'You've done it, you hear lads? My investigation already paid off in lots and lots of gems, more than your bags and your shirt can carry.' On the other side of the platform, Lin's voice ran even more freely as he was filled with greed unmet. After so much time of finding only shiny, close to being halfway rusted iron nails and screws, this was about to pay for more than enough, worth even more than the entirety of their attempts combined. There were tears in his eyes already, as he saw the reflection of bars, golden bars, long and engraved inside, from above to the bottom, sitting in a pile against two other. 'I can't believe my eyes, I must be a dreaming.' A shout followed Lin's voice as he'd be accounted forth on the next term. 'Don't get too greedy at it, for you see, everything you give and take will be accounted and shared according to the rules of our fair town. Do ye hear?' It was a piercing shout, that came to be, managing to follow and flow through vents, small pipes, anything with a hole and that was long enough to be heard. As well as he did it so, still they kept in mind. The beast, the beast, thought Loris, breathing heavily between the chamber and the antechamber that laid abandoned inside the wall. He gazed from where he stood, and it appeared to him that the darkness had eyes and peered into their darkness, boring through him like sharp needles. Though Argus was the only one who could do anything now, after looking around the smaller floor, a fence of metal, grim and pale, spiked by the side. This didn't appear like anything else that could've been made for a simple exploration, but for war, a place where resources could be taken from. Above him laid an empty blank spot, bore into stone like a hollow tower. Another one, he thought, though this one was directly set in stone. Chains held the fence and in front of him laid the main machine. Devices, long vents, levers that bore leather that could've been standing more than enough on the shoulders of a noble, a paddle, on the contrary, a few paddles, a chain device that seemed to be not working. It was a huge panel on which every part of the machine either stood or was connect to, and in return, two smaller panels laid thrown to the left and the right. Only levels and no buttons, chains that held and chains that were much more slender, not to mention part of the machine, outstretched more leather laid like a band, ready to be rolled. Argus tried, though too much time would be taken if it were for him to stand and wait to figure everything out on his own. Especially with the presence of a beast that could've come at any moment and stricken at him where he stood, a clear path could've only been taken, which would lead to him now. Some activity was present, as he figures only now, that what he saw and thought to be a clock wasn't. It was a small measurement for the pressure that he had seen before. Now, everything round which had tongues and points where numbers were laid had problems and would more than certainly go mad or on their own. Whatever he was about to start, he was caught on unaware after the first sudden step and the dragging of the lever to the bottom. There was a crackling sound, a metal disk which was carried from right above and thrust against a trail on the wall. It made its way, shining against both the fire and the glittering eyes that looked at it as it was on its way. Not sharp enough to decapitate, it caught The Gandum at unaware and managed to boil its newly found hat, barely cutting through the material, leaving the hat hanging by the side, almost as if it was the cap on a bottle. None knew what for was the disk, though it headed towards the door and stopped for a second. Turning, almost to a curve, it rolled around it, from above to below, lighting a couple of fires in a transparent box which laid above. Both the disk stopped as well as everyone from their march, as the door had finally moved and got stuck closed, from left to right. A burst of steam came, though it was headed through the giant tower hole above, it managed to almost get Argus. 'Damn thing almost got me.' 'Are you all right sir?' From below now, he stood looking at the small conundrum in which Argus stood, surprised as well. But for what? 'You were lucky that you sealed the right end, aye, the other side would've been our only exit, which would've let us locked with the beast to defend ourselves.' There was a glimpse of sadness as the small man, ant-like from how high Argus stood, looked as if he had been struck at a loss. Either the man lost something, or his wits were leaving him before he knew it. A damn shame, the machine stopped with a sudden sprok and a thronk, the chain was all turn on the wrong side, black and ashen by the ends of coal. Water needed to come into the basin, as that was a recognisable sign he knew too well and even the pair of stairs behind of him started receding back. 'What's going on up there, why have you stopped?' 'I don't know, but hang on down there, I'll return.' 'Very well, just keep doing what you're doing and we'll turn around and check on you from time to time I hope.' There wasn't any answer, though he went along, and looked just as a rough estimate, having sealed the way back, and their bags full he gave a whistle. Like ants to the queen they came, drawn like moths to the flame and carrying their jewels and what they came, for now, they suddenly appeared. All four of them, in a row, at the totem of dirt and metal scraps, still the light came. It was no mere than a stroll for Argus, and with this safety, now. 'Now, it's time to show me where to go, I believe I've made up for my share of the deal with what you've found and not to mention. This belongs to you.' With a squint of an eye, he gave the two shirts, barely outstretched, as they had laid on his shoulder, not enough for him to refuse. And it was to him as a profit, as Boorut didn't ask for what he's spent on it back, there was plenty more, double or quite triple the amount in his bag. 'Let's make it until dark.' 'If dark comes.' Though there was more than a smile there, he looked back one last time, a grim feeling being left, he'd have to most likely return if that machine still worked as well as the machines. 'With the four of them in the league, back into the dark, they plunged, whistling all around, looking straightly above, then below, then rightly in front of him. First, he thought they'd have only memorised the trail until it revealed the sudden drops of water, and opening, real opening through which light could be seen, moonlight to be more certain, and trees of green, tall with dirt. Some falling stones came, though he dodged immediately. 'Bloody bits, I hate them, it's been happening way too often for my comfort.' Said Loris, having a crack on his glass be spread across by the impact. Dirt accompanied and it was only getting worse now, he felt and shivered, with a grim thought. They hadn't recognised but a feeling haunted Argus for a while when he escaped, the others didn't and most likely came over with their plans to fruition. A better way, he would welcome, though now the best way of checking his sanity, if he wasn't delusional as of yet, was to feel at his waist and check for the teeth. 'Still there.' Muttered in silence. It wasn't going to take long, at the end of which, more green came, and spread around everywhere. 'Isn't this a problem?' 'Problem you ask? Hah, it's only a blessing, to have the cold and decent touch of the green plants growing underground. You know, when I was little, only moss used to grow in here and nothing else, and you must imagine just how old did that became.' 'Moss, moss, moss, that's the only thing that's on your mind, we get it. Don't pour it down his throat too.' The Gandum spoke, as dignified ended, his companions would soon reveal what they were talking about. 'The trees are about to sprout again, don't take any notice of him, he's still young and yet to understand.' 'What about trees? Like the ones I've seen before in those opening above our heads?' 'Aye, but taller and more grim and old, still growing and yet to grow even more and give birth to a third one.' The metal bits, as well as the jewellery, seemed to make clinking noises as he went on. There was an excitement that wasn't known to him about them, even before in the midst of the junkyard, there seemed to be something quite peculiar about the look in the man's eyes. 'Oh, you will more than certainly see and won't believe his eyes.' The rim was now visible and the edge of another gate through which he only needed to pass and perhaps get to their town. So did Argus think of it? Flowers and petals were soon blooming against the concave wall, rightly put, amber nodes and vessels pierced to what once used to be a stone. The outline, dark, could still be seen, as the bricks were once placed atop one another, now remained caught in the growth, lifted and snarled, entangled in the growing roots. It seemed that some tree became greedy with their growth as they grew no consideration of the surrounding area. They took what they wanted, needed, the vessels of amber, sources of water. 'There's the stream again.' Argus pointed at an opening in the wall, which was, most likely forced open by one of the ends which came out of the roots. Under it was a forged steel long path, made specifically for a stream of water to come in. 'I've seen it before in the large hall we've been.' 'Ah, yes.' Answered Gandum. He laid demoted, with his head bowed down, thinking about just how much further away it laid. 'It's nothing to be worrying about but, the water stream runs through everything, rightly from our town to the facilities and even to the trees. It's out lifeblood and what keeps our spines moving, even through these hard time.' There were some nods, now he approached Argus and stood right by him. His back was heavy and he seemed more wearily, and the glinting in the eyes made it just obvious. 'Let me then.' He took the bags and laid them on his side, carrying without a worry, our another eye on him. 'There's a debate about what do right now, you see, the water has shown signs of thinning out, and if it turns out to be true, we may be forced to cut the tree and its infant and let it die off.' 'I hope for your sake and the others that it won't get to that.' Boorut, be reasonable, you know what's best for your sons and the others, we can't risk and sacrifice their well-being for those things. 'Infant, trees, that combination didn't seem to ring rightly in his ears, especially after remembering what he'd encountered before. The edge came before they got the chance to expand the argument, revealing the stairs and a large hall for busy men and women. All working and smoking with puffs of white and dark, light coming from a clear opening from above, which was barred, though showed signed off, even more, people working above. Small people, tall people, those like him, other that weren't. 'You lied to me.' There he turned with a dark scornful glint, looking and boring his vision through them. Gandum stopped as well as well as the others but Boorut refused to do so without giving a sign of guilt. 'It's business, it's not that often that we get people coming from that tunnel up there, but it's only fair that we've assumed you're not one of the city folk.' 'So you lied to me to have your dirty work.' 'Indeed, though I can't lie, I'm more than fairly impressed by what you've accomplished and just how far you've got to. You sealed the beast, after all, so don't knock yourself too hard.' The man had already pushed out and lit a cigar. The brand was there, as obvious as it seemed, though he had failed to really look before. As he turned, the others seemed more clear, white shirts, dragged and held by long over hills of brown and black. They seemed like the business man, carrying from a side to another, wooden containers, wooden barrels, others of various sizes and appearances. It was clear nonetheless, the bottom of the barrel, where all the workers went and to be more precise. 'You're the ones making the cigarettes, I presume.' Past him, the other three already passed and went to the bottom, getting even further way than the average worker and past everything at hand. The fruits, there were some there, though too far for him to recognise and wonder at that. Back into the lair of the beast and from where he had to escape. 'So, you've heard of it, I presume. Strange, I wouldn't have taken you for a smoker.' 'Why?' Boorut nodded to some passing men, he must've been a figure of some kind, or at least have a form of authority over them, be it the smallest or as far as it could go. 'Why I've seen how you reacted over the steam, I swear, if anyone of us came up there with you, our lungs would've fallen over.' 'So I take it that all of you partake in? Including your son?' The arms were slightly moved above his head. They both went on the stairs, to the front of the action. Despite being lit, rightfully move, the shadows fell through the bars and it was clear, past the smokers, past the light, they were testing it, moving their hands. At least a root of some kind was stretched and pushed inside. 'You know, a lot of people depend on this type of tobacco right here and especially now. Hard times are all around and were you aware? Actually, I presume you weren't from the first reaction that we were real. You don't hear about our folk above there in the big city, though we're everywhere, more than everywhere. I mean our cities and factories run as deep and as far as the land goes, I might even say that we're the living veins of the heart of the land.' Now they were in the middle, Argus could look around and see the conveyer belts, two or three, long, carrying the unrefined cherries, striding along from one point to another. Those who worked around had their hands dirty, pieces near them, aprons that were brown, and at least one to mirror his position. They worked in pairs. 'And it goes quite well. Listen, I've seen what you can do and just how well you've handled yourself out there, hence I refused to call my muscle in. Business as we're calling it, I mean, no offence.' A woman approached, brown in her red cheeks, jet black hair and a grim look, being almost as sweaty as a pig. She waited for a second, looking at Argus who barely now took a notice of her. 'May I help you?' There was a shyness, a pain in his throat. A flash of red veins in bloody red, and a cage came to his mind, there was something that he had to ask now. 'The bags?' 'Oh, sorry.' He had forgotten about them all together, looking now at his empty hands while he wondered how long it was since when had he lost the feel. He gave the jewellery back and never looked again upon her. Back to business, yet again, as the Boorut still had something else to share with Argus before letting him go. 'Well now lad, since you now know just how the wheel spins, you may have to come with me. After all, I have promised you to show you the trees.' In the midst of the smoke and the soft whispers, he got a chance to hold his breath. The smell of that smoke still brought disgust to him, something indeed he has always hated, ever since a child. 'Was it a lie too, the trees? Should I presume.' 'You may indeed presume whatever you may like, but that alone I could never hide, nor will I, you see, the problem still runs on and on. There are two of them, but just not enough water from the source for either or any of us to go on to.' 'The machines?' 'A means to find another underground water source and to replace the old one. You may find it hard to believe but we're at the point where we exhausted it beyond any means of revival.' 'And you failed to find another one.' 'It's not over yet, but you saw it yourself, water is needed for water to be brought in. We got quite greedy and stuck in a loop.' 'Then why not ask from above? I've been there, almost lost myself in the maze, why not ask for water from there?' Though one thing was said, another one felt. Boorut didn't get to see it, though what Argus said couldn't be reflected in his eyes, not even close to it. A lie, dirty, though to the point, the man believed him. Nothing else Argus said or done lead him to believe otherwise, though reality remained still for a second. Evil, evil man, with no guilt for what he's done. He's just as vile as the rest of them, why should I feel so bitter about doing so? About abandoning them, or even. There was a glance, yet another mistake Boorut had done, he failed to look or take Argus serious for what he's been doing so far. His glance returned after going through the smokes, through darkness and past the gates, in the tall room and everywhere else. I must release the beast, Argus thought. He brushed right on and opened the door for Boorut, to the point where he put off the smoke. There was some class at least in him, even here, when they entered the field. Green, as far as he could tell. 'You've recreated fields? Here? How?' There was a shock in here and there, Argus himself haven't thought or seen anything like it, walls of stone and dirt squared off, hills that were sharp around the edges, though round and green around the top. If it weren't for the stones above the ceiling, he wouldn't have believed that they were still underground. Though it was certain that they were no longer in the facility. 'It's nothing of our own, unfortunately, just where we throw and get rid of our garbage.' It surprised him, especially since everything looked so clean and clearly taken care of. 'Green above the rubble, just go ahead and take some of it off.' This was a leap of faith, after starting to take the grass off and dig some of the dirt, it was revealed that in-between it laid a moulder of thrown stones and marks of green paint, metal, rusting and dirty rags. Even, through everything that laid there laid a hole, almost like a tunnel and seemingly something inside that peered at him. Before the glance on the skin and just how far it reached below and spread, the dirt started to stretch around the marks and covering everything up. Grass grew onto everything before the image of the growth came to be. 'And it grows right off, without a doubt or question asked. Is it not a marvel? Though it's not our creation as per say, it is for our use and ours alone. It's quite well, that lady fate had shone on us all to give us the means to stay in here and deal with our small problem of space and junk like this. You see, this was always a problem.' Boorut strolled and went on, as if it was nothing to him, going in a straight path, then around the bushes, just waiting for Argus to come near and follow him. After having reached the same level, he went on, though caught at an unaware. 'Where does everything lead to?' 'I do not know and do not care. As long as it just keeps taking, I will keep feeding this small branch of land.' 'Quite interesting that you've got everything all figured out. Or should I say everything but the water.' 'Indeed.' There was an evil smirk left on his face, at a level they started understanding one another. Both figured then, that there was more than a layer laying on each on them. 'Now, will you help me in this partnership of mine?' 'Will you let me decide once we're done with the grand tour?' 'Of course, I will, do not take me for one who's not up to his promises, and hear me now, I do owe you for those gems we've found."Why haven't you lit the machine yourself?Or with one of your underlings.You seem to have muscles and plenty to throw around."And yet, everyone falls afraid when it comes to the beast.It's quite a simple excuse or even explanation, but that's the truth.That's how it is sometimes, you've to go the wolves to throw the sheep around, but you can't send them to fight in the pits with lions."So it's a lion then, at the bottom of the ravine?"Bigger, stronger, faster, and everything more.Ferdinand, you've done plenty of jobs there, though there was a giant risky move, to manoeuvre the machine like that and close the only way it had here."And I presume your families were not attacked."Nay, though it did slow us down and mangled a couple of our most valuable employees.You see, it's quite hard to get good folk around here, let alone, pay for new machinery and new belts, to move around the working place."So it's much cheaper to let them get mangled if risk comes at hand.'The stones now crumbled under pressure, though it had nothing to do with the green system he had created.It was much more than that, he might've known, he must know.Argus could see now, truthfully asking him, seeing as the door behind was closed and no guard or anyone laid around.A risky move to be left alone with him, even though they were both standoffs familiar to one another.'Are you in league with them then?'Vague, but not enough that he'd not understand.It was now that the dark expression on his face grew a lot grimmer, the grey under the moustache becoming ash like, burnt to the bottom as he sniffed around.More wrinkles were visible, popping just now because of the stress.Argus continued, almost immediately, seeing just how much it took him to respond.'I'm talking about."I know who you're talking about."There was a silence that was needed and asked for by Boorut.He lifted his hand and covered his face with the adjacent one to take some of the sweat and brush it off the grass.'I presume that you're not just a dumb tall man who just found his way by accident here?"Not exactly.Though I must admit that I've been in league with them per say.'The words came to his ears like music to the blind.Almost with a jump, he sprouted closer, grabbing Argus by the ankles and soon after said.'Oh, my good man, you've got no idea just how much it pleases me to hear that.Some of them came just through a couple of hours ago and used the cable car to get through.'Cable car.'Where?"Whoa, whoa whoa, hold on a second now.'Suddenly, after brushing his hands now off his knees, as much as he used the material to wash off his sweat from his hands, he looked around.No one in sight, though Argus seemed to not give any threatening vibe whatsoever.'How can I know that you're in league with them then?"I know the names of the.'A bunch of names, titles went through his head at that moment, leaders, commanders, captains, revolutionary.Revolutionary, that seemed to ring the most in his head, leaders of the revolutionaries, masters of revolutionaries, heads, chiefs, administrators, and more.'The?'Boorut asked, tired of waiting. It was true that perhaps, he couldn't recall it.'Jane.'The first one kicked in immediately, she was almost as known as him, the man who accompanied her, the one with a gun.In his memory, his face was blank, dark, almost empty, wiped from his memory and his own reality.Jonathan, Argus, Agamemnon, Sam, Lenny, Burton, R. Barnabee, George S. Vanguard, he tried them all, forced into his mind and in that empty spot, that abyss in the headless man who dragged him along.'Yes, Jane, you know her, that's indeed quite interesting.'There was sweat for no reason, despite not feeling threatened by the man, he still had just enough to make his trip and make it for the door and he'd be caught.He resumed the walk before Boorut got the chance to ask again, without a second looking back, he sprinted, dashed, forced himself to go further away, and then stopped and looked back.'Are you coming?'Argus asked, covering his sweat with just another layer, only as a distraction, a cover up for his stress.He won't find it out, he cannot find it out, I must be sure he will not find out who I am and what I've done. There was a man that was dead because of Argus, and he knew well that this one, who was in league with the others wouldn't soon forget what was to come. 'Before you go, Ferdinand, one last question, before we resume the rest of our tour.' The man got his lips even wetter than before. There was something inside of Argus' mind that made him go, despite how much of a bad idea it now appeared as. As much as he wanted to think and believe that it was his idea to run away, it wasn't. Something wanted him to fail, for Boorut to go on and put the wolves on him. What was it? What did it be? 'Why does it feel like this when I'm here?' It felt so much more peculiar, so much worse than it had to be, it shouldn't have been like that, but it turned out to be. A betrayal of his own. And the question came, at a standoff between Boorut and Argus, in the middle of nowhere. 'What is the name of her husband? What is Jane's husband called?' It was clear who he was talking about, and the only thing Argus needed was the right combination of letters. Even now, in his mind, the same set of even happened for at least twenty or thirty, his lungs filled with air, breath slowed down, tackling the man to the ground and forcing him through the bottom of the floor where he'd sleep in the rubble, crushed by stones. But with each impulse, his feet were wearily planted, this was not meant to be. That was a path for someone else and what was left for him was to answer a simple question, or even more plain. To tell the name of the man who attempted to shoot him in the back, the reason why he was here now. 'Victor is his name.' Though he was wrong, in the end. 'I'm afraid you are wrong.' The realisation came much slower, even when Boorut, predictably turned around and walked slowly, knowing that Argus wasn't going to react. Whatever anger laid in Argus' eyes, not it had long passed away and vanished. The door slammed, and he regained for a moment, as he ran to the other side to check on the door and see if he could pass through. 'Plenty of time remains.' His voice seemed to be deeper than before, almost cave-like, having remembered even the number of steps they had taken. Boorut was a prideful man, still thinking of Argus just a dumb underling he could use, then tossed aside. He'd not call the other from the side of the room from which he came from. No, the light in his cigar died off, in the slight mist, when Argus' realisation died off, along with the light, he saw it perish to the bottom, falling through grass and dirt. On the other side, it was obvious that he took some extra seconds to lit up another cigar and cherish it for some seconds before going ahead. While doing so, Argus kept at it, safely right in front of him and tried his chances as the door. 'Locked. Damn lock.' There were at least two or three attempts to force it open, just to be sure that it wasn't just rusted or hardly joined. No, no, this couldn't be happening now, he's going to call the others and force me to go ahead back. It was more than certain, his intentions more than transparent, yet now, even while he was making his way there, no sweat was visible on Argus. He was both pale and calm at the same time, no hunger, no thirst and no other distraction, other than the view of the door which was now closed, the memory of the one which stood behind him. And, utmost, out of everything and every possible chance, the green field that spread across, almost out of his vision. He stopped below now. Boorut just started his leap, slowly, then getting faster with each step, until he'd reach his wolves. They heard it immediately, the command and knew exactly where Argus laid. They went past Boorut and kept going, much faster and clearly more alert than he had been. Two hands came to the bottom and started digging where Argus stood. Not enough space for someone with a bulky build, not to mention that the hole could've laid anywhere ranging from the entirety of the field. And to top it all, no evidence would've been left. The door slammed and both just came through and looked around. Like eagles, they scouted the area, and waited, smoke running now through between, a trail which only now dissipated and went away.'That man, find him, quickly now.'Said Boorut, as he came forth, looking just plainly and trying to judge where he went.It didn't come immediately, the thought of where he went, but there was something that would soon despoil the green land.A thump, the sound of it just reached a hard bottom, and Argus just threw a look ahead.It wasn't too clear in the dark, but someone had thrown a torch.Two stones, he found in his immediate vicinity, by feeling alone with his hands.Argus picked them up and ignited the torch, which was a risk on itself, if they heard or knew where he was, they'd only have to find another way and follow the source of light.Everything laid in ruin, thrown leaves upon dirt, stone, the growth of roots and plants.This was more than a dump spot, it was the point where they had abandoned everything they didn't need, but for another reason alone.The roots of the plants were long, even as he came near then, and walked just around, he saw that all of them were connected and cutting through metal and stone.Plants that were fed by anything and everything they could succour and everything worked in their favour.Everything but this.He could move freely, unbound, walking through without fear of being seen or smoked about.Clean air, despite seeming like a fantasy of some sort, if he tried looking through, and now he could not head back.That was more than clear, not only because he'd be found, but also since the path ahead now leads down.'What a turn.'Argus said, his sound slightly muffled, shuffled into leaves that feel from above.It was a ceiling made of metal and of leaves, roots, grass that came to the bottom layer, though sparked no meaning and no other thought.They were all too far away to be ignited, nor was there a chance for him to do so, even if he wanted to alert them.No, this was a worse situation than he believed, not only would there be a slope, getting more and more abruptly dangerous for him to go without a rope, but to where?He stood on his bottom for a second, knowing too well that they would most likely brush it off and go past the door, thinking he ran through and lockpicked it.Some marks intentionally left on the door knob, of which he made sure to leave some dirt behind, all around it and the point where the key would be inserted.It was either that they'd take the bait, or try to dig him up.Either way, he wasn't in any hurry, none at all, if it meant risking to fall into the Abyss and lived there dead and forgotten, without even realising if it was a fever dream or worse.His punishment for the crimes committed.'Two teeth remain now.What else is it to do?'They glittered into the torch, which was panned, left against a stony rock that laid just rightly near him.It was quite daunting for a moment to look at it like that, two teeth, they'd just go for a faint of a burst of flame, perhaps something even stronger if he decided to combine them.'It would be over soon.'The edges now seemed more than sharply aware of his thought, if they were simple, and barely dimmed into the dark, round around the edges, almost like the stretched teeth of a child, wore down by the long road he'd been on, now they were much more changed.Sharper, bent, almost like hooks that seemed to be stretching in front of his eyes, trying to get a hold of him, even while he laid in the process of deciding.'If I am dead, he cannot take me, not now, not after.This is where my freedom lays, from them, my brother, my.Friends.'The last part seemed to have had a stronger kick to it in the past.Now, it hadn't, it's been a while since he had someone around that stood for enough to call him a friend.The voices beyond the walls were so much more relatable.Even now, just above the torch, the hallowed spot left inside a root looked like a window, near which he could approach and listen.Without knowing what they looked like or said, without having to remember the worse part he's seen, only to hear and try to figure out what to do next.'We need to escape.I believe I was the one who said it then, perhaps not in that order, perhaps not to those people.Why was I brought there?Why was all this road connected to this place? Everyone refuses to answer my questions, they're all leaving me in the dark. Agh. A snarling terror came from the fire, which almost smote the tip of his beard. It managed to take his gaze off the doused vines as he stumbled closely on the downward slope. He was now heading down, whenever he wanted to do so or not. The torch was left behind and not only alone but also it was given a fair shot at the vines. Argus knew nothing and stumbled like a drunk man, seeing through a blue pale opening which left some light to come in from above. Only the highlights, blue as they were laid on the edges of the plants, left there to stay and guide Argus. 'I got you!' Came to his voice full of slight relief, it was already hard for him to go on like that that, left in the shimmering beyond. Voices from above came, as he passed on, and they were many, much more joined even by a left and a right, taken as he was guided by the blue overnight. The taste of the sea in his mouth reminded him just how much the time had passed, they were drops of water which fell from above. 'Just in time.' He said while letting it be open and drinking as much as he could. It has been a while, he thought, even more than he expected it to be like that, and to top it, it wasn't even full of salt as expected from the sea. But the water was below, the river, the underground was just around the corner, which he took and followed, now through a cooler atmosphere. Colder air, and by another curve, he saw a small opening, left through the roots. It was made by the hands of a man who came the same way he's come to. So obvious, the finger, the finger are there. Argus muttered to himself, looking now and seeing clouds, the same giant clouds, buffed nimbuses in the underground, in the same area from which the grass grew back. Could there be? While asking, now he knelt to the bottom and looked above, and fairly, over the sky and clouds laid the stones there too, hidden by the mists and the clouds that had managed to grow even thicker and grow higher. 'What are you hiding Boorut?' Quite well, the man had done for himself, now Argus pondered. He failed to see the magnificence of it but managed to see past it somehow and now wondered. 'Why all this and for what reason?' The hole was just far and wide enough for him to stick his nose and take a sniff, one or two, perhaps a few more than intended. It must've been the altitude, which meant it went even deeper, but there was no doubt about it, they managed to cover the smoke coming out of the cigars to clouds and nimbuses. A coughing feat came to his face, it was clearly having the same poisoned effect on him, even though he tried to defend himself from it. Not even his hands could defend what had already entered his lungs and started an attack. Argus could only turn around and see the skeleton left there, a helmet made of leather on him, his bones were dry, it could've been a man or a woman, middle aged or perhaps younger than that, but fit with an uneven fate. To die here and be forgotten, let alone to suffer in the dark. If there was an escape, it wasn't here. 'I don't suppose you'll need this anymore.' As he untied the small bolts that held the helmet together around the skull and pulled it away, it was obvious that it must've been almost suffocating the poor thing whilst being alive. 'It's all right, you can breathe freely now.' But the jaw dropped and the neck cracked and fell down along the dust. There was a thick leather suit that was let and blue overalls, just as the light that came from behind. 'You were the one who dug out the hole. Without you, I would've never managed to find out where I am.' Which also means that I'm more than aware of where I can go. It was clear, that somewhere just ahead laid a small room, made of wood, clean, with many of books, just hiding in the set of underground towers. And elevator perhaps. 'Everything seems to mirror reality in the dreams I've had. Even you.' Looking at it, the helmet seemed wider, the bolts and the small band that held it together reminded him of the small bag he carried along. Some were stretched, others were not, but his initial goal didn't seem to die off. 'Off I go now.' And his head was no longer cold, he felt fine dwelling in. And just above, the search went on. 'Find him, I want him found and tied and fed off and set to the dogs to carry hard weight. Do you hear me? Immediately!' It was a tall man, black hair, a moustache that overlapped a beard and accompanied by a frown. There was something crooked about his long teeth and the way he looked at his surroundings but he did more than fine for himself. A third belt laid on his fat belly and his furry cloak. 'Captain of the guards, sir, I've just responded to the other guards and just sent them forward with the orders.' He was standing just fine in front of Boorut, playing with his moustache and dreams of advancement. The only one in the room who wasn't smoking at the moment, two giant cylindric forms covered by metal bands and rubber lips, were pulled right near him, almost crying to be turned some more. It made everything he said quite hard to hear and understand, though his superior didn't need much to read his lips. 'Well? Are you going to join them or not? I'm not paying you to stand around and recite me what I've clearly instructed you to do.' 'Yes sir, immediately.' The pairs of tall and short just stopped ahead, while, at the same time, so did the machines. 'Shh, turn the combines on again.' Whispered a voice, and rightly, just as it was said, the machine started again, going up, then down, laid vertically, it resumed its pumping, just as everyone else resumed their work once Boorut caught a glimpse at what they were doing. It was a painfully awkward moment for all of them, especially since they all knew something bad was happening, and he was in a worse mood than ever before. None of them expected less from him, even if he remained their boss. Deceitful, manipulative, even of his own son, now Boorut was returning to his emporium. The heart of the city, the town, the underground kingdom his ancestors build, now laid, past everything he had created for the harvest. The gates beyond the room were almost giant like and they needed to be opened by at least two or three who came closer before hand and grasped and pulled and didn't throw a dark glimpse at him. Normally, the guards and the employees of the other would be required to take the back doors, the side doors and get through by any other mean than him. And Boorut did it without a shame, making them work extra hard for it, to be done on point and immediately at it. It was hard work, though they opened it, leaving the rest to cower under the strong light. The round hall was enormous, almost at the level of a damn foyer in the city just above. Not much of it did it help, the fact that the two trees stood like towers, mirroring one another, white, green, pale with brown leaves and the cherries just growing at a constant rate. And another cigar was unlit, he threw it right away, and it was picked up from the ground just as such. 'No smoking in here.' 'I know.' Despite being in command, even he abided to the tall guards, clad in armour, stretched and sharpened metal, like long axes of steel and silver, runes spread across. One wouldn't even think of finding such armours here and now, yet they appeared from nowhere, only to guard the trees. Two at the iron gate and two across the split set of stairs, one across each end, standing just right, and across the circle a total of eight standing mirroring one another. The last two were almost closely invisible, walking only in the dark under the leaves, stalking and preying under the stars in the night. And indeed there was, just round now, as light from above faded, furnaces and cigars unlit, the lids were covered, the ends from which light came closed on their own. 'Shh. Three trees are sleeping.' Said a multitude of voices, and it was just the time that the others went on their breaks and at the end of the shift. 'If it.' 'Shh.' The closest guard whispered to Boorut, a silencing roar, a menacing tallness that made him look like a tower, rather than a man if a man indeed stood inside. They were nothing alike his wolves, no break, not at day, not at night, not stuttering at times, though the only thing that made him uncomfortable remained, other than their ever growing presence that they did not tire. Soon he was left alone with the guards who all resumed their standing and watchfulness. Swords and axes laid in sheaths on their sides, along with sheath and a curved one, both of which had metal handles seemingly from the same material. Boorut kept walking and staring with his wicked glances, right past them. It would take a good while for his presence to leave the place as he was reminded that it was indeed a large hall. A few breaks were plainly required, and luckily for him, seated like blades in sheaths, he laid some bread inside a pair of napkins that were crosshatched for protection. Though eating there alone made him uncomfortable, he still laid aware, looking around and hearing nothing but the disturbing silence, he remembered. It was at least when he was a child and his people stood there, just having discovered it. 'Papa.' A voice rang in his head, though it wasn't his father, he stood along his parents after everyone entered the hall. 'Hold' There laid two guards, the same one perhaps, exactly as described by the writings of the first people who dwelled inside the caverns. It took only a few moments for them to release the first interlopers from their grasp. 'I have the seal of my great-great-ancestor! It is here.' Boorut recited it as if it was a holy text, whispering it in the dark once the bread took some of its effects. Quite arousing in a way, as the bread was deeply sunk into the water of the tree. Known to less of the effect or from where it came, it was indeed a delicacy in the world above, sweet bread that had enough it into arouse even the biggest oak, to the smallest squirrel that came inside of it. Yet, he said it as he remembered, once again, thought this time, not in his memory. 'I got the seal of my great-great-ancestor! It's here. Take it!' And the arms were laid low, as for the fangs, lowered as well. They went on their knees immediately, as if presented a coin by royalty. The others from below, despite being roughly aroused by the situation, soon released and stood silently in the watch. No word was said but they were welcomed. 'Indeed, kneel and release your weapons. Right now, off with them.' The sound they made echoed in a hall that laid covered in dust and haunted by silence. Other than the trees, there still laid an eeriness that tried taking jabs at them. Small insects, small desires, an empty broken glass and distractions that laid, trying to catch them at unawares. It came as no surprise though that they wanted more of it, the feeling of being in power. 'Ludwig von Boldag, keep that in mind when referring to me, for I alone am the master of the seal and what our ancestors. Your masters created.' 'That's madness, to call yourself.' 'Seize him now before he touches me.' Despite being knelt and to the bottom, the lifeless suit moved with a swiftness that was unknown to one who had waited for hundreds of years in the dark. Indeed, it was more than expected as it grabbed the man before he could jump and attack. He had a knife, though, despite his best attempt, it bent and cracked as it was swung against the armour. 'No dent, but. But, how?' The man couldn't ask now, as he was thrown in terror, immediately his hand was broken by a quick stretch that sends a shiver through his arm. Soon that shiver spread through the bone and his entire arm, up to the ribs cracked, then came the spine. The gurgling of terror was horrible, to watch by the explorers in the back, and even worse for those who laid in the dark and couldn't see what was going on. Those who were the closest in the row managed to hear as well as see the spine getting smashed as well as a part of it outside of the body, broken and left close to the floor. The blade was also shattered just before the shards slowly fell and bounced near his body. Despair fell on them, but there wasn't any cry of fear or pain, but obedience. The man stood there, just looking at them with a glimpse in his eyes. 'Pick up your weapons.' Now echoed in the hall. Before they could protest, Bjoormund, a white-haired man, tall and heavy stretched his arms to stop the others from advancing forth. Though they were afraid, it was clear that they were confronted by a madman now. Bjoormund asked while pushing his son further behind. 'What do you intend on doing with that?"The insignia, run as it were, stood between them and the armoured guards who were under his command.He grinned."Then he grinned.'Finished Boorut, at least for a while.It was going to be a long night and the memories were fading away as he made it on the other side, closer to the passage and into his room.A small desk, not fits for one such as himself, though there were no alternatives, as this wasn't meant to have them living inside.Smaller, it was his bed, as he strolled inside, same old robes waited, slightly warm, and warmer still to become.It was intentionally left wet, so he thought, it would be easier to find out just how much warmer will it get.The water which ran around them, through the walls and ceiling, at the bottom and everywhere else kept everything cool, and something was heating it up.The profits were doomed to die at the end of the flame, and even worse than that, the guards, who know how they would react to such news and what they'd do.One thing still disturbed Boorut then, leaving that man Ferdinand get away and roam everywhere.He knew they all did see his bloody hands then, and it was present once again on the stained rag filled with jewels, they all saw just how bloody his hands were.They'd look more thoroughly after the night was gone, but as for now, even Boorut wondered why he decided to trust the man.A tall dark man who popped in then popped out as if it was nothing for him, sealing the entrance, free of fear, blood and a dark gloom present in his eyes.Such thought only made him more tired, up until he gave in and fell asleep, closing both lids and worrying no longer.He was safe, the door was closed, and no lockpicker could get through, of that he was more than sure.The beast was far away as well, stuck inside, blocked, sleeping as well.It was just as silent on the other side, where two girls were walking, not touched by the weariness of the journey but lost, lost, ever lost in the depths.The way out was no more, the sound of snoring coming out from the cavern was deep, dark and treacherous.Both, again were silent, trying to not disturb what laid just further away from their zone of comfort.Plotting came still.'How do we get out then?Our sister is still waiting?'I've told you already, Vivian, I'm not sure.That tunnel leads to nowhere and the mouth through which we've gone through has long been gone.I've told him not to get through there.'Her sister was yet again in the mood for crying, yet she remained almost abstinent from it, afraid it would arouse whatever laid with them.'We've barely escaped those winged rocks and still, they might dwell there awake, if the old man hadn't already gone, just like that.'She paused, knowing that if she were to open her mouth even wider and for longer, she'd only fall under dark speech, proud and evil, like the man who dragged them there.'We know all the tricks.'Said Ann, looking just around the rock, and by the shadow, seeing the figure laying on the ground.It was hard to tell just how tall it truly was, but then again, she'd not cross the sea of marble, it'd make too much noise for either of them to get out.'We know all the tricks and turns and devices abandoned here, we just need to find the levers hidden in the stone.Just hold on a little longer.'"But I'm tired and.'Vivian could barely hold still, breathing through the harsh dense air, cold and uncovered by no blanket.It was just as hard for her to stay as much it was for her sister to take care of her.Burden, she thought, I couldn't be called anything other than that.Both were hurt and have bled more than enough, yet the beast remained sleeping and unaroused.'Keep covering it with the dirt, I've got a bad feeling that if it wakes up and follows the trail.'A look was thrown up and down, her sister couldn't keep covering herself in layers of dirt anymore, they'd only be taken away and washed by a layer of blood.So on and so forth.Dirt hands came upon the wall, going up and down, all around the place.From time to time, she'd get closer only to leave a warm breath on the wall and try to reveal, any outline, any crack, there had to be something, even in the dark.But both were tired and slept away, against boxes and on the hay that laid abandoned by whoever laid around. For them, barely now came the night, past them, just above, through stone and further through stone, they were looked for. It was a small community, though it had been too late. Two girls were missing and a mysterious figure broke through. Hours ago, perhaps more than the normal amount wanted, there had been a meeting of eleven inspectors of some sort, three guards and a captain, all baffled by what they've found. It was broken and cut through a cabinet and a secret entrance that was soon discovered and planned to be investigated. 'From the looks of it, there was a fight, and a struggle, something a lot worse. Though there are no signs left to signal or give us a clue whenever or not two children were taken away and dragged there.' 'We cannot exclude that though.' It would take a lot more than some mere inspectors to get the approval and get someone to go through. And even more obvious it remained for the guards to know that there was no possible way to legally and off the papers go himself down there with nothing else than a lamp. Yet others seemed to be turning their backs and nodded right away. None were heartless, at least not as such as they appeared to be, claiming still some decent as they turned just seconds before. Only one of them stood near him, reading off his metal trinket, the name written in a tongue, just like they used to do it in the past. 'Malcolm.' The old inspector read it was the name of a middle-aged man, strong, and perhaps in his prime. Even the clothes he was wearing seemed to be more than his older and much wearisome comrades, a perfect fit for the task. 'You understand that this must remain between and only between these ears and these eyes.' That behind, which had nothing to do with it, turned their backs as well, standing by the door, like guards at a treasury, listening with both their ears and their eyes. Whoever came near the door and decided to eavesdrop at the door would only be greeted by the slamming of the door, which did more than grant a reputation to the people from below. Bad habits spread quite fast around them, almost as fast as the thought and speech of the deed. And Malcolm knew better than the rest what it meant, he'd be called disappeared at least two days after he set down there, and perhaps even suspected of kidnapping them alone. 'It's a risk worth taking.' 'Who could say any more different than him or deny his chance? He set out immediately, as he jumped, seeing how the shelf was cut in half, water just below, and alcohol just running in. It's scent was obvious, but so was the one of skin, luckily for him he took the lamp and set forth looking for two girls and perhaps something more. Though night had to come nonetheless hours later, which they all knew, doors closed, everyone left for the time being, and below ran one of their agents, running without a break, pushing the limits to find the missing girls. Even further, to the highest of peaks, it was just moments when they arrived, still in the nick of time, just before Argus had gone and landed where he laid. 'Damn it. We've lost another one.' Said a man in muffled speech, stopping their tracks so they'd notice. It was somewhat a mystery that one of them escaped without a notice, popping out of existence and with another one lost in the great tunnels, it already seemed so much shallow. He nodded nonetheless and they continued, going through. There laid a bell at the top of the door, which already rang. It was quite difficult to go through the maze and waste no time, and already they came at a loss. The first thing though, the man leading the small group looked at the clock. 'There's still time.' Said the creaking in the soundless cloak covering him. The smoke that was around the emporium already took some of its effects. Old robes, which they wore now turned into the coloured, pale, protection grabs which they first equipped. The emporium owner knew well who they were and what they were coming for. The others that had nothing to do with it turned blind eyes to them, while the bolder ones who were even more distant than the others turned even a much further eye from it. Word spread fast everywhere and this had no excuse for it, dangerous, dangerous people, managing to twist and destroy, it was long now, until they'd get to the leaders and take over the city, and yet they remained unknown. The emporium had appeared small from outside, though from inside it appeared to be a fortress inside a mountain, all brands, all sides, different doses of cigars, all laid from every possible angle for every kind of man. Tall, dark, old, young, even non-smoker, lady, queen, or even revolutionary, it was all given and asked for, in return which it builds what could be closely called an empire. The front operator strode to the side and opened a small door. A pair of Five or six came through if his eyes didn't deceive him now. "Weren't you supposed to be more?" Though it was answered with silence, cold, cold silence that was only warmed up by the rising smoke from those cigars that were lit inside. It had rained earlier, though now they were dry, coming even further inside. He opened the door for them and gave them only the slightest instructions. 'You take the front, the keep going down the stairs, take the first two rights and open the first door you see. It has a red mark and two hands on it, painted with purpose and on top of it red. After that, keep strolling forward and take it to the east until you'll get to a pair of eight doors.' When they got there, they found themselves sitting in a room which had eight doors, all lined in an arc, having the same appearance but for some runes written on each on them. 'When you get there, take the third on your right and open it. You're going to have to go one at a time to get in further, and tell the password.' Of course, the password wasn't said out loud, though they had somewhat of a reputation, they were dealing with dangerous men and women, against which ears would just attempt to listen and grasp at what they were trying to say. Hence, all was spoken before, the information given just freely before. 'Ilyiabad.' And the door opened, though there was no time for each of them to go one by one. A moustached man, darkly tempered opened the door for a line of people who forced themselves to go further without a sound or glimpse from him. Already, a few steps inside and they were close to the heart of the emporium, well, perhaps more like its throat. Still, a working hour, the man behind being mad at it, though there was nothing else he could do but file the papers, no signature this time. They were expected, so it was even less than he could do but turn, like others did before him, a blind eye. Just another added to the pile. If they were just slightly slower to appease the passing of the time, they would've met Argus, though, in the end, they did not. As they made their way, just to another guide, who brought them further away, past the two bridges and the tower which was bent just downwards. They passed through rock which appeared to be dark and sharp, close to appearing more like black metal than rock, and after a rest at the closest inn which laid in operation, they continued. Indeed, they have dug a lot more in the bottom than expected. If one were to come from above with no knowledge of the place, he may get the impression that it's just another wing of the city, for the architecture resembled, to the point that it was not a mere coincidence that they were so much alike. Stolen, most likely, taken away during the original construction phase, parts of the buildings, merely painted so they wouldn't appear to be much alike. Broken windows or completely removed, for it did not ever rain. It went so deep, and on a slope, that it appeared as if there was an avalanche or an earthquake which swallowed and remained in the process of devouring the city ever since. And all was kept in secrecy for the people there didn't leave the place. Hence eyes were almost always stricken on those people dressed in their armoured clothes, hiding their faces and what they were doing. 'Mother, the bad people are back.' Augustus, watch your tongue. 'Children would be soon taken behind and hid, the parents knew what those people were doing and why. For there once was another great manor, taller than others, just as well as the ancestors who lived inside of it died and made way for the next generations to live in, so did theirs do the otherwise. The revolutionary blood ran along and crept in their veins, up the tallest ladder, the tallest spiked tower bent by metal and forged in stone, then coming to the bottom of them all. All was done under the veil of their will, and so was the community created and hid away. Back to the emporium, their task was the most important to the core, it was the point which took to their two worlds, for even the guards, the captains and their military power turned a blind eye if it means dealing with their addiction. Soon, it was to become even closer, even better, for the bread managed to take their desire of sweet away, the smoke their breath. No longer would it take that they'd discover, how to bottle the very essence of the trees, and with it, the very essence of addiction. Below, the little man stood sleeping, in his mind a dark dream. He saw the bottom, down to the roots, up to the city, all broken in an upwards growing scar. From it, the essence would spread like blood and from the bottom, on the throne of grass and rotting trees, he'd stand ruling over them all. Watching the sun shine over his jewels, covered in a cloak made out of the beast, where they'd pay tribute and worship him like a god. So were his dark dreams, to push them beyond being able to think for themselves. 'Just a little more.' Spoken in a dream. Yet despite this and all of his efforts to push the products, all was quite above, even further away, where horses ran on hills, grass grew still and nothing even appeared as if it had happened there. No traces, no words, it was almost as if it hadn't existed, to begin with, such a mansion, such an old structure that was meant to be tamed, now lost. Just like Argus and the cage. 'Cage.' Awakened, he looked around and saw the light still coming through from the spot he just found. It's been a while since he went on and returned, though the night passed quickly. The bones were dry, but the material on in felt soft, enough for the feeling of a cushion to be taken in effect. Only a night was needed for him to be rested as he decided to go on and around. There laid a door, covered in roots and what not just waiting around the corner. He had felt it a night before when he had decided to wait before trying to figure out what laid on the other side. Some chains were held on each side, and since there was no handle on which the door could be opened from, it was obvious what the mechanism did. They'd have to be pulled manually before he could go on the other side of it. It was just enough that they most likely stopped looking for him, even with the obvious spot and his disappearance left no track nor any witness, he manages to do it. Luckily too, there were just enough meters of rubble and of dirt between him and the closest human being, so none would get to hear his struggle. And it took a while and just enough an effort to go through and pull the door open. The light came from there, and it seemed to be a room. A clear floor to the bottom, polished as it seemed, which only came as a surprise as he saw it come in contrast with the dust he was one, the grey and his brown boots, covered in another shade of a pale brown. His breathing slowed as he went on, they seemed to work in unison, on one side, where he could suddenly pull with a lot more ease, the opposite happened on the opposite side. They changed on each side and when he missed moving one at the right moment, the door suddenly received back and fell on its own. 'No, no, no, no no. Go back, go back.' 'Argus' muscles became denser, twitched and twisted, moving with sluggishness before pulling it back normally. The door stopped and then resumed being opened as he first came close to it. Now, as more attention was set on the timing it had, the door loomed over his shoulders and up the top, it came. There was nothing but a small door, just deep enough to let a door on its side. Above, the door which barely opened now started moving to the bottom, hoping to close itself before anyone could enter. 'Not yet.' With half of foot inside, he reached for the second door and tried opening it. 'Locked.' Argus muttered as he stepped back outside. The chains were now moving on their own, the door seemed too heavy to close as of yet and it was already getting more than uncomfortable for him to stay. Immediately after, the light was gone, slowly receding from Argus' face. Though it didn't stop there, as the entire weight just slammed and broken the very dirt upon which he stood, hindering his access from above, he fell. Not large enough of a chasm, it was just where the door would've to lead him. The staircase was just in front of him, leading to the top side in a twisted spiral, visible to him and to him alone. No bones broke, no joints tamed, he looked around to see if the skin was all right, which indeed turned out to be well. The chains were dragged even there and to the bottom, where he saw three boxes which held the mechanisms, two for dragging and pulling, and one above. That's what broke the dirt and trapped him there. No way to turn back, as he turned and saw just how abruptly high the edge was, and the impossibility of stone if he even tried lifting himself further above. It was a trap, that was well known even from the beginning, though just how much deeper, he couldn't have known. No structure anymore laid forward and it was clear, that the path ahead was dug up by something large. A lantern and a note. Both were taken, the lantern lit up and used, it was something old, lit only by a flint and tinder which he took out of his pocket. When did? It was a shimmering glint of confusion, which brought him to the realisation that these were not his pants. At least an extra size and tight on the ankles, even the area near his knees remained slightly strangled under his glance. The slight change of colour, maple red, now brown, even was was off, not to mention the lack of evidence of being forced to take them on. Though when did it happen? The teeth. For a second, he pulled them further and checked if they were still tucked there. Two laid still, tied around his waist by a small strand of leather. Now it came, the time for him to remember, they kept the same colour and shape when he took the teeth out, and same as when he met those two. A trivial fact, though it took some of the stress, especially when he saw the light. The one coming from above just vanished some time ago, or at least there laid the cut off the candle, all used and abandoned. The writing was at least dirty, and the marks of ink were stricken and left. It read just as it was written. 'I won't waste any more time than I have had to bargain for my safe travel. You know who you are, as well as I do, hence you'll be the only one who managed to pull it off. The machine won't respond to any other, not will it give you another chance once you enter its domain, I know it's hard for you to understand. Especially now, since, we're both in the same boiling pot, but. You mustn't trust anyone here, don't trust anything they've said or done. Do not get pulled or listen to them and don't forget for any second, they are not humans, hence they're not to be treated as such. I don't doubt that you trust me, but we've met each other before. Pull it from the bottom now.' From below the table, covered in an old obscured cloak, laid an inking machine. Quite heavy for its size, it was pulled nonetheless and laid on top of the table. The metal case and its squarish appeal had something close to him, though it seemed to have malfunctioned. No wonder why, from the point where he wrote. 'Pull it from the bottom now.' It seemed hand written rather than preset words, scribbled from the device. Back to the note, Argus thought. 'You must go inside and take another ink replacement cube from the cabinet laying exactly one hundred and forty-five feet in front, twenty to the left, eight to the right, then move into an arc ten feet to the centre until you'll find a ring of holes. This may get confusing but you must do it nonetheless. Out of twenty holes, only one is right, though they're all identical, and it may appear almost like an unsolvable puzzle, the trick of the matter is that all of them have an angle which leaves you just enough to see the edges of the bricks of the side. All of them appear the same, all but for one which had a silver edged in a corner, revealing it to be the true one along with all the fakes. Follow it to the bottom and take the ink case, you may take the note with you and use it as you will.' The last words written were close to being read as.'There will be no need for water, food or sleep anymore.You've almost made it.Do not worry about messing up your steps, I have made sure that your foot size.'Is exactly ten point five inches.It felt peculiar already, though it seemed to have brought something close to a closure he hadn't felt before.Now, all that remained was to follow, through the mist it appeared as he was going through ancient halls, rooted, at least the parts through which the green corruption came through and spread.It was too long, he knew, even since he saw the symbol, that he'd get to see everything is twisted.Root became skin in the mist, pulsating and spreading, rubbing itself, almost in a cephalic and erect form against the stone.It turned out to be nothing like it even after, cutting itself, releasing something from its inner bowels.Stopped at it, he couldn't help but stare at it and just how many meat barnacles formed inside.Water pouches formed, popping out from the skin, to only be filled with blood and other chemicals, only now he could look somewhere else.Scratching at his neck and trying to pull as hard as he could, Argus stood there and forgot, looking before him, seeing no dirt at the bottom just mist.'How many steps have I pressed?How many steps?How-how-how?'The words that came after, not even he could recognise then.'Ilyiamar Bayazin Aaayara vathur Bahaleshks Makar Kaj, Kaj.'Out of which, the most bitter word, he felt out comign out of his mouth remained Kaj.Speech altered under his nose, an empty feeling called him home, though when turned and have the chance, Argus failed to see any way that leads behind towards an escape.The mist was thick and it was too hard to see, with at least a couple of paths and roads to take, he was truly lost now.So were the not, now of which he realised the mistake.It had taken hold of the fire, though he threw the lamp immediately.No need for it anymore, as everything else was light by a grey light, the forms were illuminating the room just as well with a thick red that was slowly spreading.'It was a mistake to come here, but I've no chance anymore.'While declaring that he had nothing else to do and lose, he grabbed a pick from his hidden pocket and wielded the tooth in his right hand, ready to stab or use it as a javelin if need come by.Argus knelt and slowly prowled on the bottom and kept walking like that for a while, at least until the closest barnacle could be felt as stepped upon.'The infection's spreading on the ground.'Came as muttered, under his unholy breath, a look of disgust quickly following after him.Something laid near the corner of his eyes, almost always escaping his glance and view when looked out for.'Where are you?Show yourself!'Lifted and standing tall, he looked as far as he could to find out nothing.Still, the weapon laid in his hand and it didn't appear that this was just deep enough.The chasm, as the way that was forged in front of him, was still headed even deeper below, going still on a slope.Whatever they dug or tried doing, the way they made for themselves left a bitter feeling.Though Argus managed to avoid, touching the large, oily tentacle-like cut formations, and the bits that fell off once they managed to have deep cuts inside themselves.It reeked of death and of boiled fish beyond the limit, the same could be said about the floor.The water that was barely there, and barely visible in the mist reminded him of which he had almost forgotten.And the creek returned just as well.Like a shadow now, in an arc, he turned and waited against the wall, waited to have a look on who it was.No hole in the wall, no instructions to go on, but the dark creaking sounds of wheels made it seem like it was there, haunting his dreams and nightmares from inside.And the silence could've been a release if it was there, though, in the end, it was not.The tentacle still boiled itself and dropped barnacles into the water.It wasn't too much until it would spread across, block his access from outside and take his life.It was obvious, even if it turned out not to be as true and real as it seemed, he could die of a stroke if he wasn't too careful and over did himself.With a dark glance, he took as much of the poisoned mist inside his lungs and ran ahead, looking at every side, going into as much of a direction as he could fathom. Now he stopped, just in time to avoid falling into a hole. Many of them seemed to be laying not too far from one another, some even adjacent, all had stairs. 'What was it?' Argus asked himself, thinking of the note he's lost if those were true holes, to begin with, as the man said not to go away from the path. Not even his example was known or the riddle, or the answer, or anything that could point where the real hole was. He examined them closely, holding the tooth just above when he fell closer to the ground. First, two adjacent holes looked and appeared to be the same, exactly from every brick, to the moss that grew and the jagged teeth that laid around. 'This isn't supposed to be here.' They weren't, as it turned out, the barnacles spread and in between so did the growth of tumour until they reached the holes. Before he could turn his sight back, he saw that there wasn't any moss or bricks anymore, just the meat inside the stomach, which it promptly became. Acid left a stank as it filled itself from the bottom. If it seemed like the grey light hit the bottom of a well like a tower, now everything seemed to be slowly dissolving at the bottom. 'I can't back away now.' Said Argus in distress. As he looked around, in front of his eyes, it was already spreading and twisting stone, eating the moss and growing. It was a shallow work which only brought him closer to despair, yet he didn't give up and tried as hard as he could to go past it. Next three, then-then four and two, all of which appeared the same, until the growth spread and covered them up as fast as it could. Yet his feet were avoided at any cost, not even his smallest toe was approached. It wanted to prevent him. And it would've succeeded, in the dark, though the grey light finally took its toll and something shiny could be seen from afar. It was the glittering and shimmering silver edge as the top of a hole, at which he ran and jumped through, without a regard of how deep it was or what it would've happened if he broke his legs down there. Just as fast as he passed eight holes wide, in front of his knees, he jolted and shouted. 'Aaaaagh.' Before stopping himself with the forearm against the wall, two legs slightly set on the twisted staircase and nothing else that could've prevented him from walking. He pushed himself with the forearm before going down as fast and far as he could reach, then stopped at the door. Now there was a need for both of his hands, which he used promptly and returned to doing what had to be done. It was a small room that wasn't locked, with only enough space for three large cabinets. All that laid there were just many boxes that hand long film-like bands coming out of them, bent and stretched filled with ink. Obviously broken, though it was even more obvious that he need to find one working if he ever wanted to return towards where the note said. Within the first broken box, he managed to find a few empty bottles, aligned as if in a cartridge, all connected with small straws that now laid empty and dry. The ink had been there, though now nothing that would even resemble it, other than the marks around the ends of the black iron straws and the needles at their ends. One had to be left intact, or at least have some ink left inside. Such was his process of thinking, though, now it was ignored. No longer did he attempt to figure out a clever way, but search desperately for a locked box before it was too late and the infection spread down here with him. 'Locked, locked, empty, empty, broken, this has nothing inside.' He shook the cabinets and covered his hands, feeling the boxes fall and damage his bones as he cowered in fear of the pain. At least twenty fell and almost buried him, though it was by sheer luck that they were the ones which were located tallest in the reign. 'Empty!' He yelled after going on again. They formed small ordered mazes and towers when falling onto one another, though the towers were bent and hinged onto one side, as well as the mazes had no exits nor entrance. Yet all seemed broken, and he was ready to fall in despair, he threw they ones he didn't seem fit, sweat just took over hands. And now they were black and blue, covered by the rubbing of their opened lids. It was already tiresome to go on like that, though he hadn't given up hope as of yet. And with a sudden glance, and a grapple he found one, locked as tightly, clean as new, though it was not the time for celebration. 'Alas!' He yelled and turned, going up and around the stairs in a hurry. The edges above were bloody red and it seemed as if something was just gurgling about between the open spaces in-between the bricks. A tumour was about to erupt, spread and grow even tighter than before, at a faster rate than expected. Not fast enough as he sprinted and leapt in the air, just shimmeringly about, a few steps at least from the hole which popped its long twisted teeth. There wasn't going to be an ink supply anymore, and from the bottom, he could see the acid filling it, though its colour was dark and blue, just as the inkling. Small worms it bore, and it was obvious that every sprouting hole had them inside at the bottom of the murky acid. There laid the way back and the skin was just as repulsed by him as he was of it. The skin of the teeth seemed to be as bulked as a pillow, trembling upon his approach. Quite interactive, though he was in a hurry and fled away from the scene as fast as he could, without even find the ghost of a note he thought would've been there. And then, back into the mist. And back to the gurgling beast, back on the hunt, it went, awakened, though its senses were drowned and taken by something from above. The sea of stars seemed to have cracked and left a dripping terror to fall from it. A dark river seemed to be pouring itself and managed to fall into the lair. That remained just unexpected enough to trigger a response and force it in a rage, to go and try to search for food. The body it had was now covered in the water and mud, which made it hard for it to move. Intoxicated would've been a sweet promise, compared with what it felt. Such water was worse than poison, black and filled with living fright, it blinded its many eyes, and those that weren't lucky enough were just melted, though none of the nerves was touched. It saw only fragments of the full vision it once had access to and now despaired until the ends of time. Ever since that point where it got tricked by the water, it hadn't stopped its chant-like incantation, left out of the body as a growl. Though the mouth had taken just as much of the watery torture, which managed to leave the jaw half cut. Though crippled and blinded at unaware, its limbs rejected the poison as it formed a carapace, now roaming around what was left of the cave, it just managed to flee and leap in time. Not any longer, was there a perfect marble floor at the bottom of the deep ravine, it was melted just as such. And the black poison soon revealed to be a bright red and yellow, which flowed even faster than blood. The heat made it seem like a furnace and now the sea of stars revealed itself, in front of the cowering girls and the beast. It was a giant statue which had its beard just covered in seconds before, tall and round was the ceiling and the cap it wore. In its eyes laid two giant gems of glinting red and the reflection of the fiery liquid that came out of its mouth now revealed itself. The giant head was as squared as the quarry it laid in, and it was just now that it released the strikingly red blood out of its mouth, destroying even the last fragments of the land which laid below of it. Steam followed from below, though it had nowhere to escape. Even the beast with its instincts knew better than to stay and be boiled alive, going towards the only place it knew, ignoring even the two girls it thought of seeing. They were spread around every direction, cut in halves, which made it even worse to see whenever of not they were mutilated and left for it as a sacrifice. With that out of the way, it went by its memory, leaping and riding as fast as it could, being burnt and in pain. The marks over its strong exposed shoulders and bones were deeply cut, charred black fragments were abandoned and left behind as it sprinted. Like ash, flowing in the wind, they took no notice of it either and both now joined the wall. It was the coldest of the room, still having a blue side, as for the stone, on the other side of the tall raving, everything was getting hotter and was about to get a lot worse. Both of them were just holding on enough to keep searching until their weariness would overcome their last efforts. They young, caught in a trap and desperate. Soon even the beast would find that it was in the same boiling pot, though the water layer was thinning out by the second. The sprint became a charge and soon, in the darkness, it gave a terrible cry, as it remained what could be called, the darkest of nights ever since. Such cry wouldn't be stopped by stone or wall, as it travelled through, past the closed door and even to some holes which laid above. Even those that dwelled outside had their troubles nonetheless, though instead of waiting to be stricken down, they dealt with it. Such were the two girls, which only now found the key, the small formation of small rocks that needed only to be shifted around. Out of the wall came an open, gaping mouth, no longer pushing the air down. No, the mouth got affected the most out of all by the heat, which started forcing the air to travel towards the great above, from which they came. 'Fast, before the beast returns.' Both nodded, calling upon one another, holding just as tightly and strongly as they could possibly do. It wasn't any shame in their fear, though their wounds were ever more clear now, in the light, then the darkness of the mouth came, as it opened and closed with them inside. They were bored above as they closed their eyes, not to see the horrible visage of the beast, which now seemed as much as them for a way out, which was never found for it. Soon after, it returns from where it came from, exhausted, as if stricken by arrows, it fell to the ground and waited. Some seconds passed with it on the ground, and from the distance, it only appeared as a hairy bump of skin, just growing and receding. Most of the fur either was burnt or fell, as well as patches of dark skin were left, bones charred, and even now, there could be seen, in the distance, the glittering light reflected in its blinded eyes. The beast stopped breathing just moment when they reached the levels above, holding onto one another, Vivian and Anne looked desperately around to see. Nothing, not a single rock bat, nor any other pest that would resemble them, though they weren't out of it either. 'Our sister, I forgot all about her.' Said Vivian, only now did she catch a moment to think for herself in that dark, damped, unholy place. There and then, the sound of the metal gate slammed and echoed, slightly as it fell on the rock stone. It was a lot colder in contrast of the giant furnace, though now, more aware of it, both of the girls looked at giant forms in the wall. So far, none lay in the valley in which they now stood. Yet Vivian, know knew better than her sister, despite holding in so quietly before. 'She was never down here, was she?' 'I doubt she came down, other than to look for us.' 'The fright she must feel, but we cannot stop, what will happen to our wounds if we do? Or even worse, if those bats decide to follow us!' Most of the shiny rocks were lost on the way down, though there were still a few which were forced while floating below, impaling the dress which they both wore. It was a shame that both now tried to get as much distance as limped dogs, though looking above, Anne said. 'Look, there are none of them, not even the slightest heard that could be seen.' 'But what does that mean sister? Did they run as well after feeling the heat rising from below?' 'That I do not know, but the way through the tower is long enough as it is, and we're not in the best condition as it is.' She overly nodded at the top and slightly beyond her sister's head. It was far enough that they noticed the boat, though there wasn't any bat. The old man waited just there, only not giving a wave, slowly taking it back. He noticed it as well, though he remained unhurt or unhindered by the swarm of bats which might fell on him as well as it did on them. 'Welcome back, I see that you have delivered the man.' It was surprisingly sharp for an old man and they both realised, perhaps even the three of them that it was the first time the girls were directly approached by the man. 'We needed to go, it's no longer safe in the depths.'The man nodded as if he understood and made the place for them to come inside.'I've got not enough but plenty enough to get you past this.You may think otherwise, though I'm not a dark man as you may have thought of me.'Regardless of what he said, the dark visage was still over his head, covering what he had.True, perhaps, he wasn't the sanest of them, and perhaps under the tattered robe he wore white, dark and glinting just as well to him now.'Rub this all over your wounds.'At first, they were repelled by the sight of it, as it was only covered in leafs, which were already the rarity of the drowsiest sights, though what he used as bait had already disgusted them before.'Why?'They both asked at the same time, wondering as well if it was even safe or sanitary.'You will get an infection if you do not do so.Do not worry, it's not the dropping of those stone pests as I have said before.'The man said laughing, almost in a cheering manner, despite being where he was.'I like telling that tale to everyone coming here in the depths, you see, it's getting quite lonely ever since people stopped coming.'Were there?'Vivian, step inside.'She quickly apologised and came as fast as she could, though it was a second of regret in which she found herself sitting at unaware.'Look closer girl and open it.'Anne made the first step and reached for the dark dirt in which the leaf was packed.It seemed to be something else harder than it should be, almost impossible to crumble or be broken by hand alone.'What is it?'Open the bottle and rub it on the wound while I carry you on the other side.'There laid a closed lid on the other side and after opening it, there did it lay, pure, glittering honey.'But how?'Just rub it on your wounds and don't tarry.'Both of the girls did so whilst listening to the old man's story.Indeed, as they seemed quite curious of how he escaped the swarm, as, the last thing they remembered of him was that, at a glance, he was at the heart of it.Two splits of the swarm, one of which followed them and the other returned to the man who laid alone in his boat.'So what happened?'Anne was the first to ask, not out of curiosity, but since she was rubbing honey over her sister's wounds, she had plenty to listen to make the time pass.'I'm glad you decided to ask, you see, I was hoping you'd return, all three of you but, hmm, what can you hope for when you're all alone in a boat?Times changed ever since the first dwellers came, and I've no doubt that much more will do the same."You must be quite old, sir.Say, why is it that you're always.If I don't have you get angry for asking you that question.'Vivan already fell asleep once again just like that, a half of second later and she remained released.It was quite enough that her wounds were stricken from pain, leaving her now in the cold of the cave.And if it weren't for the resonating voice of the old man, who still laid at top of beginning the story, she wouldn't have ended as such.'Well, I can see that you may find it suspicious, though not enough that you wouldn't trust me to row you to the other side."It's not like we have a choice, we're both having.I mean we've encountered some trouble before, on our way with.Well."I understand, no need to tarry about it, I've keen eyes, you see.I saw you approach from the distance, ever since your feet laid their marks on the dusk littered dust.There's no need of your explanation at all, just, hmph.I wish you haven't just brought that dirt with you and threw it in the water, it's murky as it is, not to mention that it's not good for the fish."You saw that?'Anne seemed to have forgotten what her friend had, with the whole rush and the fall and what not, though it wasn't necessarily to be avoided anymore.What was done was done, she thought.'I'm afraid I cannot get rid of it, to be honest, I don't even know what it is.You see, it came from Ar Ferdinand's head, it was something attached to him, a parasite of some sort I believe.'The man paused the constant hassle and rubbed under his chin.Only the outline of the action was visible, even with the dark light coming from below and above, though he continued.Still, a few seconds passed, Anne thought she was about to be enlightened by the discovery of the man. First, the beard was visible before being pulled back under the dark hood he wore. It seemed, for some seconds that he needed, perhaps even wanting to say something, though retracted it almost immediately. When he decided to do continue, it was only after she took the time to rub some of the honey all over her small wounds and cuts, before putting the lid back, and carefully wrapping it in the pair of leaves left at the wooden bottom of the boat. She sighed, though if it were from the memory of the fire, or because all the steam she blew off from the bleakness that laid around, no other could tell. 'Thank you. For both me and my sister, I don't know how much we would've lasted with open wounds and least away from infections, though. If she were awake, as I am, we would've both.' 'No need for it.' It took some time for the man to start speaking, and when he did so, he needlessly interrupted her. 'I should be the one to thank you, I haven't seen any company for way too long.' It was indeed true at least, as Anne saw the worked hands, all and barely holding the paddle, which was made out of an oak even more ancient than he was, or perhaps near the same gap. 'Though I can't say I'm pleased with what happened here, parasites in my hunting grounds. Now, I must burn them twice or even thrice to say the least before going on and eating them, unless you want me to end the same way as he did.' Indeed, there was the chance of it, even if he didn't know that it was about to get a lot worse than a few infested pairs of fish. 'Come with us then, to the top. We've got plenty of room in our house and not to mention, that I won't be able to carry my sister back there. You saw how dangerous it's down here now, right? You must've, I and my sisters are always seeking for stones, but not once did we see such a huge swarm like this one. It's a miracle that we managed to get out alive and return, let alone you and.' 'Enough, enough girl. You're carrying the fish, there's no need for you to stand up in a boat, you'll fall otherwise. Then I'd have to deal with fishing you and perhaps having to take care of the parasites as well.' Anne apologised. She knew that she was leading him somewhere. Now, his eyes were glittering in the dark, small globes, almost the ones of the elders further above. The man was looking through the water, indeed, to her notice as well, it seemed to have gotten a lot darker, more reflective. A perfect reflection, in a murky water, this seemed to be, not only out of the ordinary but a devilry at works. 'Very well, I'll help you return with your sister but I won't promise I'll stay. I'm the captain of this ship and of the sea, we're in and the last thing we're going to do is abandon it.' 'It's a fair deal sir, though I believe that you won't have something to return to. Whatever parasite was on Ar Ferdinand. The man who followed me I mean, it doesn't seem like it's just a normal small blood sucking lich like thing.' There was something dark, which he remember seeing not too long ago, falling into his murky lake. 'It's ill luck that we were forced to depart like we did before, though I believe you may be right girl. There's something I haven't told you before, which is what made the swarm retreat the way it did. It was something in the water which raised and grapples a hand full of those rocky winged beasts in pulled them down. A sight to behold, I tell you, even if I believe there may not be a coming or staying any longer, I may even need to change lakes and venture the sea once again if staying here means risking my life.' The girl nodded in approval, though she wasn't aware of why he stood, hence she asked and have been immediately met with a response. 'Why I decided to stay after all? Would it be hard to believe that I knew that you were coming back? Not even him, but the two of you, and after all, I owe you since you've done your part and brought him so far.' 'So you know him after all.' Asked Anne, much perplexed by what was happening. It was a strange way for her to ask, though she did it nonetheless. 'I've had a peculiar feeling about him ever since we met, he just came out a dark hole and it appeared that he wasn't even acting like a normal human. He even figured how to work out the old tunnels, and these were not the usual ones so hidden from the common eye. It was in the guard's room and I don't doubt that they'd be looking for us as well as they could. "Indeed girl, I am aware of what you're speaking off, though I haven't walked in the town for longer than I should've explored, I know it well enough. It's grave that I presume he hadn't gotten the chance to explore either, as neither have I. But you must do your best, both of you need to forget you've ever seen him. For, you see, he's a dark and evil man, the one you've brought down here, and his coming was expected for an evil purpose.' Again, there laid a strange look, perhaps even stranger than they thought one could possibly let out. Though it wasn't entirely unexpected, coming out from him and the way he treated them. If Vivian were awake, there'd be no doubt of the sudden bolster of courage and would have a word or even more about the man. Not to mention that thing which was alive and growing. There laid a sudden thumper as wood hit the stone and the paddling had been stopped. It was long since the man had lifted himself and went away from his boat, though not entirely unexpected. Times changed, and so did he. With a sudden leap and stretch, the hood finally fell over his shoulders, and in the glittering light coming from the stony stars, his face seemed to belong to someone no less than twice lessened of his age. A squarish nose and eyes of amber, the beard seemed to have been trimmed, his bones were suddenly awake again, his cheeks were almost as tall as his, now towering stature. Not even a white hair was visible on his head, nor beard and the faces Anne remembered of having seen had vanished away with her paranoia. 'Come on, I believe your sister won't last any longer on honey alone.' Anne helped Vivian come on her shoulder, barely keeping her still and on her feet, both of them now walked, as she was semi-awakened, seeing glittering shakings of the image of the cave. If one were in her body and the body of the beast, they'd see not difference at all, for they both seemed blinded at one point, to the same level, even more so now than before. She was grabbed, nonetheless and helped to come. 'Lead the way. By the way, my name is Bartholomew Stronglow." I'm Anne, and she's my sister, Vivian. "It's been a pleasure to meet you, though the circumstances are not as pleasing as I hoped them be. Let's waste no second anymore, time is of the essence. "I know, but." Call me Glow if you've got a problem remembering. 'The girl nodded, slightly at a lower level than he was, as they were both holding her sister as they walked along. 'Glow, who told you about Ferdinand? I'm sorry that I decided to ask, but I need to know, we were ill informed by someone who was wearing a hood and laid masked in the square. And we both remember, at least I believe she told me she felt the same, but we thought that it was you that we met above. Though from the looks of it, it couldn't be so. At least I can't take you for a liar and continue on this road with you. Are you connected with the man we saw in the square?" Nay Anne, I couldn't be further away, I'm a mere rower who was ill informed of the coming of the man. Though I don't regret getting him on the other side, I'm afraid that everything will start falling apart much sooner than planned. 'He had a grim look which couldn't be hidden under a hood any longer, being visible only to one of the girls. 'Then why have you decided to remain if you knew this place was falling apart? 'It was something that told them the same thing, an awkward feeling they've felt whilst growing up, one that could never be explained truthfully. 'It's true that I knew, though I couldn't wait any longer, I needed an end for I was getting weary of being stuck there. In a way, I lied to both of you. I wasn't glad to have company, instead, I was merely content with him poisoning the lake and bringing an end to my misery as it were. "But then, why haven't you thrown yourself in there already, what made you wait?" It was forced, barely fitting to come out of a young lady, at which she was even ready to excuse her strangeness, though he wasn't the least offended by it. 'A fair question, but one that I can answer.

I knew you were coming back, and now. Now it's time for us to head back.' There laid the mouth closed down, whilst the other seemed to be stuck. Luckily, they forgot to return to key, so it was more than ready to be used. The way back was wearisome, each step seemed like hell but below truly laid the fiery damnation, which burnt through stone, killed the beast, though stopped at the gate nonetheless. Alas, where one gate opened, another one closed and left behind only the dampness which was soon flooded. It wasn't only the red blood of the mountains which came behind, but so did the water rise at the bottom of the neck and blocked the access to the tower. Its shimmering expanse was felt through, especially at the last moment when they shut the doors closed, to the people's surprise. Enough people were present, standing and looking at the man who rescued the girls, soon taken to be taken care of. Not a word was said by them, as they were worn out and on their way to some professional help. The old man was greeted by the man and without realising what was happening, ever since he stepped from the, almost hidden away, he had entered an endless charade of shaken hands and praises. Soon the room was out of sight, and hidden, as well as the girls, now reunited with their sister. The blue water just tipping above was a shimmering dream he had forgotten ever since he stepped there and was amazed by what he'd seen. A whole new ocean for him to travel to discover, having the only problem be, how he'd get there and why. Why is it so far? He thought while blocking all the noise, including the questioners. Bartholomew hadn't seen the mouth being smashed and fall apart, cracklingly, it tried to shove its dark metal teeth against the interlopers but failed. One head was cracked in half and fell near its sides, then immediately its neck was stuck and stumped with cloth out of their fear that it might grow again. The other head seemed to have shaken with every hit, until eventually it broke and fell on its own neck, choked and abandoned. Shards of iron and thick glass, now laid at the bottom, though their fall couldn't be heard because of the water. The thicket below was now gotten ridden, as the old man was praised and called master. 'Feast, a feast we must do!' Said one, though he couldn't have come at a better time, they were all in their way to make one, all and all, after having failed to find the girls in the tunnels. They were either ready to give up or give away, food and fiercely as it could be cooked, was passed from hand to hand. In an attempt to hold his interest at bay, Glow, as they have got to hear his nickname as well, couldn't hold it anymore. A feast of ages they called, tall chairs, small ones, even the children sobbed at the crisp turkey, the gourmet, apple pies and many drinks of ale and beers he hadn't tasted in a long time. Ever since he lived below, only salt water and bat meat which was already crushed because of the stones in which they were encased. This was indeed the life, he thought. 'Cheers.' 'Cheers aback!' Said another, while passing, the small potatoes were still steamed, and tasted just as sweet. In their scanty barred hands, they appeared like nothing more than small hurt globes that could only satisfy some of the hunger. The glow didn't appear entirely out of place from where he stood, and perhaps the dark added to his appearance that the girls failed to see. Though his belly had to be at least bottom, as no longer did the fisherman jacket, could hold both the shirt and the bolsters under. And then came the fish, as such as he hadn't seen in the years he had been below. 'Ah, is that a mud swallow sea water, the savoury delight I see?' One that could only be hinted in dreams under the depths, which couldn't even live there and even if it did so, it's a failure on its own with man-made poles out of a little resource that was already scarce. Bartholomew Glow, looked, with a slab of meat in his hand and dripping from his mouth as for seeing what was brought. Soup, sardines, fresh sea cucumbers and octopuses, this was the blood of a real sea, not the winged attraction which he presented to taste like snappers. Which they were present on their own. Not all were present to be at the feast, as people worked, having a mind of their own. Two beds were occupied, and the wounds were treated, just as the food was eaten on the other side of the concave. 'Open up. Ready to go, swallow this and it should ease your pain.' Said the nurse. Her hair had locked in her locks, all place one upon another like field. There were plenty staying momentarily in beds with minor wounds, as if was known enough that no one really expected to have any more than flesh wounds. No one else than them. 'I told you that you may end up here but what did you say back then?' 'But it's bitter.' The small teaspoon with the dark amber liquid was swallowed nonetheless. It was even hard especially knowing and hearing, the reason for all the noise and the celebration. 'Now, worry not, I've spoken with the chef just before, and he'll come later and bring you something to eat.' 'But we'll starve before that happens.' The nurse gave both an angst-filled look and nodded nonetheless. 'You'll survive, this tincture should do its job and you'll feel more than well in no time. But I can't give you anything at least until half an hour passed, understood?' 'Then why haven't you given us something to eat earlier?' Asked Vivian, as bed withered as her sister were. Something remained inaudible, but her eyes widened as she spoke. Her jaw seemed too far stretched and falling on its own for a second when she turned and closed the room. Neither of them observed this before, but the room seemed out of place. 'Look, Vivian, there's no water there.' 'I guess. Not.' Barely came an answer, all was filled with dust, the wood below seemed rotten and now, the most disturbing thing of all was the silence and the bloating smell of something grim which laid in the dark corners of the room. 'Why did she leave the room now? Couldn't she have stayed a little longer?' 'Close your eyes' a voice said while eeriness started filling the room. Cockroaches were a blight, plenty, but never so many in a singled place. They seemed to have sprouted from any corner and every side, from even the smallest hole they could find and greed them. None of the pests came to their beds, though they looked with big bulging eyes, ignoring every second that passed, unable to shout or call for her. 'I'm afraid.' Said Vivian, with a weak voice that could barely be heard, even though they stood so closely to one another. They formed images on the walls, moving even more systematic than the swarm of the bats they've encountered, though their reason why they were there remained unknown to them. Anne was more than convinced that there was something they needed or wanted, why else would they come. Yet, she asked, even with her fear, after seeing that they blocked the way out. And outline was formed around the handle until the cockroaches became flaccid and stood there, almost like they were trapped. None fell on the bottom of the floor, yet dwindled at the edges, they were shaking and taunting to spread around as encompass everything. And no doubt did they have in their mind that there were plenty. They seemed to be nibbling now at the wall and everything that was in their reach. 'What are they doing Anne? I'm afraid.' Quickly she went and leapt to her sister's bed, which was more than enough to have at least two adults of large sizes on it. The other adults didn't seem to be there with them anymore, those who had flesh wounds and what not, the ones which they noticed before just disappeared. Empty bed laid everywhere around, though soon enough it seemed to be ending. Whatever they were trying to eat, soon they slowed down, and a vision of something pink was left under and all around them. Red too accompanied, and soon they have driven away on all sides. 'Do you hear us?' Said the voices, finally released from the wall. There they laid again, all just stricken on the wall, flat, though moving, a perfectly aligned with the wall, though with the small exception of the growing claws and their mouths. The girls haven't seen such abominations before, yet they felt somewhat content and yet not afraid, listening like smaller being to a rightful prophet contacting them. Which stood there pondering ahead. 'Where is he? The one who's supposed to go to the depths and find the cage?' Asked the voices, behind them seemed to entrance in caves and caverns, filled with skin, blocked by a portal which needed only the slightest approach for entering. Though not even they could keep the girls for being terrified any longer. The formless shapes took the face of Argus to speak to them, and at least they tried copying it two or four more times by the sides. It was deformed, though shown at all angles nonetheless. An outstretched claw immediately headed towards the dark and pulled ahead at least one thousand of those roaches to eat and devour. Ar Ferdinand's mouth suddenly grew like a giant skin pouch as it moved and ate from inside. There laid many small limbs, that were ringed and seemed to be armoured, though used to break the food apart. The sight of them came only momentarily before it closed its mouth and turned back to them. 'Where is it?' Said one voice whilst crunching the roaches. 'The man, where did he go? Has he come yet?' Asked another. One head suddenly pushed itself through the wall, only to force itself crushed against another. The eyes were twisted on their side, away from the growing moulder which was growing against the side. The pain made it shiver and shake, the skin around was become even paler than it was. It took seconds to go past the layers of disgust when Anne stood up on the bed, taking the candle of fire and said. 'I do not know.' 'Liar! Liar, liar, liar' Shouted the voices, one after another, all spoke on turns before ending the charade. The heads stretched on all sides, only to corner the bed, wriggling like snakes, smelling and sniffing the air. They way they moved was quite shallow and bizarre, how they could twist their skin, did they even have bones? Anne wondered. Her sister was hiding now in the bed sheets, the effect of the fragrance they felt in the air disappeared. Even her older sister seemed to be feeling the angst, the fear and the despair. She looked ahead now, focusing on none of the heads anymore. 'I'm sorry.' With a gulp, she could hardly swallow, no matter how hard she tried doing so. Neither did she dare turn around, nor speak any word until asked. 'Good, now say, littler one, where he has gone, for he is lost to us.' 'He owes us, owes us, owes us to stop. The caged fiend can never escape its blight.' Said another, arguing, the head continued, showing no sign of order between them, or even that they might talk less bizarre to one another. 'He can't be far, he cannot be. But we cannot find him on our own child, we cannot, we cannot.' Repeated the furthest head that could be felt there. The sheets still seemed to be shaking under her eyes, and in a sudden approach, the flame seemed to be closing in, as if to take a bit out of the neck of the creature. Anne backed away, immediately when she realised, her light and fire were being devoured in front of her eyes as if it was nothing. 'Do we have a reason to keep her sentient? Does she know?' 'I know, I know. Listen, I know where-where he is, where he has gone to. I've to lead them there myself with my sister.' With her other hand, she tried covering her mouth, a reflex which came way too late. A claw came, with striking nails, made of skin, or encompassed by it in any other way, and it pulled out the sheet, only by a slight pull, to uncover her sister sitting and shivering. 'Open your eyes and reveal to us, we hate waiting. We hate having to see insolence and boredom be forced upon us. Where is the man you have seen before? Argus, Ferdinand, his names matters not, the dark man which was under our control had long since been gone from our sight and ours alone. Slithering and quivering all over, a part of the skin seemed to be melting in front of her eyes. The flame was taking its effect despite the fact that the faces that were moulded remained unaffected, neither did the skin melt nor did they deform in the little girl's eyes. Bones were now visible underneath, which Anne immediately recognised, though misshaped, and tied together, four to eight joints all seemingly made for the same amount of limbs which weren't visible. Could it be hurt by it? Anne asked herself, without realising that she was so close to it that her thoughts could be seen. 'No, little, girl. Him, he came to you.' 'We see, we see.' Said another, it was dousing as it were, intoxicating that both fell asleep. The wall, in which they received like rats came back to its pieces, even the darkest of roaches were taken as a precaution, not to be found, at least not until it was too late. Both were alive but sleeping, the nurse was gone, as well and on the other side, the feast made everyone forget. 'Muddy water.' Said a man, sitting alone in a corner, near the room where the banquet was held. Muddy water, everywhere, again he thought, looking at the transparent ceiling, seeing how the cleanness of it started to wear off. There were dark spots, spread at almost equal distances from one another, which were, despite his unawareness reflecting the ones deep below. A deep connection ran, information was already spread around, and among all, the terror was driving forth, searching for him. The sky was blank with twilight, grim and musky, the rounded town was stricken and pushed into a deep slumber, from which none expected to wake. At least not until there'd come a redeeming light from the coming of the day. The sunlight had come to an end more sudden than expected and even the puffs of smoke that came from every spot of the town were driven away by the harsh winds. A creaking noise came from at least a few spots, wooden ceilings and windows barred, blindingly smashing themselves against their inner edges left a dire impression of being haunted. The children were asleep by the beds, looking forward and seeing the dusk settle. Nothing else was to the weather, other than the wind, which brought all the noise. Prisoners, if any be, were set aside and freed from being outside, and even to the furthest, most pure driven point, somewhere in the woods, where there had been a nuisance burning, had finally died off. All was sent to a point, until, close to the midnight, there were lights on the streets. Despite the lamps which were long since dried off and no longer burning and the silence and dampness in which most houses just accepted, all of the sudden came a glittering yellow. A sparkle that became fiery red, reading through the bottom of the stone floor. A few looks came to their windows and exposed openings to have their glances at who decided to come outside during such a weather. Alas, it was a trail, like ants that were seen from the tallest point in the tallest towers, hooded figures that roamed through. Their tattered robes were obvious, though bland, it wasn't that rare for cults to come and roam through the city, hence all gates were tightly shut at night. And not a single townsman or woman laid in the town, none that could be seen anymore, to say the least. Plenty looked though, at something which was carried by them, covered in a blanket made of twilight, without a reflection, it seemed, at least to the children who were caught at unaware that they were carrying the body of a small giant. There were ropes attached at each edge, acting like chains, and the giant covered object, if it weren't a body, say for the brave and bold who decided to find out, seemed to be lightly taken. At least four people on a rope, and keeping a hold on each possible handling spot. It was something like a mirror to the heart, a wonder for the children who sought adventure and to find out what was under there. The ones who held the lights didn't handle the ropes but torches. Their hoods didn't resemble those of revolutionaries, for the looks that questioned it, though their eyes were near, filled with suspicion. None dared whisper, who laid in the dark since whatever laid under that giant grim role could've had ears just as big and functional. Could anyone tell otherwise? The eyes deceived already, as they started moving at harsher and faster paces and after a sudden glint of a sparkle, from far away, it was clear that they were spied upon. It didn't matter, even with small devices, a play on the glass and on metal, which provided sight to binoculars which lead all the way to the bottom of the ravine. They were too obvious, all the binoculars leading and watching on the mysterious comers and the weapon which they laid. Out of the sudden, a pair of cloaks and hoods came off, revealing gloomy armours filled with many ridges and joints attached. Such reveal didn't only trigger the expectancy of the people but rash fear and confusion. Thousands of lights were brought to many homes, which already triggered a thousand more which soon followed. It wasn't something planned, hence why it caused every sight to be driven there, which is where they stood. And they couldn't have come at a better time either, as it was obvious, though they were driving to the dampest part of the giant capital, which remained damp. Dark, it was the spot from where the capital came to be, it's said. Despite being circular and seemed to be man build from side to side, it all came from a dark spot, which it's been said to have given birth from underground. A glimpse of fear, at the ones who could stop their advancement were on the other side of the city, too far, way too far to get there in time. The flames soon arise, like smouldering fragments of igneous rocks just pushed towards their true nature. The furthest towers which still stood to stand finally revealed their true purpose, like light towers they shined in the sky, with fire globes inside, creating all of the sudden an imitation, corrupted and repulsing. A fake day soon came to be, striking ten times harder than any of the thousands of lights that pain in the homes of its citizens could. The light reflected against their armours, the covered figured was soon to be used as a ram. Whoever they were and the reason behind the invasion remained a mystery, at least to those watching. Through the darkest depths, past everything at hand, now laid Argus, patched up, looking at the small writing machine. A force guided him so far, as well as it did try to pull him back, through the mist and the creeping terror which awaited him on the way back there. Now, looking back at the writing machine, after inserting the ink box, like an automaton, the small rounded buttons started pressing themselves. Paper already laid loaded and working at it, soon already three pages had been written in front of him. Referred to as Argus, on all three pages, it seemed that the other two were nothing more than copies of the first one. And dirty at it were, it seemed that the writing and the ink lasted enough to make just one clean page, while the other two were nothing more than smudged and stretched. Some letters missed, though at least one was made. 'Beware, Argus, you mustn't wait any longer, now that you've done what you've done. If there was an easier way, I would've recommended it myself to you, but since there isn't, I dare not speak otherwise. Marvel at yourself, now, since you have passed the test, you must go back and throw yourself into the abyss, the holes, that I'm more than sure, you've noticed them full of those growing lumps. You've got something just hidden for this moment, at least so I hope if all came right. I'm more than sure if you weren't as lucky as I thought you'd be, that you'll manage to find a way to burst through and reach the catacombs below. Not much further after that, Argus, you've been through worse, though do not worry, it will be over soon, at least so I hope it to be. Before we depart, from one another, though we've not even spoken as of yet. Touch no cord, no wire, nothing that would seem to be part of the machine. There's no doubt that you've figured out by now that both the tunnels and the even further below were made by humanoid forms, such as yourself. Their creation was made for entrapment, even going further than creating prototype after prototype and throwing them in the depths. You are the key for his release so do not make any mistake now. Every sacrifice, every command, everything they've told us leads to this point. Your journey will end after the final steps of the catacombs below, though you're unaware of it.' Argus paused, looking now further in front of him, after walking without having realised so, the mist dissipated and the growth stopped growing. There wasn't a name signed, and the rest was gibberish on the paper. A second passed, and all became gibbering. The ink started growing hotter until some of it poured itself from the paper onto his hand. Suddenly he released and looked not longer on it. It wasn't as painful, though it left a mark, burn and ash like, black in the furthest point from where it managed to cut deep. 'This is it, just the two of us here alone. I'm about to find out where the cage is.' Argus pulled out a tooth now, only two remained after that. Somewhat, it looked a lot sharper than it should've looked like, as it did with every new one. Either I'm getting used to using them or something worse is about to happen. Now, he laid in front of the first hole he laid his eyes upon, a reflection to the bottom laid. The note said nothing about the fake holes or the real one, whichever he could use or not. They'd all lead on the same way, or so it was implied. Teeth received, as if they knew too, though there was enough space for the meat to stretch and cover up the lid, protecting itself against whatever he could've thrown deep down. Another doubt was thrown out of the way, as it was more than obvious, as it wouldn't be stopped by the acid it had inside. But, still, he waited. Minutes, perhaps, or hours, thinking of other men throughout history, of which he remembered who had to stand at a crossroad in their lives. One small leap for a man, but what could it mean for the mankind? There was a small hesitation now, perhaps even the answer to all his problems. 'If I chose to slit my throat with this, what would happen to his cage? There was nothing written in the note.' The reflection moved his lips for him despite the fact he was tired. It went so long and every possible ending for him would be either death or madness. Now, he started going around the hole, slowly, mesmerised by his own reflection. 'My own life ended.' So he said at first. 'Awakened in my house and arrested by two agents, after finding out that all I've to believe to be true wasn't.' His expression seemed paler, harsher around as if days had passed since his last shaving. 'Murdered in an accident, tied to a bed. A lifetime in prison, from which I've never escaped from the time I was a child.' Argus seemed a lot much older. 'Lock in an asylum, still spreading gibberish near the other patients, who I thought to have been killed. Stumbled in a military camp and executed. Banished and denied the return. Or have spent an eternity tied to a never ending nightmare. All which could've been or might happen, is this a purgatory of my own?' It was times like this one where he wished the voice to have been there to comfort him, to respond, no matter how degrading and pitiful he'd have been seen as. At least if it was there for one last time. 'You're nothing more than an insect doing my bidding, now go on with it.' Argus followed that by a chuckle. 'At least, that's what I'm sure you would've said if you were here with me now.' It was a grim, damp smile, almost as gloomy as the room was, though he remembered there were still two chances for him to end it before it was too late. And it's been just so close now. 'I can't help but be curious of what lays. On the other side!' It dropped so fast that for a second it appeared as if it was nothing more but a flash of lightning being thrown by an ancient deity, long forgotten. The impact took a few seconds for its full release, though it came nonetheless. His eyes were taken back and looked away from the impact. The growth was being smothered, soon to be suffocated and die by the black lagoon which was thrust from below. It was not a choice any longer, seemingly happening in an instant. Argus created a wind tunnel which pulled him in the great dark which reigned below. The skin was crushed as well as long teeth, a fair which he avoided since he was far away from where it happened, but he could see them too be dragged below as well as he was. The cold and wet wall on the touch, his body slid against them, going only faster, when he reached and landed on his feet soon after. Teeth, skin and whatever other bits which were left now, all were overthrown, either in pieces or in bigger chunks, all spread around, which he could trust anymore. Not, after what had happened before with the previous attempt for his capture. Plenty of opportunities already were made, though he went on, with or without a light. If there was a gloom coming from above, it was soon covered, sealed, as if it was a tomb. 'The Emperor awaits!' He yelled, it came out suddenly, though the piercing voice was responded, as torches began to lit, two from the entrance to the catacombs, which were as tall as fortresses of war. Stone carved all around, as he looked, there wasn't any way out, though now it was more of a physical lack of escape than anything else. And with only one way to go and seeing how the time remained short, as this was the last he'd get at, he went. Luckily it was closed, he stopped and admired it despite having wanted to go through and ignore it. There laid a certain curiosity about the thing, not the old runes, as he couldn't understand what was written, or even recognise the language, but how they were open. It wasn't the traditional sense, as one may be able to think. Argus pondered on it, especially since there was a mark and the metal was bent the wrong way already, someone came in before. It charged and smashed the door through. Something left a taste filled with grimness already, from the looks of which, it came from inside, not the other way around. Yet, the gate was sealed above and one instance of an entrance laid still there. Not to mention, that the gate was gigantic, and the tunnel wide enough to hold twenty people of his own size if they were to walk side by side, hand in hand and still they couldn't reach to touch both walls on the same sides. It was a pity already, two remained. The catacombs were deep, the walls were tall and made of the same craft just like anything else he had seen before. 'There's no way I can travel through on my own, I need help. Can you hear me?' Another set of torches, colossal as they were, just lit themselves as he approached. It was a pity that they heard and responded with that, though soon he'd get his chance. There laid, lodged into the metal wall, just right ahead, one of the deep, stone munching machines he had seen. It shared not only the same model as they did before, but also, it seemed to be shaking and ready to go. Suspicious, though his legs did tire. And his voice was answered, despite the fact that the machine looked old enough. 'Alas, I thank you, whoever it is that's been fulfilling my requests. I've nothing to repay you, unless, you're into the service of the same as I am right now.' The deep silence continued, though in an utmost taunting way now. As it were, he opened it and took the keys, they were fully turned around, no one was inside to have been locked by himself. Fate was in his hands, even the seat was warm, though the only problem remained to handle the machinery. 'And there's also that, who could've done this then? The lights are still functioning, I see.' It seemed to be handled with more ease than he originally thought, almost like any other vehicle he had been using before, a push and a pull, then something spun inside, there were at least twenty light from above and below, covered in a layer of cheap plastic and another one of glass. Around them, there was the iron casing, as well as an indication of what was happening in terms of heat and adjustments. 'Now, how do I..?' Before answering his own question, it seemed ridiculously easy, as he pulled the lever in front and tried driving. The giant metal antlers were still pushed too far for his own comfort and he knew well that there had to be a better way to take them out. It was too far around to go, and gloomily dark. From the looks of it, against whatever it was lodged, a closer look revealed the real problem. The metal wasn't only lodged, but melted and united in a symbiosis there, hence the engine would die off before he even managed to pull. An obvious trap, it knew. 'You knew, haven't you?' He asked, and the silence needed now. The place was grim, his mouth was dry after Argus got ahead, he looked and took from below a tooth and threw it immediately, without a second glare. It was the second one to go so fast. A small explosion happened, almost to the point where it could be called an implosion, having occurred from inside the very heart where they were welded together. Suddenly the machine recoiled and pulled itself back, its metallic track and wheels kept going before it stopped. When Argus stopped covering his eyes, he looked and saw how the antlers were only halves of what they used to be, abandoned, to say the least on the wall, while on the other side, it wasn't any better. Though he had gotten what he wanted and now he could freely drive. Only one chance remained, though now he could safely drive and feel protected, under the deepest depths and the most cavernous walls which surrounded his every side. Damp, still remained the walls above him, as he entered what now seemed to be an enclosure, separated from the ceiling to something that could be at least a few men's drops. The steeply bottom on which the roll walked upon were steadily going down, until a point where it became straight. Even the torches were smaller and spread more distinctly apart, and under them laid the sculpted faces of small lords, devils and most common which Argus managed to recognise, from the folk tales of old, bat-people set in stone. First curve and he could see just how much they took his glimpses and his eyes, the expressions seemed real and distant from one another. Pain, happiness, lust, from the eyes to the shapes of their noses, teeth and smiles, dropping low then. Argus noticed. One was different than the others, a broken jaw, missing from a skull. It was perfectly chiselled and for a moment he pulled the lever back and caused the vehicle to lay outside to investigate. His foot stopped in-between the frame of the door and the first of the many stone bricks which laid under him. There were two sets of empty darkness, one in the front and the other one behind. Indeed, it was something he had experienced before, but nothing of the same eeriness he had felt or seen there and then. Quite peculiar for him, especially then and especially now, during his last lap, which contradicted what he knew and felt. Eeriness crept like a tendril between two spots in which no sound came. He grabbed the first pebble he saw on the ground, though he didn't throw it immediately. It was cut with an unnerving complexion, even for someone like him to notice it, as someone who wasn't an expert in rocks and small stones. The would've been a call back if he decided to throw one of them in any of the two possible directions, all for the breaking of the silence. Yet it didn't happen. If it were for a doubt to have been, it happened now and it happened fast, something was unnerving about just how prepared the place remained. Turned, he went back and went on inside his cosy machine. Plenty of space remained inside, enough for the slightest comfort to be had, not that he complained otherwise of what he chose to do. There were plenty more aligned, as slowly, it formed more like a temple or structured as such, not in the least could it be called a citadel. Pillars did come be, both the ceiling and the walls seemed to be more uniformly placed, curved and bent around to match spires and arcs, which held just far above. Yet someone seemed to have been there before of him, someone defiled the statues, it was way too obvious for anyone who was to lay his eyes upon it. Cracked faces, destroyed, smashed and chiselled, cut and where there could've laid something else, it wasn't. Just the jaws were taken and the empty spots left, though it was too much of the same. Until he stopped again and peered just outside. The flame took a blue aspect, rather the strong yellow and orange he had previously seen, everything and anything that could possibly be away from the bland. Writings on the walls he couldn't read, then again, he didn't need as he looked outside at the devil. The metallic box, almost oval-shaped below held a mouth that seemed to be moving. A grim feeling laid of skin, though he moved on and opened the door with confidence. Argus even stepped outside without delay and felt the stone all around. For the moment, the mouth didn't speak but instead, it waited, as if for something to be told. 'Hello?' There was a delay, until the mouth decided to speak, though there weren't any eyes nor ears unless the sculpted ones counted. Metal wires seemed to be lodged and falling on the floor was a black cord laying there just hovering above the ground, attached only to the mouth. It had belonged to something else, most likely, though now it didn't. He waited. 'You have come. Take us, take us, take us now. Now, now!' The voice spoke then ended, waiting for a response. Argus took it out of the framed, as his hands

just fell below and around the supple face. It wasn't as hard as he thought, though he grabbed it nonetheless and sighed. 'What are you?' As he turned it around, though the mark in the stone revealed that it was the same one he had seen before. A mark of metal, where an empty spot was left to be plugged inside. The mouth couldn't speak anymore, the mouth refused to move or even gave any sign of sentience anymore. Dropping out of the cable laid something black, its blood most likely. Just another trinket to be thrown around, Argus thought as he returned. This time he hadn't stopped the vaccine yet, the engine was still warm and running. He had only to jump on and resume his stroll, before going on, now looking in both directions, seeing how the place was infested, empty spot on a devil. Another one on a lord, every statue he had seen, the maiden, no jaw, the statue of a small angel child remained intact, though the next set of statues were in the same state as the previous ones were. Argus seized again once he saw another one of those. 'I ask one similar to you, could you tell me what you are?' 'We are?' The lips stopped and didn't continue speaking as if pondering on the question. 'Similar to you?' 'A boy?' The lips and the mouth didn't stop moving as they remained there. The paleness of the skin was disturbing in the dark, and the light didn't do much to help but bring out the peculiar freckles it had. Once again, it stopped once it was pulled out, the features and what it used to do. Though the voice did fit the one of a child, more or less, so he thought. Now, that he became more aware, he thought of remembering of what he thought of hearing before, was that the voice of a woman? How could he remember a voice like that especially now when he was caught at unaware? There was plenty of space inside, but their usefulness? What could they be used for? Ahead, the jaw taking of the statues stopped, as far as he went for minutes, none was defiled anymore, as it was safe to assume, that's where it stopped. Though he was proven wrong once again to think there'd not be any of them anymore. It was the location and placement which was changed, as he had seen two mouths lodged against the wall, wires attached and overgrown. The wall was slightly cracked under the spots where the small intrusions came, and the cord was dangling against the first surface it found. Argus felt compelled to collect them, placing them now in a small pile. He hadn't got too far on foot until he found some other, and each time he asked a question, noticing after a while that each of them seemed to react a certain way. Surprised. 'You've found me, cousin, how have you been?' 'I don't. I'm not your cousin, okay? We're in who knows what's dungeon deep inside the ground and I'm not doing anything more but talking to a disembowelled mouth.' The surprise was enough to make it stopped, and deem it to be pulled. Even more surprised than it remained Argus, who just pulled it out, as well as he saw the wires recede back inside without even a sign of struggle. It was placed just like a sack on his back, held tightly by the cord which was just as strong and soft as it appeared. He sighed nonetheless. 'What's your deal then?' 'I'm blind and my body feels numb, why is it so?' There was the voice that seemed old and grim. 'It's a lot worse than that. It's sad to announce that you're nothing more than a fraction of a body. Your mouth is everything you've got.' 'I understand. Perhaps this is what I deserve to have.' The lips jerked for seconds though went on into a relaxed state, waiting to be talked to once again. They seemed to follow a pattern, at least from what he noticed before, none have spoken twice or even thrice until he did so, not to mention that until this point there was no interest for any other thing. 'Do you have a name?' 'I do not know.' 'So you're not called anything, is that correct?' 'No one spoke to me for me to be called something.' This is getting nowhere and not to mention, the shimmering's getting worse. Not even the depths were safe from what was happening above. A thump could be felt, something falling from in-between the cracks, either it was the dust or crushed moss particles. Whatever it was and what they were doing up there seemed to drag itself to the bottom. 'Do you know where the noise is coming from?' Above. 'Can you be more precise than that?' From everywhere I can feel around. From roots, from dirt, from stone and even metal, dangling as it is stricken against. 'How can you exactly know what's happening there?' 'I am connected with them.' The voice grew a lot grimmer, and the sad smile reverted back from the constant indifference. There was half of a nose, or only a bit of it left there just fairly cut from the rest. It mattered not to him what transpired above, and he realised it now. Though there was another question to be asked. 'Will you die if I pull you out?' 'I don't know.' What followed after that was a full deep breath coming out from the mouth before it froze and waited. It seemed to have prepared itself before being strapped against his back. The last two he had seen were there, just not as far. No others in sight, but a small, yet sturdy case laid standing alone on the road. He pulled the two out of before they had the chance to speak and went for the case. It was getting crowded, or say, a burden on his back, though he grabbed and dragged it nonetheless. In retrospective, it was a bad idea, since it was unknown to him what laid inside, who could tell what could've happened once he got in? Argus threw the trapped mouths and using his entire upper body strength, he lifted the case and placed it in his seat. Standing on his chair, face to face, it wasn't locked or protected in any possible way, hence he only needed to go on and open it. To yet another surprise, he found nothing more inside but a small box, black and large, which took all the place. There were plenty of small deep square empty spaces in which they all held a small hole. It wasn't hard to figure out what was what for, and how it'd be to be connected then. Simply, he grabbed a mouth and pushed the cord inside the hole and twisted, keeping the motion, until a sound of a click could be heard. After he was done, he simply watched as the cord was pulled down and the face was placed back to its spot. He did so with all of them, all but one which was missing, seeing the wide assembly of faces, some having noses of parts of an eye. It was dark, so Argus took a moment to excuse himself from not noticing that before. Though they reacted differently, now they were still. He pulled one at once. 'Can you hear me? Hello?' The box looked more like a battery now, so most likely there was no power to make it start. Unless he counted the engine which was still running as he thought of it. He grabbed the case and took it with him, not having appeared to be much lighter than before. The part and the small lips were covered and he had closed it on the way, though he thought of the fact that there wasn't an additional cable for him to use at all. Even one could've been useful at a time like this, not to mention that he desperately needed it, as he felt. There was something tied to the machine, the voices and the emotions they made him feel. The shell in front was lifted as he looked at the machine. Luckily there laid protective gloves caught in the casing near the right side, held up by some plastic wires. Clamps, and a long wire, along with some extra replaceable part which laid by side in case of anything that helped. There laid even a fuel compartment which was there only for the most desperate situation. It was a shame though, he looked above and saw just how close it was for a metal shard to impale and go through. The engine could've been long lost and his end prolonged. His trickery showed sooner rather than later, while he arranged for the wires to be caught, looking inside the case for something that would resemble a plug. His finger pointed by itself and there it laid, on a lonely corner, it wasn't a plug but a hole. It worked just as well for him, sparks immediately came out upon the content, and he could feel just how aroused the machine got. There was some shaking, or perhaps that came from his feet, though it was obvious it was being charged, until the moment where it stopped. Argus rolled the case and placed it on the ground, making sure it's tightly sealed. He looked around before placing everything where it belonged until he quickly returns with his case inside. With the engine ready to go, seeing how not much of the energy was taken, it was a safe pass through the depths, now with an open case. Argus pulled a mouth and held in one hand while driving. The path ahead seemed seeming easy to follow and the attention wasn't entirely needed, as to excuse using his both hands. 'Now, I hope you work.' There was a pause, though not his usual ones where he cleared his throat and looked ahead. He spoke to the mouth whilst watching, now closer to his face and beard. It asked first. 'Where did you get that scar?' Came the voice of a young woman, slightly distorted, but so did the squarish case around it seem. Broken, distant, almost like a block of metal that laid abandon with a slab of meat pushed on as decoration. 'How do you know I've got a scar?' 'I know now.' His hand released as he saw the snake-like cord wriggle and get pulled back to its place. A musk laid in the air, and it was a shallow thing he made. 'Another.' Argus said as it pulled it at once. 'Where did your friend. I mean how did your friend know where I had the scar? If I had one. Just answer the question.' Those teeth were chattering in spite and it seemed as if it had no voice. The more he looked at them, the more obvious did it appear what for they were made. Right in time, he returned to the road, where he to wait another second he would've fallen below, in the gigantic seemingly endless valley. Blue leaves distant falling from blue leaves, though the ground would've been hard enough to smash his machine with him inside. He turned it only to see the road get twisted and thinner as he went, it wasn't enough for his machine alone to go, as from the distance it appeared to be thinning out even further. Only one would go on foot, even if it were an army to come down, thousands of people would be forced to go one by one as for a deeply stricken line. Argus turned and force it to keep turning and turning until the point where it laid at the edge unable to walk forward and backwards. Sure, the tunnel was too large to be blocked entirely, though at least, if someone was to come and lay upon it, they'd have a hard time, to say the least. He sighed. Now he returned to his mission on foot, with a lightweight, after having decided to take it with him to the end. The gate at the end, it was clear one he got out of the roller, as for it thickly smudged windows, they blocked the true sight of the gate. Compared to it, he was nothing but an ant. Now he understood where the cage laid, on the other side of the valley. Now he went, though there still was something in his mind. Something which made no sense. What broke through and went through the same way as he did? It could be here, still, he remained on high alert. 'Do you know anything about this place?' 'I am tired, and need to rest.' 'You will rest late, once I find out.' 'Please!' Argus didn't know they could reach such high notes from there, though it did leave a piercing shriek as it wanted to be heard. It was agony, the least one could attest to that, to hear it suffer, to be unable to shut it down. 'You will get your rest once we're done and I will be answered. Now tell me of this place.' He gave in after a little more effort from both sides. 'It's dark and empty, but I've been placed here to fill it, that's what I've been told, that's what we've been all told. Can you put me back now? I've finally got some silence in the longest time and I can't handle more sound.' He was quickly returned where he belonged. The others were most likely driven by the same behaviour, so it's been thought. That didn't stop him though, from doing what he did, pulling one after another to get his answers. 'I wanted to.' And the voices quickly interrupted each time at the sound of another voice which wasn't theirs. 'Joy, oh joy, you're back here with us at last. Why do you call?' 'I've got questions.' 'And I've got the answers to everything you ask.' 'Where are we?' 'You must understand that I've got no eyes and I can't really smell anything so do me a favour and describe where we are.' 'Dark, gloomy, I've been going on some stairs for a while, they're leading in a valley, with a giant gate that's well giant."Slower, and from the start, where did you come from?"I've come through a tunnel that leads to the depths of the earth where I found you."It is good enough.'Said the voice now pleased. There wasn't a pause or a wait for Argus to speak again and despite everything said so far and the vagueness shown to the blind box, it began speaking in whispers. Right as he was about to hit the leaves which laid on the ground it said.'Wait.'The straps were there and now the long cord was being attached to his shoulder pocket as if to hold. Argus held his grip tight on the case and find out it didn't cut out the cord as he held, no more than a slight look twice or thrice would be thrown in that direction, as it seemed to be made out of a flexible leather he enjoyed. Still, it was curious it spoke.'Can you hear the silence now?'I can, but it won't last for long if you don't care. You're not the first one who had me."What does that mean?"There was a stinker's look on the mouth as it said it, though he thought them incapable of joking, the gate was still assaulted. It looked as if it came from behind. Blast it, Argus thought. 'Who was it then who came and had you before? Can you tell me?'Indeed, they.'The machine started coughing out oil and other small spots and liquids at once. It was a disgusting display that was shown, not to mention that it would leave the case in a much worse case than before. Argus took another as it turned out by the look of the slightly decayed skin and the opening which turned out to be an eye. It opened and looked directly in both of his eyes as it were spoken with. 'You've not had that there before. Actually, don't explain, we're at the bottom now, have there been other people here before me? Someone who could've touched or spoken to you?'The lips moved dry, and it seemed like the cord in which it extended itself to the box seemed more like a water hose. 'I've no water for the moment, though I am much aware of your dry lips. Here's the deal, if you scratch my back, I will most certainly scratch yours. I will give you all the water you can take.'It was hard to look away, knowing that the one eye was watching. The last step seemed as if it was struck by a long forgotten twilight, metal escaped in bluestone, dark but clean, appearing as if no one has even stepped on it for thousand of years. 'Turn me around.'Said the old voice and it looked. There wasn't any eyelid but a bulging eye that moved, appearing mostly, if not all too surreal to be called an eye. But the bulging replica belonging to a mannequin, as it seemed to never tire and keep going, a small glittering idea followed as it was turned. 'Seen enough?'Though it looked above, the way behind was too far and pointless to go through. 'I did. At least twenty and they were carrying something big.'So did it know too that there was a need for silence?'How did you know that it was the time for whisper?'We all know, we can hear you there, you're a loud one disturbing our silence and sleep. 'If you heard it, then, may I go down and be able to walk freely?'You must hurry if you choose to do so, for they are here and the trap is well prepared. And we were only placed here to make you listen. 'The cord pulled itself back, thrown against its holding pin almost as if it was unannounced and uncared for. Time passed, seconds, minutes, perhaps more, that he glanced and waited, then picked another. Plenty to choose, and the latest one said only. 'Don't touch the leaves and run. Hid under the tree.'At hear it, his attention changed, looking at the falling leaves and the sounds of bells, of which he now became accustomed and aware was obvious. To top it utmostly, there were fragments of the dark which laid in spots of which he couldn't see under nor through. He leapt above and beyond the bed of leaves and never looked back. By now his hand didn't seem as if it existed anymore, having been used to be used only as a carry, be a small tool box, case or even bag. Muscles twitched, his eyes were attentively calculating their last move and the next one soon to be taken. A leap, and another then he ran and stopped as he fell apart and tumbled. Luckily, the landing was utmost bizarrely ending up under roots and a small hole. It was a giant tree with many roots and branches which extended as far as they could be seen. Giant cobwebs and wires laid above, which only needed to glow once in the gloom that it made him think of what could lay between them. Dust and the growth of moss on his foot were now only slightly disturbing as it appeared that the forest was owned by its own will and desire and he was mere a passage. 'Wait.' Four voices spoke, and he pulled them out. 'Take out our battery, for we are now recharged. We may aid you now, for time has come. Pull our box.' 'Push it through.' He did so but didn't entirely understand, though they continued. 'Turn it around, let us face you.' There were plenty of other features now that seemed to have grown while he was unaware of it. Another mouth, an eye on another, nose, twin brows but no eyes. One even came up with a small pair of fingers, as he pushed the box, or attempted. 'It isn't working, what now?' There laid grim sounds, marches around the forests, tall figures in the distance that still haven't seen or figured out he came. This is where he laid and watched, they were as silent as he was. Not even his breath lasted as he saw the first dark and tall armoured men, stepping on the leaves and crushing them, leaving only the sound mirroring a crushed belt. The features were twisted and it appeared as if the joints were outstretched with skin. Over the course of the next few minutes whilst he lay in silence, he saw them become tall, as giants, only for some minor seconds to look around before reverting to their less twisted form. It caught him by surprise that the place which laid in front of the tree laid smouldered. There had apparently been a silent burst as the end of the box, which Argus turned about. There laid a spark and the dark ashen mark as well as a giant hole left by the small burst. Only one face laid now there, silent and aware, standing, deeply lodged in the tree. 'Where are the others?' Argus asked as he held the box up, closer to his breast, seeing something inside of it. 'Only one chance remains now for you if you want to get through. It is what you were destined to do from the very beginning, just like others before you played their roles.' Above, under the shadows of trees, he could see branches coming and extending, tall and wide, far apart but shaken by other trees, as if a net was made between all of the for nothing more but travel. 'You hid this all along inside of you.' He said after pulling out what he thought to be, a perfectly rounded, solid lower part of the face, teeth and all, not a single spot on the tongue, but a perfect replica of his own. It seemed almost like plastic, yet more feathery, less roughed, but coming to it with each second his sweat and dirt came to be. 'What do you want me to do?' 'Put it on. Join us in the final leap or give up and be slain by them.' 'But why?' He asked as he saw from above, the dark blue turned red and a desaturated maple leaf fell. It made no sound but left him disturbed. 'How could.' Even the shimmering seconds in which his voice was close to being silent, he remained slightly watchful around, as, around the corner they laid, the silent watchers in the dark vigilantly looking for his presence. 'I was trapped.' Argus protested. 'You've got a choice, everything so far was your choice and once you put that on, you will have given up your entire. The last remnants of self-control.' 'Who, what are you?' 'Echoes.' 'Echoes.' 'Echoes.' Said the voices from the distance, appearing only as whispers and like the falling of small twigs in the wind for the untrained ear. 'Will it hurt? I cannot do it if it does, they will hear my screams and pinpoint where I lay.' 'We can arrange the rest.' 'So what must I do then? Just place it on and get to the gate?' 'It won't matter after this, whatever you've done and whoever you were will be gone.' 'But, I want to live, I need to live, this is what it's ever been done my attempts to escape and.' 'Your entrapment.' Continued the mouth, sap was protruding out of it now, as it was affected by the tree. There still laid the tooth, which he now grabbed. 'If everything was planned, why do I have this?' 'I am still blind, describe it to me.' 'A tooth, long and cracked, it has some differences. It's not like the others but it's mainly the same, a long sharp tooth, which burst out in flames once it reaches a hard surface."Your timing is quite bizarre, though unplanned. This is your choice still, end your life or throw it out. Does it make a sound of agony?"It used to make a loud noise, and quite an echo once it's done at that too, perhaps even more so depending on what's about to happen after."Good."But you still haven't answered me now, what will I do with the jaw?"Just place it near your own and it will dig it out and replace it."There wasn't any wonder or questioning anymore if it were to hurt or not. It was more than obvious, in his envisioning on it. Argus turned the box around and pushed the case further into the dark. He placed the jaw on the plane surface and turned it around to match his own. A coincidence then? What else could it be, find myself having been forced here with my new jaw, a new part of me stricken and pushed forth and the last tooth just laying here at the right time?"Who made it?"The voice refused to answer and didn't do anything else but slurp the sap which still laid dropping out of it. There was a tongue that suddenly came about and twisted on itself, dropping its harsh skin as it waited. The choice is yours but be wary for they approach. It won't take long anymore until they come near and smell the fear and the pain. I can feel it now as you stare at it in silence."How did you know? You're blind."Silent, or else they will find you. Need I remind you that all was planned? Do you need to have the last moment to remind yourself of the times where all laid calm and quiet? You have only but a chance to do so."Fine, I do want to feel it once again."Only one simple trade.'And it appeared as if the tree itself approached him as the mouth spoke, else he couldn't even have thought of approaching it, even closer, on his own.'Throw it now.'And his hand just pushed it out of his mind. Unaware of what he was doing, Argus threw the tooth out of his reach and pulled away, wriggling in pain. Out of the darkness came a dart, right into the gloom, thrown as a spear, it came through the soft and weak spot between the joint of an armour. There laid a pair of screams and fire burst out, like a delivery's promise of hell. A terror soon came on everyone who watched or gleaned from far out. The mouth gaped as for being pierced, limbs wriggled and it felt as if beasts were forced onto the ground to suffer. Echoes of their screech ran through the forest, piercing as if stricken, amplified by the sound of armour bursting and be torn to pieces. The fall remained the hardest to be taken as the coils lend their hands, outstretched and covered everything under great shadows. Bells rang as the leaves just kept falling and falling in their stream between the tongues of the wind. It came be fast as it ended, feet ran across as they all hurried, along and among them, the flying being emerged and gazed between the areas under the shadow but end up restlessly heading to the fiery point. Flames were about to emerge from above, finally on their way and it seemed as if everything was happening just in time. Stone crumbled, and the bells rang, and at one, though came the fiery blood of the mountain, emerging and embracing everything at hand. The heat came first and the winged beast howled at the fire. It drowned it a little and smoked the already hurt being, who laid supreme and hurt, fleeing in a terror far greater than its own. At last, he dreamed, the small man trapped at the bottom of the ravine, walking without his awareness to the gate. Any point in time he could've chosen to live the vivid memory and it would've served him as well. Though all but lies which he told to himself, all but one which he remembered well. His younger brother and his torture at his own hands, which he felt as if he had deserved it. 'Not here.' Yet he rejected it and pushed his brother, pushed the nurse and everyone who laid before him. 'I don't need the past, I need to know what happened to those that helped me that day, no tricks, no more lies or dates. Just bring me there.' He said as if he was judged, in a room that was empty but square, dark and gloomy, pulled out a mouth appeared, giant, enormous, which, without a doubt could belong to a titan if one thought as such. 'Well.' 'It's your wish and ours, you've done your part. This is the least you deserve. "Thank you." And the mouth received, suddenly the thick mist got pulled under the dark corners, from which he could see now. Now, there laid the room around him, though he laid clothed, his hands appeared yet the same as before, moments before entering the forest. His clothes remained the same, still dirty. "May I move? Can you hear me?" "We can." The voices spoke through walls, just as they did previously, as it was revealed the asylum laid still there. Out of one of the extremities came the mouth and grinned, a smaller version, with eyes and what could be seen as a smaller fraction of a neck protruding out. Yet the metal frame remained around the head. "Get out, it is open at your request." It was as said so, though the other side of the asylum turned out to be the military base. "This is not what I asked for." "But you wanted to see what happened." "I still do, why am I denied it?" "Have you seen the outside of your cage?" The face asked, tied now on a wall that seemed to have decayed. "I can't remember exactly, though I know I have gone through outside when the doctor got me inside. It happened before I passed out, I believe." "Then if you don't remember, and if only fractions are now left to you. You may never know what happened to them." "They're dead." On another corner laid the town, in the sewers, through which he walked, the crowd seemed a lot stiffer, yet their jaws seemed replaced. They walked as they did before, more than a peculiar feeling crept about him and still. Still, it responded from mouth to mouth. "They were never real perhaps, or did you forget." Argus amplified his pace, getting faster with each step, seeing the mouths belonging to something of which they didn't belong to, the shape, the frame and even the colour. Small rats having human mouths. "Never real, never real." "Deceived, deceived." "Come on faster, you're almost there." He hadn't any care for those near which he bumped, yet he could feel the sudden clink of metal, on the ground. Yet nothing so hard could be seen in sight, to make such a sound as if belonging to an anvil. "There." Argus pointed as if to himself and to another, and those men, the woman. The mad. "I've seen you die before my eyes, I know that you were abandoned." "Yet we live and you passed us. Them, the first time you came through, remember?" Now Argus pointed at statues that seemed to be missing arms, were they like that or not? "I remember what she said of the founders, yet I can't explain." He was pushed by everyone around, one by one, like leaves popping out of the ground, tormented to see through something he didn't deserve. "Why did it follow you here?" The abomination even lives in your memory and here, its hunt for you, it wants you to decay. "Fight it, fight it." Suddenly another distant voice came, as it was forced through for him to hear. Argus felt compelled to say, as he was pushed and pulled, jerked by forced that grabbed him and were ready to throw him on the other side. "My. My name is Ferdinand!" He shouted, he yelled, his lungs pushed through and suddenly he felt a sharp shrieking pain through his jaw that made him wriggle inside and almost kneel. To him, beasts lay dead and engineers, no, revolutionaries lay dead. He knew now that what laid here would be a broken mansion, swallowed and gasped upon, seen as if by someone with a much grimmer view of his future and theirs. One who waited as if he was the jailer of the dead. Yet he could see something in the distance, past his memory. And the sound of bells stopped at once as if to remind him where he was, standing at the other side, lost and weary he looked before and realised he stopped at the right time. A few more steps and he would've fallen into the deepest abyss through which his eyes couldn't even dare to pierce. It was as obvious as he thought of it, what would've happened if he let them control him any further. "Is it true then? You wanted to stop me?" The voices didn't speak, but remained silent, as the trees upon which they stood. The energy should've been running out by now, fire pierced though it was no sunlight. The fire erupted from below, and now he looked, for something to get across. It was too far away, and not to mention impossible for a jump, especially with the thought of weariness in his him, he remained ill and taken by fear, strangled by fate. Up and away, the last remnants of the cold wind came and licked his neck, it bore leaves and bells, which slightly distracted until he saw the bridge. There was something coming though, and the steps were all too clear. Ferdinand knelt and shivered into the darkness as he had previously done before to hide from unwanting eyes and waited. Even with the fire coming from the mountain, some areas remained as dark as they have ever been, though it seemed that they weren't as keen with their ears either. He still walked, but slower, looking upon the blisters and fragments of skin falling apart, from the joints between the spots where would've been the armour. It was burnt, and the small was obvious, though even more was the sharp cleaver it wielded and carried, the sharpness and the roughness of the handle which it bore with him. Coming here was a mistake that none could deny, not even him, but neither was death a choice. The machine was already going and twisting, though its colossal size could've blinded a lesser man, he stared in awe for a second, at what he imagined to be an endless space inside, the cage. 'The cage.' He continued out loud, and it was almost as if he had gotten a new strength for saying a secret word of power that was told to him by an ancient force. Now, he needed it the most, as he saw the ruined soldier, dragging by the handle of the cleaver, ready to cut down the bridge. There wasn't any weapon nor did he have any armour, but a jaw that didn't seem to belong to him and the first rock he had gotten on the way, which he picked as he ran. It was at least twenty feet away from the bridge and without a doubt, it wasn't the pain but shock of the foe that finally revealed itself after the hunt began. Though Ferdinand loosened his hands as he leapt and stepped on as many leaves as he could, behind thrusting and throwing the rock at such a speed and force that it knocked the handle out of its hand and threw it on the ground, wriggling in shock. Before it could get up, he attempted to pick up the weapon though he failed immediately since it remained too heavy and instead chose to go through, as fast as he could to attempt to get on the other side of the bridge. It was a deep, long run as he chose to not look behind, hearing the wail and the voices come up from the slumber. Still, it was close, closer than he thought or dreamed about, until he felt it wriggle and looked back in a moment of fear and wonder, how would it end? Ferdinand didn't know, though he grabbed the rope that held a part of the bridge and held it as it broke and fell. Only a few steps remained, even though the bridge was being taken apart. 'Don't do it!' A moment of confusion came to be, as he was holding on a single rope, marking and walking only by his hands, without an inch of wood or solid ground to stay upon, he was ready to fall into the abyss. It had only worked for seconds until his fate was sealed, as the cleaver headed down and started slowly cutting through the rope. It was a lot hardened than it seemed but Ferdinand tried nonetheless to get through, inches away, he was stopped, seeing his hands shiver at the pain once the last thing which held the bridge failed. He would've fallen if it weren't for both of his hands, being rubbed against it, making them red as he forced himself to still stay on. It was a chance, he could've died, but the cleaver than thrown from the distance, almost at a faster pace, managing to almost get through to him. It was at this moment that he let go, choosing to die into the abyss rather than at the hands of such a fiend. He closed his eyes and saw everything darken, his feet might've touched what had remained of the wood, though he didn't look back. The expectation would've been at least hours if it weren't for the sudden realisation that he fell on the other side of the bridge. His hands jerked and moved around the wood until they reached the plane upon which the bridge was laid upon. 'Rock. I'm still alive.' His hands jerked even more as they came across his face in wonder that he was still alive, luckily enough to do so. A cave which was laid in front of the abyss. Though no time for celebration, it seemed as if the cleaver wasn't lodged hard enough into the stone to be left there for generations. Presumably, it fell down moments after he decided to venture forward. An eco laid as the metal came falling and bounced against the ground. Perhaps, it was for the best, he thought, and the previous attempts to lift the weapon have ended in failures which he still remembered sorely. It wasn't much, as he remembered the mountain bleeding, that the abyss would be drowned in it, and at that very moment it could even trap and burn him too if he hadn't escaped. Still, the screams were obviously there, as trees and leaves continued burning, though even more obvious were the mouths. Now discovered, even as they burnt they remained attacked, stricken through by long lances, against which they couldn't defend themselves but try to deafen them a little further. Though each attempt turned out to be reckless and pointless as they couldn't be stopped in the last hour of desperation. Lances, swords and axes came upon and cut through tree and leaves and chewed the ground upon which they walked, only to break everything apart and find nothing. There wasn't any spot for a voice, only soft joints which stretched at the time and failed to see. Unfortunately one fell on its neck, seen as residue and ignored, it bore through and took control. It happened at the back, so it failed to see it coming, though now one moved and managed to come around silently, filled with rage for its fallen brothers. A piercing shriek came one the lance came and bore through the back of the leg and cut through. The small creatures crawled onto one leg into the dark and kept wriggling there away from sight, unable to lift itself from above. Seen by someone, quickly another one came from above. Enough time had passed for it to jump and decapitate the other, cutting through the metal and through the prosthetic material which formed the mouth. Even as they fell, the blood refused to mix on the ground but fell nonetheless. Now they were aware of their presence. Thorough the net and branches they cut through, and to their surprise, or at least some of them, another one fell to be controlled and attacked. It was a duel of swords which happened in-between the chaos of fire and the gate. From it suddenly came a chill and a distraction, from which, a foot became slippery and fell. Another agent was killed, and another mouth pretending to be hiding away in the dark. Slowly, it bore through the skin, digging much deeper than it was supposed to. There needed to be a certainty of their control, which could only be achieved if they took over their hearts or brains. And indeed, it was warm, warm, forever feverishly warm inside the body, the skin armoured and the head, it brought pleasure as it was forced against the frame. Had it been Argus, it would have rejected, as he barely took the jaw and resisted. Now they knew to have been betrayed and turned around towards the spot they knew where he went. Inside the dark, a blob of darkness fell, and suddenly one single armoured beast stopped wriggling in the dark and started crawling to the gate. Another one had no head, but still, enough space for one of them to come in. It wasn't long that they were outnumbered, two or three now jumped and came inside one of the soldiers, in a desperate attempt to go on. And then came the lost one without a weapon and without any possible defence. It looked at them, all assimilated and controlled and turned around, seeing how there was nothing left for it to do. Limits were reached, though all were greeted by no bridge. 'Where did he go?' 'Find him fast before he reaches the gate and opens it.' 'Fools.' The headless body interjected with a needlessly sharp voice. It seemed as if it had some authority over the other, at least, sort of speaking, in terms of who took charge and who listened to whom. 'Keep it quiet for he may hear us, or have you forgotten the gift we have given to him? We're close enough that we may hear each other if he decided to speak. Look there!' He pointed at the abyss, through which the bridge was still in the process of being swallowed. It was dark though there was a doubt. 'He's not dead, at least not yet, though Argus. I know you can hear us, especially now, but you must give up and turn around, we've outnumbered you.' With that, some four from the ranks outstretched, then took a head start before they leapt to the other side with their thin and light bodies. They felt like feathers being lifted and carried by the wind, pushed forth, further and further upon the sky. Magma came in force and scorched the ground upon which they used to walk. There wasn't any way out anymore, not for them or for any other in their position, and since there was no escape, and there seemed to be only the darkest tall corners of the room, there was revealed not to be any escape for them either. 'We're all stuck together Argus, waiting for our deaths, why don't you come and join us now? It will be over soon enough, just come with us and it will be swift.' 'Do we not serve the same master? Do we not?' 'Listen to me Argus, just listen to me, ignore the others and focus only on me.' It was the voice of the old man, barely audible from the distance. Ever since they first contacted him, he seemed to have remained alone, deeply lodged inside a tree, standing and waiting in silence. Some time remained at least until the fire would burn him to a crisp, though there was just enough left for them to converse. 'You are alone and still trying to find a way to open the gate but have you forgotten of what lays beyond it? Have you forgotten the rewards?' There was suddenly a voice which came from all of their sides and angles, as it was made, closely to impossible to be tracked. 'Didn't you want to do the same thing? Isn't that why you forced me to ruin my face, my jaw? You wanted me dead and now regret the fact that I broke out of your control.' It was clear to him, even rallied ancient caves and long forgotten stone formations that something laid near. The cage was running deep through the stone, not to mention that it too, ran deeper than he had ever imagined. If the gate was colossal, this was a hundred times bigger than he had even imagined, going further to the depths. Though no immediate need called for him to go there, he could see that that was a path, a small crawling spot that bounced in-between the material and the stone. Abruptly set and perhaps dangerous, he had thought of it only as a last resort, though he'd be trapped like a rat, now Argus looked around and read the words in his mind. They were much more comprehensible than he would've thought, but still fragments of words and gaps. Something was obvious in all of it. 'I've been waiting for you. Words were spread in long valleys of smashed text, crushed walls in stone. Someone had been here before him and he couldn't deny the fact. Some time passed and already the silence started disturbing him, this was a dead end after all and he couldn't do anything to save himself from his current conundrum. There were coins everywhere sculpted in stone, out of which some were just left to be picked. No doubt, the appearance would've been taken of that of gold, and perhaps it could've served as a distraction for someone less interested than what he was. Ferdinand took no more notice of the damned silence and slipped into the crack in the stone and started guiding himself to the bottom of it. The iron felt numbing, for the journey was more than long and it could still be felt against his body. His mind just as tired as he heard the speech. 'I've found you, little worm. Your cave is near.' There were several voices that could be heard, though they were late in finding him. Soon, the valley would be entirely covered in the blood of the mountain and so would the abyss. An illusion came to life, as both his feet started becoming part of what the gate, and in no time, as the stone thinned out, he saw nothing in front of him but a waist, soon absorbed inside the cage. Argus was safe now, though hurt, hearing the silent cries and the bitter song of drums which came from inside. 'Am I free now? Have I done what I was asked for?' But suddenly came a voice and said. 'Not yet.' And with that, Argus came back to the realisation after floating through an array of iron, he was thrown on the other side. The sky was trembling and devouring the sand with small sand spikes and sand-pikes which were hewn and thrown all around. He had gotten just in time to witness the siege. Without a doubt, after having figured out on his own that he could be heard again, he asked. 'Is this your cage?' 'You have found me at last.' The voice answered it was much more stern, stronger, deeper, and the multitude of voices that accompanied it was just as strong as the main one had appeared to be. 'Why can't I see you then?' 'It's been a long road and I'm still greeted by illusions.' 'This is why you came, little insects are drawn to the flame. You must shut it down from inside, an intruding organism that found its way here. And the price must be paid.' Sand turned black into his eyes and siege machines twisted with skin. Those armies he used, from their uniforms, could be seen and taken as ancient kingdoms that had been. White robes, tall white horses and spears in both hands. Archers and knights, though now they had been decay. The way ahead appeared as a different world, yet every time Argus looked about, he could see an end, where all blended and melted to form the face of the trapped creatures, who looked at his every step and move. A distinct shade of grimdark came to be in-between the spot where his face started and the one where the sky began. 'Why haven't you found it yourself then?' Suddenly, skin became grim and cut, overlapping stones formed on top of the sand, enough and spread for Argus to be able to freely jump from one to another. Without a doubt, he feared, though he had mastered it just as he had done it in the past. It appeared as if it was only one head, though he had remembered of seeing at least two or three additional ones in his visions or at least the last time when they spoke. Though it kindled as it waited, Argus looked it in the eyes and asked. 'Could you reveal yourself and stop playing your games? You made me come here with a reason, to get out of your cage! And yet, you're still playing and attempting to do so even in the last moments of your imprisonments.' It was a grim laughter that came out of it, which made more than bringing shivers down Argus' spine. It was enjoying itself, perhaps too much to be called as such. 'I've been doing this for far longer than you could ever imagine. Yet you try to deny my please since you came thither to my torment?' The sand seemed to have been pulled away, revealing the skin under it and the layered cage. It was a grim metal, almost ancient and clean, that had no crack, nor dent or anything on it. Tendrils might've been latched all over and spread as if they tried finding even the smallest crack or hole that could've been used to escape, though even that was a failure for it. 'There is no escape and others have tried. Why would I even heed your call?' It was an unsettling gaze that was bored into Argus, though not even he could deny the sturdiness of the cage. And, whilst standing there in front of it, he pulled himself aside and asked. 'Why did you call me then if you knew this was for nothing? So much wasted time, for both of us.' 'Do not question me you worm!' Out of the sudden, the army that laid near was blown to dust in the coming storm. There laid the sea and Argus couldn't help standing anymore but tried to swim so he wouldn't drown. The waves were running up and down, and the first second he managed to find a safe plank to stand upon, he stood jumped upon it. Far away, there were a few pairs of boats that were just roaming the sea, and one seemed to be approaching his general direction, though it was already too hard to see with the wind. The leaves obviously didn't belong to this place, or so he thought until he saw an island. It was late to turn about, but above of him, through the dark clouds, his face was hidden and forced to the depths. Suddenly it reappeared, and every voice it spoke at once. 'We can drown you, we can eat you. We can have the sea mammals rip you apart. Do not deny what is given to us now, oh small being that came. We've waited for far too long to be freed ever since we've been left here to rot.' It came from below, and now, suddenly Argus released both his hands and took a deep breath. His hopes remained that he'd take as much of it inside his lungs as he could before he was bored away to the depths. Ascending through the water, the glorious blue and ultramarine vision was greeted by great rings of small fish. Whales as big as he could see to the bottom of the sea, and a distance that went even further than the deepest depths of the Earth. He even thought of having seen a distance that went even deeper than the maximum capacity of his cage. After a few tries, he returned to above, seemingly taking a longer distance to reach. So, it was obvious, as Argus noticed, as the first thing that the clouds were getting just as close to him as he got to them. He's somewhere down below hiding now. It was indeed a test of time, to wait and see who would give it up. 'If I die.' The leaves and the wind got harsher, even for him to take. His mouth was full of salt water and there have been a few good gulps he had taken, not to mention that it managed to replicate the exact feeling the sea had. It must've seen it before, even the animals, what could you be then? Argus was so deeply caught in his thought that for a second he forgot what he was about to say. The sudden screech and piercing thunder suddenly reminded him. 'If I die, no one's going to be left to save you from here. Trapped forever with a cursed corpse, drowned and battered, or eaten or forgotten. Is that how they all ended? No wonder why you've been left here alone for an eternity.' The water's sudden uprising was grabbed to a halt, as well as the harshness of the storm. There wasn't any stopping of the boat, which was still heading for him, though he couldn't deny the fear that had crept inside of him when it started being overtaken by rage. It was a giant squid that roamed from the bottom and sewn under his, going into round circles and never stopping its leaps inside the water. At least a few tricks of its knowing, but the voice spoke again. 'Then will you free me? So I guess. Others tried and failed, as have I in my position.. 'A crackling boil came from the bottom and ate two ships into a vortex. Something it has said made it wrong. Could it be that?' No more games, climb up. 'The sudden release of the anchor left room for a stop. Also, there had been a pair of ropes lowered for him to climb on, and get onto the deck. His feet slammed the ground fast and his lungs were emptied of all the water, rightly on the floor. His eyes were red, his neck was sore and Argus couldn't deny his weariness and hunger. There laid run and food of the table, they've belonged to the crew, though they appeared to be the furthest thing from a human. Acting like small mannequins, they stood there motionless, barely moving or trying to act as what that creature believed humans acted like. Even if the chances of the food being poison was great, he felt the need to eat, for he was starving alone. 'Now.' The tentacles suddenly came from the bottom and in comparison with the ship, they were colossal, and not only in size but girth. The sticky substance just came and crawled as if it was made by millions of small parasites that marched in lines to cover the sail and crawl through the wood. 'I can't wait, I can't wait, I will not wait for another second, though I must entertain you now, my guest. You've come far, and only for me.' But Argus couldn't be bothered to listen, as he focused on giggling and devouring as much as he could in the little time remaining. He had taken notice of what was happening to the ship, even though at the time he couldn't have cared less for either the destruction or the others. His mouth was full, though he was aware of just how slow it went, for a sea beast of such magnitude, the sail would've been immediately taken down. It's toying with me now, though I'm in no position to take a rash decision. Thought Argus while slowly being trapped under his own eyes. Its restlessness was almost as predictable as its unstable nature. And so it revealed to be much obvious after seeing the skin melt down and become part of the wood, it wanted Argus to turn his attention to it and cower in fear. What could be described as rage for a human, this was ten times worse than it could've ever been. Madness, prowess and the sails were thin, just as transparent as they now were. The thin ship was pushed against the wind and suddenly the tentacles started closing in. The sails were quickly reformed before it pulled back, but not until fully modifying the ship to its desire, only to become a balloon attached to it. With a sudden surprise, the tentacles were ripped apart from their embodied parts and crushed the latter side of the ship. Leaving a wreckage to be lifted in the air and head towards the unknown in the sky. 'You still don't understand, do you? Others came here to challenge me. Only to end up failing just as you did before.' The dark clouds cleared in small spots of blue within white where he could see what really was the only wait out for him. A route as he may go. 'But why did you bring me here? I ask you again, all the things you've said and done have no reason to have happened if they only did so so you'd get a new toy. Are you even him?' Out of the clouds formed a dark and long shape. With a long beard made of trickling lightning which came closer and further in through its eyes. It looked Argus in the eyes but didn't dare to exchange any word with him. Such thing wouldn't have happened if he dared said he was who he claimed to be. But, then again, it chose to float around and pay attention to his body movement and ponder what was to be done with him. 'Bring me down immediately so we may converse!' At his will, the cheeks started growing and overexpanding with air, but it didn't happen as he planned. Argus wasn't brought down but instead, he got through around and faced a wave of water. Schools of fish came all around him and passed his body in a cooling terror as clear water became red. His arm remained wrapped around the broken pole which was lodged into the deck floor. As hard as he remained against it, his small spot became a grinder for the forced life that was constantly being thrown against him. Yet he didn't yet give up, it had to listen. Though no time remained for him to speak unless he wanted water in his lungs. Seeing how he still didn't let go, the water stop and a gust of wind broke through like one hundred precise strokes from wind blades that cut deep and steeply. His eyes lost sight and for a moment the sky was dark and there laid no water but a red, stone-like land filled with mountains and corpses and decayed and abandoned on the road. It was a peculiar sight to be the only one wet in a land with no water wherever he could look. In hindsight, he was mistaken in giving Argus the time and resources to satisfy the hunger and thirst which had haunted his spirit for so long. 'Where are you hiding now? Can't you see that I'm getting tired of your games? You're not him, a fake one, that's the only thing you are, a decoy?' 'You dare insult me in my own lair?' His thundering roar broke a path through the mountain and left a fiery path in-between his sides. The sight of the molten rocks was unnerving. Especially since he knew that the pain felt if he were to touch them was just as real as him. 'Yes, I dare confront you about it. Show yourself and your true form and despair. I was brought here for a reason and lost too much time doing so. To be toyed around by some impersonation is plain madness and he knows it well.' 'So where are you parasite?' A pair of glimmering red eyes showed themselves in the darkness. This time it appeared as if the eyes were the same size like his, though the distance was far enough for him to be wrong. It could still be a trick made to deceive him. 'Please, we could work together, this is why I came here, there is only one end to our torment.' The voice suddenly seemed picked from a pair of many. With intonations and accents, as he went shuffling through them until it picked the right one. Young, at least in his forties, sort of speak, though one couldn't deny the fact that it left the feeling of something ancient behind each spoken syllable. 'Why would I want to leave now? So you could take my place and replace my task for an eternity? Is this why you were brought here.' A red haze started coming outside from rocks, red and yellow could be seen as spread around, though no fire arose at his will. I need to calm him down before he does something rash. Argus hasn't found a time to look around but saw the limits of his powers. The carcasses of broken sea life were just there laying around, trying to swim on the ground, yet failing to move. Their bodies weren't boiled alive as he noticed. And the most important of all is the fact that not a second had passed. Those glittering red eyes hadn't stopped looking in his direction and waited for him. At least until it got impatient and said. 'What are you stalling for? Are you trying to start a bargain with me?' The crackling of wind broke through stone and pulled the water out. All of the sudden, the damp field of metal and twisted cords revealed itself. In front of Argus now stood the giant growth which had long been tied to the wall and spread around. The appearance had belonged to someone who could only be called a worshiper of the skin and there wasn't any doubt to whom he resembled. Now Argus laid in front of the ghastly figure, speechlessly looking around at the prison in which he was as trapped as the one in front of him was. 'For how long have you been trapped here?' 'Ever since I was called upon and have answered the call of my master. The same as you have done.' The skin overlapped as with bellies tied with one another, yet only one head laid small and shrill at the top of the body, glaring at it. It seemed as if there wasn't a movement to be had, other than the toying with illusions. 'Smoke and mirrors, tricks and illusions. Is this all that you've been doing all this time? You've grown like a glutton and waited for someone to come, isn't that right?' It boiled it to hear the harsh words, though there wasn't anything it could do to prove him wrong. Indeed, the cage has taken him to a grim promise, yet, when he was drawn like a moth to the flame, it didn't get what it wanted. 'There were others.' And what happened to them? You keep telling me to them, pointing where there's nothing to be seen. This time, there was the image of a long time ago, as it didn't bother to create anything around. It might've seen like something resembling a glimpse of something of a power, now it only seems like a frail little insect, flaccid and easily bent after seeing just how he resisted. Far, deep, not enough to be out of his sight, Argus looked at the formation of skin, popping out from the ground and taking the form, a figure, that seemed to be human soon after. Clothed, black robes, then another was created, to resemble a woman, someone tall, one short, another one shorter and even a child was there. 'They're the ones?' The parasite didn't respond to Argus but looked aghast at the memory. 'They seemed so real when they first came and looked upon my form. He didn't kill them. Where are they?' There was a pause as they form just got pulled back into the ground. Argus knew that there must've been a time when they both saw and encountered the same message as it was shown to him long ago when he was forced to take on the journey. He looked at the body close and saw the shapes attempt to wrestle out of the skin. 'His punishment, even that, you've decided to take it upon yourself for the failure. Yet, the biggest failure of them all it's you. The body had no arms or legs, though it was obvious from the jerking of its ears and of lobes that it wanted to cover from sight. How did you come to this?' 'It's been a parasite, they were created for this reason alone, to sap and eat through it, to tap the machines and despoil its bones.' And you've taken a hold of it in the end. But what about them? You've killed them, made the others a part of you. 'No, no no.' There came the sudden burst of emotion as it jittered then and there. 'They did it on their own accords, they chose to do it. I've given them a choice to live in my world, but all chose the same. They feared what lay below.' What lays below than to be feared by those who came here looking to free him? 'With a glance, it seemed as if there was a set of locks that blocked something from its bottom. His cage, his real cage is underneath, isn't it?' The small head nodded in agreement, those crooked teeth shivered even at the thought of it. Compared to the real thing, he was nothing, just an abomination which took its corrupted form. 'I had no chance to stop the corruption from spreading and blocking the locks.' 'I presume that none of them managed to come through and free the thing, isn't that right? Hence they chose to end their lives rather than starve to death. 'Such a waste, Argus thought, despite the fact that it was needed anyway. 'What happened, happened, how do we open it then?' 'If I had known the answer, do you think I would've stood there decaying?' 'You're dying?' It was a surprise that even he, who masked himself as diving admitted to his own demise. It was coming and seemingly fast and swift, something was crawling under his skin, though the reason for it was unknown. 'Explain then, how is it that you're dying then?' 'You seemed to have evolved and grown, your illusions seemed real.' 'To you, but for me, you haven't taken a step ever since you came here to be trapped with me. This is the reason why. But now I am weary and it takes a lot to entertain someone else other than me.' There was a pause as to take its breath back. 'As for your other question, this parasite wasn't meant to resist long without sustenance and I'm afraid that taking us wasn't enough to save it. 'I'll be trapped all alone. Is there no way out then?' 'Protested Argus, who seemed to be gazing at his own demise now, a gluttonous mass which was long promised to take him on ever since he stepped on. Now, he started taking some steps and saw the eyes widen. He remained still. There had never been a way out, has there?' 'So they all chose death instead of trying to find even the smallest crawling hole?' 'We were doomed ever since the journey began.' It said whilst standing, though even its body seemed to be an illusion, tightly laid and stretched, the skin seemed to be too clean and uncropped to be tainted. Henceforth, Argus took another look and asked it then. 'Is your body really decaying then, so could it be that it's an illusion behind it too?' 'You don't seem to be starved.' 'I could say the same for you too little man.' 'Though it was true that the sickness was returning, what he thought to have eaten wasn't there anymore.' 'You're right, I can. I can feel it come back, but how?' 'It's only but a trick to manipulate the mind so it ignores the consequences. You've been accustomed to it even before we've met, have you not?' 'It was indeed some things which they shared.' 'So is my fate to starve to death?' 'If I am to die here and now, you may feast upon my body and survive. It's soon approaching and I'm afraid that I've lasted for so long just for your arrival.' 'Just in time once again.' 'There may be no escape for you.' Said the body. It's been some time since he had opened its mouth to speak, though that happened no longer. Every word was spoken just came out of its mouth. 'But I will die of thirst.' 'No longer, it stored just enough to last you a lifetime.' 'Then why is it dying then?' 'If it has.' 'No, it's cerebrum was replaced by mine. My organs were taken from my mind, and I've lasted just enough lifetimes for my mind to decay as well as my body. Now, you're its only hope, until the next one comes and attempts to free it from its prison.' 'Damn you, and damn him at the bottom of his wicked cage. There's no way out for me or anyone from this hell. Do I have no choice but to wait and be driven mad by all of this?' 'There is still a chance that you may find a way to the bottom and release him from his torment.' 'Argus needn't a break anymore and started, as he remained, no longer trapped or forced to hurry by impending doom. He looked once more at the moulder of decay and said. 'Go back to entertaining yourself while you have it, I'll focus on finding a way out for both of us or none.' With that, he went along and for the first time, as he laid without any distraction, looked around at the vast valley of grim metal. It was chiselled, though as nothing he had seen before, if he thought that the marble floor in the depths was perfect, by comparison, he was proven wrong. There were no cracks, no leaks, no dents, just a pure complexion which was left on it. Everything was in its place as the vast mechanism just stood there unmoved, slightly lifted from the floor. There were plenty laid around to form patterns and forms, some longer, some smaller, other jointed and seemingly ready to move if forced to. If everything was laid so, and it seemed as if to work. 'Why has no one. Turned the machine?' 'No answer came, it had gone some time ever since he had told it to return to its endless dream. The so-called magic which laid behind it went away and revealed the starvation which had long taken care of it. Pink became yellow, desaturated with empty holes of dark green which had discoloured liquids falling from them. Yet the liquid didn't seem to speed as it fell on the ground but stand adjacently in drops. A material which didn't do anything but rejects it. 'Can you even hear me? Has someone tried to take it on? To start.' Still, no answer, as he saw it, Argus didn't bother. Instead, he was the one bothered by it, as he thought of a riddle which none of his predecessors seemed to have figured it out. Devices laid around and it seemed that a parasite had taken place inside of it. They outstretched rightly under him, blocking their way. And now, he had ridden and gotten there just in time that its death would come at hand. It was clear which was the reason of the placement behind the parasite, though instead of eradicating it, he was forced to grow and to change. 'Into you. Hey, hey, listen to me, wake up from your dream immediately!' Argus shouted in a haze as he ran towards it as fast as he could. Without being bothered by tripping or wrongfully stepping, he approached the mass but stopped. Already there had been some experience in dealing with abominations such as the one he saw in front of his eyes, hence he stopped right before the liquid. Eyes remained pale on the mass, though at once moved when it saw that Argus moved as well. Some time passed in which he waited silently for it to answer, not to waste any energy. He heard it speak at last, in the moments of fear, in the hour of despair. 'What do you want of me to do? Can you not see me suffer?' 'You're not the only one that matters here when you've got the best part of the deal. You have every spot and the possibility to live your deepest fantasies for as long as a couple of human lives, perhaps more than that. And yet you complain.' 'My body is dying, can you not understand? Do you feel no pity for a dying old man?' Angered by it, Argus lashed at the mass. 'You're nothing but a beggar, and there were no more years left to give.' 'Those weren't overlapping layers from its growth, but its age. Clearly, he had lived for far too long, more than it is normal for a human to live. Argus wanted it to end. Yet he was denied.' 'No judgement from the dead, I swear on your corpse that I will get to the bottom of this and then escape.' 'Have my blessing then.' Said the creature in form of mockery. It was obvious that it hated being in his presence as much as he felt the same and neither of them could change it. 'Will you help me then?' 'How could I? Other than offering you a swift escape and fall into unconsciousness, anything else is beyond my power.' 'But that'd only be done so you could live longer, it won't help me at all.' 'Wouldn't you do the same if you were in my place? To have a life ever long lasting but the exchange is to be alone.' There laid an uncertainty as if he wasn't sure on his own words, too much has he decayed since the last time. And even longer has it been since he called himself a human or anything resembling such a thing. He laid there still, trying to force himself into another dream, only to forget that he knew that no one entering him would extend his life. There had been tendrils coming out, though now they withered with him, ever since he had taken shape and control, it went into his last leap, his last stand. 'I've never asked for any of this.' 'And still, you speak to me only of your punishment and torment. Perhaps you deserved all of this because you failed.' 'Argus' finger was crooked as he pointed at him, seeing how he came there to free the beast but ended trapped with it. Time after time, argument after argument passed back and forth between them and nothing came to a resolve. Then, all of the sudden, one thing started to happen, each word Argus said had been revealed to carry some weight, more than he expected. It burned through the skin, which ended up disintegrating in front of his eyes as he spoke. Such a best, to be subjected to stress, no wonder it has lasted so long with no one to oppose or to attempt to strike at it. 'This is the answer if your body is gone, we will be able to cut through and open the mechanism blocking the cage.' Unless. Argus looked reluctantly at it. It could be a trick of the mind, something that forced him to believe only as a last resort to trick him there. It's been some time since it stopped talking and just looked at him. Perhaps there had been hours or days, more, perhaps that he would've thought. No certain way remained for him to tell, neither of the time nor of the tricks. He still had dominion there and the walls blocked everything that went outside. Still, no thirst, no hunger, they would've crept by now, and it was indeed in his ability to trick him into believing they weren't there. Minutes, hours, more if it were to be, didn't matter anymore, the need for certainty of not being under his control had to be established. Think Argus, think. You've travelled a lot and others tried to move you into the right direction. Have you even walked past your bed, could it be that you're into a celestial and everything that happened was only a trick? But how could that be? Why would it create such vastness and such a road so long? Does it have the power? 'Could you at least speak to me now? I need to know something.' 'What is it?' Even the voice slowed down, its bitter fallen lips now resembled the pair of overlapping skin lashes which got mid-way into being melted and stretched. They hadn't been stuck to the top of its belly, have they? 'Do you have a way of telling if we're inside one of the celestials I've been reading about? Nothing made sense, of which I've been through so far.' 'Nothing ever does with them, does it? Yet there may be or may not be. Ask yourself then, does it even matter? Has it ever?' This left him as dumbfounded as he was after entering the cage. Spending as much time with him was already determining to his mental health, which was already getting worse as the time went on. Damn you. 'I keep doing it all over again.' Yet he forgot where he was. No, he forgot something even worse, though now, in the moments where he had been thinking of it, there were fragments of a voice. 'Can you hear him then? From time to time? You've been here longest of us all.' It was tired, not to mention hurt by what was going on, that he could barely hold his form. Another silhouette was formed out of his skin, not as far, it managed to make a larger piece of its skin crawl and push itself further until it reached and made him. Not entirely accurate, though the vastness was mostly kept. It seemed to have been different than it was, resembling nothing close to human or animal, or even any of the terrors he had seen of the way. 'You did see it too.' The small head nodded, though even that gave slight hints of the pain which he felt. Does it still remember then? My name? Argus kept his name hidden, for the time being, there wasn't any immediate need for it to hear him say. He laid in his small bed of leaves and dreams, hazing in and out, in a sudden glance of those pale eyes which became even paler. Worst of all, it was still enormous and decaying in front of his eyes. Laying flat on his arse he looked in wonder. Has this thing also been given a name to be controlled? I haven't asked for it as of now. There was an odourless scent creeping around and it could only be dimly seen as fragments of a nimbus. It was bizarre as it could be felt as the smell of a garden, then suddenly it became dimmer. Once Argus became aware, he rolled away, slightly a few paces from where he had encountered it. 'So this is how you're tricking my sense of smell. Quite a nice trick.' He said in almost a whisper to himself before looking around. Again, once he became more aware of it, he could see the slight raising of the scent before it was hidden away, alternating between a mist and its form. Still, he had yet to ask and shout. 'What is your name?' 'What?' It asks baffled as if just awakened from a long endless dream. There had been already plenty of occurrences where it laid there looking pale before being woken up, and every time it did so. It took a toll, to say the least. Both on its mind, as it started turning more into a mindless animal, struck by dumbness in the middle of the storm. 'I asked for your name, can't you even remember that? Has it been so long since anyone asks of it? Surely you must remember." "I do not." "You haven't even tried to remember, you've just brushed it off as if it was nothing. Pff." The smoke blown out of his mouth was thicker than the mist, and even hotter, at least a few degrees. "My name is Ferdinand. In case you were wondering." Out of the sudden, he was forced aware, with anguish in his eyes, he cowered at the sound of his name. There was something in that name which brought fear, but what? "I said my name is Ferdinand, what's wrong with it?" "The name of his beast, no, stay away." The sudden release revealed a multitude of voices he couldn't control. Voices that still belonged to him, yet they were different versions, for each man or child that came to him he evolved and so did his voice. Now their echoes ran wild as they feared. The small head cocked and pushed itself further into the body, and in front of him now he laid unaware. The meat was pushed and formed itself almost like a pillow, forced to say there blind, rather face him now, once his name was given. "I am no beast but a man. Will you not face me now? I am aware that you're dying, you can't find it anymore." The odourless turned to the stench, perhaps a defence mechanism, he thought. Nonetheless, it couldn't strike at him and he was already dying. "But I've no time to wait in here for a lifetime for neither you or anyone else. You came here for a reason and one alone, to remove the parasite and yet you failed. One after another, they all failed." The hands and legs which were inside tried wriggling out, jerking themselves and stretching out. They were trapped, as the light dimmed. Such stench as he now felt forced him to stand erect now. "Have you even made the lights brighter? Is light here even just an illusion? Reveal it now, if you fear the name so badly." "Do not say it, I beg of you." Argus revealed the name again in a loud voice. "Ferdinand, is that what you wanted to hear?" Almost no light came, but the dark shapes and the lavender haze which dimly crept. He approached now slowly to the mass, wanting to see it closer. Seen as a beast approaching its prey, he thought he remembered a liquid that fell not long forth. It wasn't there anymore. "Where are you hiding?" Argus ran immediately and didn't stop, despite barely being a glimpse of light, he felt like he had memorised everything he had even seen. "I know you're here." He continued, and yet he didn't stop, there could've been miles long, stretched by the darkness and peril laid at hand. Am I really the beast of his reckoning? "I need to know, I am no beast. The only thing I've done was in hopes that I would be released and yet you, of all that I have met just decided to judge me? Why now? How come." "No more questions." The voice was stronger and pushed itself to point of being monotone. The tone itself was grim and slow, the articulation jittery and hidden in darkness. It thought of him to have been easy until that name came to be. "I found." Argus stopped and realised he was the one who got caught dumbfounded and alone. His hands could barely move as well as his legs when he had realised that the mass of meat, the dark parasite had moved. "You've tricked me, haven't you? You're not human, you were never." It was too late to look around, there hadn't been a way it could traverse anywhere unnoticed unless it could fly or hover in the air. No, this couldn't be, he thought. Unless it crawled. His eyes turned to the ceiling and the dark figure suddenly noticed that his attention was snapped from the darkness and gazed directly upon in. Then the bulk released itself from above and fell on him. The softness lowered the blow as he saw it coming and laid flat on the floor. No pain was felt, yet air managed to find a way in. At the same time, all of his limbs started jerking and moving, all at once, until he could master them no longer and they passed out of his control. An inner fury woke him upon, yet he saw only the body creepily embracing every part of him in fear. The texture of his skin felt like that of a dying snail, a foam suddenly having formed around his body before softening. What used to be a hard protective layer now laid rendered still. Foam engulfed the air into small bubbles travelling to him, something which he would've noted as bizarre. At least so if would've been if he weren't busy fighting the growth. His eyes peered inside as he saw it jerk from notch to notch, crawling into his teeth and attempting to pull them off. To this immediate threat, Argus jerked even more and ripped its tendril in his mouth and spat through the foam a small bloody bit of it. Such pain it felt that through the foam he was thrust outside, still caught by it as a small fly in the net. In horror, he saw that it wasn't a human but the parasite was present there, in its full dark form. Its dampness still crept along the walls, spread as far as he could see, trying to drink out of the cage and what it made it work. His feet suddenly regained stability and he could stand, yet unable to walk backwards, he was being slowly dragged back. The foam started pulling him back into the mass. An opening came to be and it was revealed that the outside of the mass had more of an outlandish appearance. Bone spikes sticking out and pushed ever further as he approached. A small rigged mouth with small teeth suddenly revealed itself laying at the bottom stuck in a wide open position. Argus having no escape resumed to the only thing that seemed to work. 'I'm Ferdinand, have you forgotten my name then?' Like a crackling fever, the foam started boiling until it dissipated and rejected him, throwing him on the side of the ground. The beast was in motion, though it was only now that he realised that it was him. Indeed, he looked upon its wild shape and how it was trying to crawl away to an assault. The many teeth got immediately pulled themselves as they waited for yet another chance to strike at him while unaware. 'Not again, you will not find me in the same position as I previously was.' With that, he ran and grabbed the near tendril. It was the thing and long, lodged into what once appeared to be a perfect impenetrable tolled ground. Now, it seemed that it's been feeding and piercing through. A hole was left as he was pulled with it. The stickiness it had managed to help him stay and get caught on it while it shook violently. And not even then did Argus give up on what he needed to do. 'I will remove you when others failed. Cover again, if you fear that name so rashly.' And as he began repeating it time after time, it started foaming all around its thick body. From the small entrances from which its spiked bones came, out of the suddenly poured oil, enough to drown itself in it or to bathe. At least it seemed to encompass the foam and mix with it and fall below. It remained to the bottom, as the others tendrils were pulled back. With a rashness, Argus was rubbed against the ground and got stuck between a layer of foam before he got up and rolled away. A few more tendrils came forth and pulled away from the cage. And now, now it waited and tried moving forward. It hadn't tried in at least hundreds, thousands or even more years, the ancient being now resumed to speaking. Its tongue was dark and shallow, the speech was tainted and resonated as its echoes ran through the dark. Despite the fact that it laid hurt, trying to pull and push itself to move, it lashed in pain. The bottom was already trained as hunt from when it came clashing with the harsh ground. Such tenderness and softness were tainted, not rubbed against the crisp metal, it gave shrieking and chilling shouts. 'Thruu Thriak, Thruu Thriak.' It gave in a dark whisper, walking and grabbing the air, pulling forth and away. With each push, there was the promise of hunger. Now, it was just as starved as the beast and there laid no way for it to hide with him inside after having found the true intent. 'I'm here. Come on, is that all that you got?' Guided by only a voice, it came towards the small insect which threatened its existence and gave forth a rabidness that caught Argus yet again unexpectedly. The mouth stretched outwardly, the body slightly shrank away and became almost like a balloon, leaving but a thin long neck, keeping all its fat behind. With its long tendrils now it tended to its meat, keeping it away, protected, stretching as far as to the ceiling, if the cage had any in the infinity of its maddening cage. The dark speech continued and the enemy approached. Still, Argus managed to find a strength he didn't know he had and it was just as unexpected as the cold wind that came. From the holes that once bored and cut through the armoured prison. It's way too smart for its own good, Argus thought. Though not enough to be resistant after doing what it's done. 'Do you still fear the name?' Said the voice in an echo as it went once again, strike after strike. The shriek was barely audible in the dark but so was its dark voice, before it came. Out of the sudden, like a spear came, moist and gloomy, a shot in the dark which had the intent to smote him from where he stood. He had only been missed by fragments of inches by it as he laid topped on the floor, cowering and covering his head with his arms. The point of the spear was moist and soft enough that it had been broken and squished. It tried lodging itself against the wall but the result couldn't be seen by Argus. He peered but saw only small movements which couldn't be called real or figments of his imagination. As for the sounds that crept around, it was enough for guesses, something big was about to emerge. The sounds of the outstretched malformation made it obvious, even for him to guess. The force coming from that thing was enormous, even so, that it managed to push its tendril past its smashed point and puncture the cage. It sickened Argus to hear the sound of stretched and tormented metal, as the noise made by it resembles the cries of a thousand folded souls which rang in agony. Despair fell as he crawled, seeing how much more appeared above, sharp glittering needles from the sky, just looming there, floating and waiting for a sign. He didn't dare speak in that dark minute but wait. No sound came from his side, as he looked for an opportunity to move. The stench dripped from the needles as they closed down. Four at a time, they forced themselves on him, and without any notice, they stopped at the bottom, unable to come through. The ravenous hole was obvious to him, for even in the dark he could tell that it was there, waiting for him to go down and meet his destiny. It waited for him to make a move and yet he couldn't proceed, not until it fully withered. Could it be? It is no entry made by the parasite, but an entrance made for me, that is more than certain and far more than I can tell. I must escape as fast as I can. No yet, said the presence of his mind, something that he could now feel creeping in. It was something alien but something which he had recognised to be of his own. And the utmost certainty of his own accord, his sense of self-preservation. Roll now, slowly, this is what I must do now. His body just slipped up as if he was a fish on the land, and still, the needles just managed to creep by. Their softness revealed itself as it waited. Despite the fact that they appeared to be sharp and glittering, he stopped and managed to perform a quaint observation. They softened so they could get stuck on the surface. A layer of skin was visibly falling. No, I was wrong, Argus thought. What he saw in that moment was the fact that it didn't just soften the needle into the skin, but a layer of the skin which laid above fell down and encompassed the needle. To blow would also deal with itself, and the puncturing was obvious. It would've been silent if made from far away, yet Argus was close, heard it happen. A click and a clang came suddenly, then the skin was pulled back, the needles came back into the darkness and vanished as if they have never existed, to begin with. On the ground now laid the small cracks, which extended almost as far as he could see, though only as thin nets, which he even doubted to be imperfections. Did it attempt to find me? Why are those empty thin holes glittering? I need another look, and just like that, he rolled further away, just as the second pair of needles came by. It was a rain of strings that came, suddenly at a faster pace. The mass was just as frustrated as he was, that the slow coming stings became faster, harsher, more aware of the surrounding that no longer would they go straight but be forced in every direction. Multiple sides were taken, the shimmering light that reflected faded, though there was no source nor any sense for it to come. Argus stood pale completely in the dark and looked through the small openings. Indeed, he was wrong to have looked that way, yet there was something else to them. They ran deep and long through the bottom and didn't stop for as long as the eye could see. It was a bitter thing to be had, a grudge against himself, especially that he had gotten so far, yet he had it nonetheless. This was the place from where his memories stood and exactly how it managed to pull all that power and deception. Also, it seemed to have been the place from where the dim shine came out of. Memories, sight, visions, images, all into a fluid which still managed to flow and distract him. He pulled himself, snapping out of it before looking ahead. One sharp needle came and started digging it and drinking the fluid in front of it. Yet no eyes saw, no eyes did it have. 'Ferdinand, can you hear the name?' He jumped at once and just in the nick of time when a rain of a hundred sharp tentacles came raining down trying to impale in every direction. Dust lifted up, particles of snow, leaves being blown in the wind. It seemed as if it did more than making a few cracks, it managed to stir something which didn't belong to it. 'Alas.' The whisper was unheard, though he saw that in the midst of all, its desperation grew so harsh that it impaled its own tendrils in that failed attempt. Despite that, Argus knew what made it even more bitterly feel pain. It was the fact that he said that name, that seemed to hold a grudge to its sanity. A torment came as it stumbled down, having nothing to hold the mass in the air, those tentacles were pulled into the near dark and another blow was dealt. Argus didn't manage to escape unhurt, there now laid bruises over all his body, the various leaps and dances with the peril cracked and damaged some of his bones. His left leg could barely stand unaided, not to mention that even the slightest glimpse of light would blind him if he even came to it. No waylaid there for him to redeem himself. Argus roamed like a trap flying around, ready to be caught in the expanding net. Its plan had failed and it's done nothing but hurt itself and starve even more, which in its place made it more rabid and ferocious. There was the intent of murder going once again as Argus hit the first corner he thought he found. It could've been there or it could've been a trap once again, though what was obvious then, was the fact that the cage felt endless and there wasn't any way he could've found its wall. His hands shifted and started peeping around, feeling the surface until it found the edges which were dim and cut from the rest of the shape. Something was there and now wasn't, a fragment of a bigger object, perhaps a tower of the wall of a maze. Now serving as a barricade, Argus shifted and went behind it, feeling just how thick and sturdy it was. At the point of which, suddenly, the long limbs came at him again, though not like needles from the sky. It fired in every direction in front of him and around, managing to make a dull thump before bouncing away from the armoured point where he stood. Though all around he could hear the ground being stroked upon, hit after hit being laid, then pulled back to go once more. It went like that for minutes, their sounds left the impression of drums being forcefully hit as someone had the intent to break them. His presence annoyed it, even so, that he laid too far from it. Those sharp spears could barely reach the point it thought he was. And when he was the most confident of his position, he shouted, taunting yet again, yet not saying it fully. 'What is my name?' It didn't seem to react any different, nor pinpoint his exact point. Does it react now only to my name or is it just a trick? Argus didn't speak of yet again until he was sure he could do it without being prepared for the final strike. And it was getting worse. The attack on the ground stopped, as it tried taking stabs at the walls, in the air, higher and higher, some hovering strikes, other missing entirely. It tried to find anything and any point he could be. Now the drumbeat didn't go any longer in one direction or a region. It spread, it flailed, trying to get every single possible point at every single point in time, without delay or fear. Until the point where there came the sound of the final drumbeats where at the same time, every strike fell as if smitten on the ground. Now it was the time to test it. Argus said the wicked name and waited under cover, but nothing came. It laid as he repeated it a few tens of times, and still, nothing happened. Finally, he got onto both of his legs and walked around. Everywhere he looked he saw them stretched and lay down defeated. The skin was pale, like roots they laid withered, shimmering at the bottom, waiting to be picked up and carried away. It was a shame, he thought, such an adversary to lay defeated, yet he was still a parasite. And none of what he saw in front of his eyes have any attempt to reach him or to drink from the bottom. There laid no wail, it was obvious that there was some sort of intelligence in the mass. And with that came its pride. 'Is this all which you are? Just a mad beast defeated by nothing more than a small insect? By a little hairy and sweaty man called.' Argus stopped around and looked at the mouth. It laid on the bottom, cold air coming out of it as it inhaled and exhaled. It wasn't dead, but exhausted, waiting for another, or any kind of blow to be carried away and take it out of its misery. 'It couldn't have ended another way. Though it wasn't over and Argus had no weapon, nor the strength. I need to end its life before it wakes up or goes back to doing the same thing as it did previously. It will drain or kill me if I go below now where it lodged itself. Indeed, he saw that the mass behind it was just slightly more sensible, but even with that in mind. No weapon to pierce it. Argus grabbed with both of his hands a tentacle and tried lifting it again, this time on his own. It was more than heavy and sticky. Pointy, small shivers entered his skin after touching it. He noticed just how dirty it was and pointless. 'I couldn't use it to take you down either if I wanted to. And the name won't work either if you're not awake to see it, or so I believe.' There laid no other way, and still, time went on. 'You're tired of good aren't you.' It seemed as if it was a bad idea if it weren't for the fact which he had remembered that this parasite had a brain, or so it had claimed when it tried to trick him. 'I hope you're down for good, or this might be.' There was a pause, again, as he stopped, lifting one of the many mandibles before going on. The mouth itself was huge, an ominous thing crept out it. By now, the stench died off once it's done its purpose, removing his sense of smell. It was a peculiar thing, to have been used to smelling and all of the sudden having get rid of. 'Aaagh.' Though it seemed that its true sign was revealed. A misstep, as he laid his finger on a creeping pool of a burning liquid which laid between the teeth. It was a forest of white thorns of white, blue tinted, pink skinned teeth through which he carefully carried ahead. His rags now did nothing to comfort him but slow his approach. It was far too uncomfortable for him to abandon them there but then again, neither could he protest anymore. As for them, they were ripped, from the shoulder came, as a result of the lack of attention which he showed as he went on. Ripped, the fabric fell and flies away by its dark breath. Argus hand his hands crawl right through the teeth as he grabbed the pinkness which was indeed its soft skin and kept lifting up so he'd advance. It didn't seem to bother it, though neither could complain or take any break from that. At the bottom of his feet, he stepped on the delicate teeth with quite a surprise. They were lowered inside the skin and not as sharp and hardened as the ones which laid above of them. After each step, they lowered even more as he went on, as far below as he could look behind. Much time passed at the point where he had forgotten himself and where he laid. Sure, it was bitter, to be caught in a jagged peak that never ended, a dark damp place, which indeed seemed to have no escape. At least the creature still slept as he went on until finally he jumped out and saw the sharp mandible just bounce over its own skin. 'That was close.' Said Argus, now with more confidence, as it was obvious he couldn't be heard from inside. The flesh was obviously moist, and he could look on ahead to see the various skeletons which laid around in puddles of its digestion. A crooked path laid ahead, going as far upwards rather than below, on a slope which had revealed the various pair of twisted fragments of. 'Bones?' The liquid which laid around revealed the glow, which in its turn revealed just how many of those twisted fragments laid around, twisted, cracked and stretched. At first, one would've thought that perhaps it was an overgrown spine which ended up growing in a bad direction, never fixed. From it, though came multiple other paths and stretches, as if to make way and help manage two or other bodies, pushing other ligaments and bones aside to make way for others to grow. And even with that, how could the parasite grow them like that? As for his question, he looked around and saw parts of the rib cage stretch as far as to reach the small room in which he was, perhaps too close to the mouth. His hand laid near the bones now, close to the wall of skin, the pinkness of flesh was met by small growths of red which seemed to be present only in the chamber. Or to be more precise, the places from where the skeletons laid, which, just as well seemed to be the exact spot from where bones formed. His hands touched the bones without fear, and then he felt them. They weren't as strong as he would've expected, almost to the point where he could pull. But, this wasn't the place nor the time. 'Your weak point is exposed If this is your line of defence.' Though it had some sense to it, the line of bones leads upwards, towards where the mass most likely had its brain. 'And he did take out of those poor saps.' He looked in bitterness at the other side of the room and decided to acknowledge it immediately. 'And even the small children who weren't supposed to be here.' It was a sad view, though one of the children seemed to have the bone body of a small animal with him, just for the better. Just the bones, that was all, and the ability to make dreams. They laid in this room and died. Immediately, he stepped away from the meat and the puddles and stopped on the rising slope. Timidly, the steps seemed to be more formed, the meat seemed to have absorbed most of the light inside, and rightly above, a climb was more than enough for him to take. Argus sighed then for a moment and looked back at it. Such a simple place to be trapped and yet, all of them died. It wasn't long ago that he had the chance to be just as caught as them and die. Now, he pitied them, and even more, he pitched it. Though, the most important thing remained, as his hand jerked around his pants, was the fact that he had got ridden of the last of the teeth. And nothing more was given in return but an aching jaw which didn't do much but shiver. A sad ending expected him, but he went one nonetheless. 'Now, where could it be?' There seemed to have been ingrown ribs which suddenly grew to the bottom. 'You had no idea how to grow them, isn't that right?' The rings left a bad impression on it as if they were meant to be twisted and grown in a different direction. Such thing backfired, as he looked at the bottom, some pierced through the meat and the road, most likely causing enough pain as it were. Meat spread around so they wouldn't hurt as much, no doubt what made it lash as me as harshly. 'But it was pointless, for, as you can see, or not, I'm still alive.' Though just enough air laid enough for him to survive and go on for now. The pores outside the body brought them in, it needed just as much as to survive just as he needed. Just slightly, was he dizzy because of the altitude he was getting one, but he made it to the next chamber, at which the slope stopped. It was a concave room, both around and below. There seemed to have been small eggs growing, or at first, he thought. On a slightly closer look, they were only part of the twisted sacks in, which it stored its various liquids, some protected by small carcasses of bones, others left alone. It felt cosy and warm, after getting near them, and the long journey had left him weary for a few lifetimes, to say the least. 'Quite the peculiar place I find myself inside of and the worst moment I could even think off.' It was a sad tale to sit there and sleep in such a perilous place, all alone. Though its organs were so warm and accepting, like big pillows to be revealed and used. Argus laid against one of them, took a deep breath and closed his eyes. The light was just becoming dim and darker with each blink if it wasn't just another illusion. At least he had remembered the beast had been laid in its bed for good, or at least for some time. Its slumber must've been a lot more different, especially after what they've both been through. 'Good night then. One slight delay before your end comes.' In his deepest of thoughts, he had hopes that his own would come just as well, as either one of them could be the one biting the dust. There laid an alien organism resting against the small pouches, which were numbing. He had been concerned with everything he had ever done before. And pain had laid him in, for more than half a decade now, though his dreams were pleasant and content. No pain nor blow was given to him, and at last, he had gotten what he was promised. A memory, in form of a dream, it wasn't the time nor the place, and he was vulnerable. Nonetheless, he had achieved a thing which many others before him failed, it was far from over, though he delved above the cage of his desire. His house was cosy, his brother laid on a side of the table along with his mother. None of them stared at one another, and perhaps it's been so far into his own recollection that he had forgotten how it entirely went on. Has something happened? A blunt kid, and never has he shown much concern for his family, wondering even at that if they were his, to begin with. Taller, a darker hair, brown eyes, common rough features just threw themselves against theirs. His mother had golden hair and blue eyes, which later started to dim. Both of which features seemed a lot paler than they have been before. Something grim had happened. Henceforth, he asked. 'Is something wrong mother?' A failure of words came as his brother took the chance and asked her before him. It was already a sad approach, though he abstained from trying to provoke them. He knew the better, with that memory in mind. The whole scene left a bittersweet taste, all clad in grey, from the windows, table, the room, their clothes, black and white, other than them. Her golden hair seemed to dim slowly to it. Was this when she revealed her affliction? Her illness was shown to them and it was obvious even when she refused to talk about it. Did she think us that dumb? To be thought of as a small child without anything to say? 'What is it then?' It was a shock, as his brother's small shells of eyes were pointed at him. Never before had he taken an interest in our mother, why now? She answered to none of them, and the rest of their dinner went as silent as the mood was left for. After being done, they were both left alone to clean the dishes as she went upstairs. It went on, standing close to one another, the brothers started cleaning the dishes. A pale clear light shimmered in front of them. It was the reflection which came from behind. Outside, there had passed at least two or three cars with strong front lights, taking their first curve, heading most likely for the main road with business. It hadn't happened often, though on rare occasions they did manage to see junkers shoot at one another as they ran on ahead. Then again, it was the only thing which they could both relate to. At once they turned and look through. The sounds of firearms being emptied ran on ahead as long piercing glittering stones being thrown. One managed to land and diminish a light from one of the cars, while the other one that managed to hit broke the rear window. A stairway was ladder from above and down came their mother at once. It was one of her better moments when she just came into a flight and pulled the curtains over the window. There was a moment where they both pretended to be still washing while she waited for things to settle down. Beyond her awareness, both of them still threw a glance trying to see what she was doing over there. Enough time passed already that it was still night. Even then, her mood became more shallow and harsh as she stomped her way back to her room. It was the intermission between then and the night and something serious must've happened if she still refused to talk. 'She was so well the other day.'It was the littlest attempt of banter he had gotten, as he saw his bigger brother concerned.'Why do you think she changed all of the sudden?'I do not know, though I doubt there's anything you can do about it, is there?'Both of them were in the same position, close evenly to the same round motion around the plates. The forks and spoons were clean, the solution on the table, as the cleaning went on seemed to dim out and be taken away by the time. Without a doubt, the younger brother would be sent back to it. But why am I here again? I can't remember what happened, though if he recalls. 'Tell me, brother, what happened the day before this one, I. I seem to have forgotten myself in all of this. What's he playing at now? Is this one of his little tricks he's playing on me?' Well, we've helped our mother get vegetables from the barter. How did you forget that so soon?' Argus turned his look towards the closed curtain, it's been covering the window for a while and he had forgotten what laid on the other side. Was it noon, was it the day or the night? Have we ever taken supper and the dinner at the right times? It was harsh to pinpoint something which he had no idea nor any particular interest in. Quite bizarre indeed, that he was checked like that. Even for his age, he knew that his younger brother was slightly sharper. Only slightly sharper. 'Oops. Excuse my accident.' His hand slipped and forced the dishes into the sink, enough to break them through. 'You've done it on purpose.' Hysteria overcame the boy, as it was obvious that he'd be blamed for it. To pour it in, he continued to torment his younger brother. 'And she won't believe you either. Then again, why should she? You're the dumb younger. One.' A glimmer of self-awareness stopped him from going on. He had remembered insulting him, as many of times, but this one, in particular, was not only as docile as the other ones. It shook the boy to the point of crying. Perhaps it wouldn't have been as harsh if it weren't for the shards that came and pierced his skin. Blood dripped and managed to fall on the sink and in the cloth which laid saddened to the bottom, right in front of the skin. The white material was stained. And the loud noise made her come to the bottom and finally speak her word about. 'What going down here?' As a person, she's never been violent, though it wasn't the best of times to be caught like that. Argus was shoved by the side, as she closed on and slapped the sink closed. There laid a trail of blood on the white, which made obvious who the culprit was. Shards of the broken dishes were laid inside, as the first one that was thrown recoiled and cracked the others which were under it. He was hardly breathing and crying and seeing it like that made her break down in tears as well. 'Go to your room, now and don't come out.' Argus asked no question but he saw the only the first time his brother was slapped across the face. Beguiled by it, he hid behind the pillars through the stairs and listened. They weren't thick enough to hide him but it was dark. The sweat and the water ran down them as he was wet from the encounter. And he laid there and looked at them, which went on and on until she was done scolding him and eventually took out the fragments out of his skin. The night went out as remembered. Though if it weren't for her shouts, perhaps it wouldn't have been that it was clear to him. 'Do you have any idea just how hard it is for me? I can't have you both running and blaming each other for something you've done. The two of you are the only ones I've had in this world and you go ahead and act like animals. Please, I cannot have you both keep going on like this anymore, you know I love both of you and I need to. I need to know that you won't go up ending like ruffians on the streets, I know I raised you better than this.' They were both gazing at their feet, looking in distress, as further away from one another. The daylight was shining in its full prime, and they both stood in the middle of the house. She had never found out who was the real culprit of what happened, nonetheless. 'Enough is enough, do you understand me? Have I been wrong in asking you to help me around?' 'No, mother."Don't interrupt me, wait for your turn to speak, I just cannot understand what's gotten in both of you these days.Between this and Miss Penny coming and accusing you of burglary.'Her scowl turned away to Argus.Clearly displeased as it turned out to be the third time.No charges were placed, but she felt the shame, to be pitied and judged like that.'Do any of the two of you have any sense left now?You were such a promising boy now, I cannot keep you locked forever in this house.I won't have it made into dungeons.And I hate that I've come down to just as petty as hitting my own children, but none of you has given me a choice.Get some damn sense, both of you.'She was shimmering with rage, enough that she stopped mid-way outside and burst right through her pack of cigars.They were long and she waited in front of her porch, smoking in the smouldering sunlight.As harsh as it were, her eyes were averted from the passing travellers, who could recognise, immediately, the sight of what seemed to be a crone.Both of her children waited back and didn't move for a while, they haven't dared to look any other way other than the ends of their feet.Young, still, something that could be said about them, something held them there.More importantly, something held Argus from looking in any other direction now, when he was in control.Was it out of fear or respect for her?Perhaps both, perhaps neither, most likely since they were too young to understand what any really meant, it was the latter one.And no word was spoken, their eyes paled, spirit waned, and just waiting there, while the sunlight travelled through the corners of the window left them to feel unsettled and abandoned.Twenty feet he ran ahead while looking down and wondering if she was dead.Argus opened the door and noticed she had passed down the stairs and as for the placing of his shivering fingers around the neckline, he felt nothing.Immediately, he back away and didn't look back.Trying to get away was pointless.The sky was cut in half, along with the sky.'Mother!'Yelled his younger brother, after coming to see what happened.He had been bitten by the same curiosity as he was, and now neither of them were bound to looking at their feet anymore.They were free.'What have you done to her?Why isn't she moving?"There wasn't any answer, not one that could be understood by a child.And more important matters were at hand, where they were, what had happened, how far he could go.Right around where the road twisted, going slightly forward then it went on a curve, it linked directly with the cut in the sky.The lion's den near which he stood had its paw of stone right around the stairs.Usually, she'd stand on there, as they were slightly higher than the stairs and cleaner.While on, he got on his toes and Argus looked ahead.Peering from where he stood, he managed to see something quite important, or more so than he would've thought.A line was left, almost like a small crawling tunnel.There was the illusion that the road had stopped there, leaving nothing for him to go on.Soon, diminished, he came down, but immediately went to the side of the wall.Out of that thin road came a car, which rushed ahead, burst in and barely managed to get the turn in time not to hit the small child which stood in the road.A bit of luck there, though he was now followed by his crying brother.'Just stop following me, go help your mother.Listen, I've done nothing to her, that's how I found her, the same way you did.'It seemed though none or just some of them got to him.Quickly he responded.'We need to find a doctor now.Please.'He took him by the hand and dragged him around, even if he was stuck in his memory and remained a burden, he was taken.It was a thin road, a fragment of the road they went as children, yet now, this was a dark twist of his mind.Stretched to encompass the small thin place he was left to, he didn't do much anymore but try to go through.It was too thin for them to go through, and with the shock his brother felt, it didn't take much for him to try.Argus' eyes widened, peering through, his feet and body felt lighter.The air did travel faster and even breathing could be felt and seen as travelling outside his body and floating through. Birds were moving unnaturally fast for what was dimmed there and everything seemed as being warped. He turned and almost snapped his neck in the fast motion. I didn't mean to do it that fast. He said, and it seemed that even his words, his thoughts were faster. The outer edge softened, and his head felt a lot of light, even more than his body did. A nod of the head soon came from his brother and they both went on, right through the tunnel, where it stopped being as thin. It wasn't long until they both reached the other side and saw just how twisted the room was. Clad in white, and plenty of nets made out of the skin, they were in something which was alive and pulsating. Sacks laid all around its formation, bumping up and down, closer then further away. In their motion, as hypnotising as it was to look at, he hasn't carried away. He stopped holding hands and saw him fall there unconscious. There wasn't any further need for the burden as he thought, and now, it seemed that the dream was about to end. Argus opened his mouth and asked it directly. 'Are you the parasite? Do you plague my mind? This must be you, I know it is you. You seem to be haunting me, rather, to have tried doing so for some time, in my dreams, my nightmare. There's no time for you to spread and take over my mind now, it's far too late for that. I can see and note that I'm half-way there to your brain and once I arrive.' Look before you. 'With one single sentence which came out of nowhere, he was silenced. Argus lifted his hand and saw them stretched, they had become all clad in red, part of the white which laid on his bottom ground. He could feel that tainted blood coming through his hands, travelling as if he was nothing more but an ill organ cut out of something smaller and more disturbing to look at. His face started jerking away, pulling itself from the place when he could see the changes going on. 'Aaaaaaaaaaagh.' Came the shouted, though it was partially muffled by what laid now in his mouth growing as he looked at it. Something unnatural crept inside his mouth and covered it. Everything which rushed in his mind was still fast, yet the process was slow. His nails fell, being pushed out by a foam, yet the bubbles and what seemed to be a liquid in-between turned solid as blisters around his skin. One popped out with immense pain, and it was only then that he had enough strength to cut through. The jaw turned out to be razor sharp as it cut through the growth which had taken ill to his mouth and lips. Given enough time, it could've turned him into a cocoon, of which he knew, if it weren't for the weakness, the reminder of what it was afraid of. The name was rigged for it, the intonations and various drops of the voice made the pain roam through the body even in its sleep. The promise of any place where it could hide from the growing fever was over. Now he felt fear as she shared some of the pain. Trusted out of his sleep, the last image of taint was shallow. Like a mirror, the wall of skin had his face and body slowly being dragged to the place where he'd become part of it. Those teeth, he held. 'Real, they were just as real as I am, were. Still.' Argus gasped at the small pillow which had been milked of its fluid, leaving nothing behind other than the small deflated skin. It reeked like sin, or something close to that. Nonetheless, Argus reminded himself of the encounter and question whenever or not it was the parasite behind it. 'It did react in the same manner as I have seen. You are trapped in here, as well as I recently found myself.' This was something which made him think. Whenever or not those tendrils extended to the world outside, which could be more than a problem. If it were, for him to escape and there were others nibbling at the belly of the world. And even with that, he was still left alive, not abandoned or abashed, unhurt. There wasn't any new wound, even so, he was warm. 'Now, to come back to the journey.' He said, and there wasn't any echo despite how grand, tall and wide the room was. Chills crept, as the bones rattled, it was already quite peculiar for him to be surrounded by the thing as such, yet he forgot himself for a moment and waited. His eyes were on the point and there wasn't another way to go ahead, other than the way back.'There's none of that there.'Argus said.No entry, no other hole of which he knew, and if the beast were to wake and find him in a field of sharp mandibles, he'd be throttled alive, broken, crushed, stabbed and wounded.Bleeding could come if he wasn't slowly digested.'Those bones were clean and unbroken.Indeed, you left them to stay and slowly devour them, haven't you?You're not that bad for what you seem to be.'With that in mind, he returned to his search.What seemed to be a subtly normal room turned out to be only an illusion as he approached and saw two extensions of what seemed to be round.They were straight at the ends, and the curved which they initially took seemed to have created the illusion of a dead end.It wasn't the case, yet he had dreamed of it.'I know what to expect if I go there.'There was a wall of skin, though he would've expected a stream, the deep end had something of a darkness at the end of it.It will most likely attempt to trap me like it did inside my dream.Guided by his, prediction, he went on ahead and turned towards it and saw the steep part.A slow ascension soon followed and he could see the reason why he would've been trapped if he continued the other way.Not only was the path ahead shallow and thin to pass, he could feel how he was tickled.It could've ended up as being a mystery if he dared to look on it a second time.Indeed, thousands of tiny rounded tips of skin wriggled back and forth to grab something.The motion repeated indefinitely from what he could notice until it found and grabbed a hold of something.Something which turned out to be him, they held and pushed, then pulled, then grabbed and without a doubt flinched.Argus couldn't have been taken around.He was poised to stand and relax his muscles, for now, he was carried beyond his control.Still bone formed the path below and right it wasn't going to end in another room or another place.'Why are you help me then?Can't you recognise that I'm not part of it?'If indeed it had any sentience, it was doing a horrible mistake as he arrived at the breaking point.A fortress which grew around, made out of bone, resigned to the sky in a dark room full of meat.Limbs were grown from all sides and held the fortress above every single wire and cell.By the time when he was left to move on his own, Argus wasn't done gasping at the sight.It's been long tormented and cracked.No wonder why it had appeared to be suffering, it wasn't the body, but the mind, a mistake perhaps.The end of the spine which should've been connected to it grew inwards and impaled the brain.Such was the liquid which ran through and dropped, melting through the meat and killing it from inside.'It appears as if I have my work cut out for me.I need only to have you dealt the final blow and you shall fall and never return here ever again.'Perhaps, on a second look, it was an exaggeration to compare the formation to a fortress.He notices after a close approach that the bone grew in all directions, separating as much as it could and despite that, there wasn't any visible part of the brain.It wasn't exposed, yet the entry was there, and only a harsh climb stood between him and its demise.Argus had his hand shaking as it dropped below to grab.'They.They're gone.'It was a slip, which he had forgotten, as the last ones were either wasted or lost, standing completely out of his control and reach.'At least I.'His foot was frozen, almost solid on the ground as he stopped low.Fresh bones appeared on a more immediate stance, popping out from cracks and holes.It could feel him as well as he could feel it too.The field around it was dark and smaller pieces of bone formed around it for protection even then as he approached.A mist came out as it finally could feel his presence dwindling about.Such was the scent of evil that he was forced on into a slumber.This was perhaps the last line of defence, against which he could do nothing but wait and heed the call.It was just as painful as he would've thought to be roughened up.Forced on a nightmare he had before, walking through a crowd of many which only grew with the time.The road was wider than he had remembered, so to say the least, this was eight times larger, and at the end of it laid the giant, with its head exposed. 'It possessed him, even in my dream. How could this be?' Out of his mouth, a variation of sand came about, which he took for granted and spat it out to see. Even speaking took a lot out of him to achieve, as the realm wasn't his anymore. Yet the dream was obvious, he was aware of who he was, where he laid and against who he was going about. The bones pierced and popped, wriggling in the distance. If this was the sleepwalking he was thinking about, this, perhaps was the best chance. Almost divine, in a single motion, his hands grabbed two chests from behind of them, two walking people who seemed to be wearing robes. They disintegrated slowly, as he had taken a mouthful of the sand of which they were made out of. It was not that he started devouring and feeding himself with as much of it as he could. On the ground, he was the only one standing still, taking from them, eating like a cannibal in the darkest and most desperate of jungles. Argus could feel himself be alive, yet for what he's done, it was too realise to understand that there was no return. A glimpse of wind threw him out of the circle of sand and he found himself walking alone, in a sea of it. His feet could still walk, but when he attempted to get back on the road, the grain, it burned his hand. A touch, a glimpse and a rabid thing it did to him. 'Even if I have to get there in one piece, I'll have your life at the end of it.' With a hatred that wasn't met before, he could finally go ahead at his own pace. Leaping and jumping from sand patch to sand patch, in a desire to be finally free. This was the last seal he'd get to cut off before he was freed. I know this must be it. With that in mind, his hand still reached and grabbed at feet. It was burning, his fingernails became nails which pierced their skin and made them trip. He had it easier now to take the sand and regain his vitality and nimbleness. And not to mention that never before had he felt as alive as he did now. His condition was noted. Sand became too hot to touch now and grimmer. It wasn't sand but tar, Argus having no choice as the transformation, he leapt in the last attempt and grabbed a hold at the statue of tar which stood near. Below him, he could feel the blisters forming, the tar becoming even hotter by the second, trying to trip and entrap him. It had failed but not for long, as there laid a reasonable distance between the platform on which he stood and the liquid. Nonetheless, it was coming and it was happening just as fast as he had thought. Those tar men crept and stopped moving, some blocking the path ahead entirely, as for Argus. He found himself jumping and leaping over them, without losing anything which he had been thinking about. 'You won't get me yet. I need to reach it before it gets encompassed by the tar. A quaint observation was taken as the lifting mass attempted to cover it even then. Hands of tar came from the bottom of those damp pits and started bringing the tar. They didn't start at first with the head but the body, it would've been save for last, but no chance could be taken. Everywhere he looked, for as far and wide as he could see, the tar pit was endlessly and concerning. Its growth was dark and unnerving. Argus now came to the conclusion that there wasn't any way to stay, as the pain was just as real as he felt. It tried getting me alive. 'Hear my name then, I know you can. Remember your fear now, for the name of Ferdinand still creeps, even in my darkest of dreams.' The boiling tar stopped, the statues all around were rendered asunder, or at least those in his immediate vicinity. It seemed as if the sand was running out of those which had the cracks inside, as they had served enough as for a base. The giant frowned and it was ever sad to wait for the executioner to come. It started shaking at first when Argus thought to be an illusion of pain. Yet, at once, those hand, which stood below started jerking about, lifting themselves from below the pit. They were connected and fashioned after the body, dark at the base and at the sheet of the hand. Two were used to hold it still. And now, it came to its full standing position, as for all other times, the giant was just standing and waiting about. In its prime, the dark titan, was colossal, rivalling even the true body of the parasite, and without a doubt, also in strength. With a strong thrust, a hand came down and boiled asunder. From the depths of the pit, it pulled a dripping club, from the other side it held a black sword, both as tall as he was. It was still a dream, yet more than what could lay behind his comprehension. Argus knew he could be slain. His plan turned against himself and instead of leaping forward, he was cast into a flight that stopped him from advancing. The way back was dire and seemingly never ending. The statues were lowering as well when his flight was interrupted. No way to run, or else he might end up being boiled alive in the burning tar and more certainly no way to fight it. He had to try. 'I will not give up yet. Do you still think you can stand against me?' Argus had his voice cracking down if he had planned to give up a speech to boost himself against the beast, he had miserably failed at it, utmostly terrible. Even though he had tried to figure out something, to come up with anything, the power of that name seemed to be waning down, there wasn't any point of saying it further. It feared nothing in this realm of slumber, and it was barely now, that the giant was approaching that he saw the bolstering cranium with its piercing bones. The giant had been put a lot of pressure on since he was dripping with tar, its whole face seemed to have been impaled. It couldn't stop the growth of bones now that it was focusing on him. Either way, the fight would end, he'd get the last of it to end its own life before he did. 'And so it will all end. You hear me? Neither of us will make it back alive, in this damn rotting cage.' And neither of us will free it either, not suck on the matter which made up this prison. The statues had their heads smashed his feet came from one head to another. It was painful, distracting. A small, insignificant human being going up a giant, leaping from statues of the shimmering black wax-like substance. Each step made by the giant made the boiling liquid tremble at its feet. Those blisters were present, yet it couldn't feel a thing inside its armoured carcas. That was the only important part of its body, the cage. It spoke no words of tender love, but a dark glimpse of hatred and distant which was felt for him. 'Your doom comes near.' In that voice, there were fragments of his familiar friends which once guided him. Not distracting enough, though it had reminded him, nonetheless, of the fact that he never even asked for a name. Such a bitter taste for such a small man. Tired he stood on a melting pile of tar as if it was nothing more than a chair and started breathing. His cold breaths dissipated in the air. It was the worst of times to wait and do so, yet he did it nonetheless. Quite peculiar, to do it now. It was the mid-way distance, the bitter tar reached the feet level, barely lifting on the ground. Such an obvious remark, though he said it as if someone was there with him to observe. 'It's not the tar which is rising, but the platform which is lowering inside of it.' The edges of the sky, red and orange made it obvious now, as he focused on in rather than the dark figure approaching him. Has it always been a flaming sword? Argus asked himself then, though he had failed to see and wonder at that. It wasn't important, neither was the attempt. Controlling such a body was already tiring, at the point where even approaching was too taxing to continue. It stopped and fell on its knees, releasing a small wave which also failed to reach him. The knees fell and the body was starting to fall apart and become solid under the cold. Argus had his jaw aching and it wasn't until the cold hit that he reminded himself of the fact that it was made out of crooked metal. Like a spear and a boulder came flying, both the sword and the club had missed him by long shots. Again, disarmed, after those attempts, he ruined Argus' dream forever. 'It is over now.' Those words made the platform stop, leaving nothing but a dark stare from socketless eyes. It was bitterly waiting, as the tar stopped raising itself, the statues stopping as well from melting. Yet, despite the fact that it waxes taxed with every moved, the armless figure opened a mouth, at an

